invalid in respect the directors who made the same were not qualified to act as directors. By the articles of association of the company it is provided that "every member holding ten shares" shall be eligible and may be elected a director. Now, no question is raised as to the fact of the two directors in question having been elected to the office of director, and the regularity of this election is not impugned. The question therefore is, have they the requisite qualification? It is admitted that those directors are entered on the register as holders, each of them, of more than ten shares in the company. Being so registered they must, according to the 23d section of the Act of 1862 be deemed to be "members of the company" in respect and to the extent of the shares entered in the register as held by them. The two directors, therefore, according to the criterion furnished by the Act of 1862, are members of this company holding more than ten shares each; and if so, then they have the qualification for the office of director specified by the articles of association.

Packet Co. v.

It is said, however, that the shares held by these directors are held by them in trust for the North British Railway or North British Packet Company, and that they have no beneficial right or interest in the shares which are registered in their names. I think this is a matter which is quite irrelevant to any question affecting the rights or obligations of persons who are registered as shareholders.

The statute forbids the entry on the register of any company registered under its provisions, of the notice of any trust, expressed, implied, or constructive, and I think we cannot in such a case as this go behind the register to inquire into alleged facts which are forbidden to appear there. This appears to have been the view taken in the English cases to which we were referred, and I am prepared to follow that view here. It is obviously a reasonable view. The absence of any notice of trust in the register prevents the person registered from pleading that he holds in trust as against the company or its creditors in any question which may arise inferring liability on him (the registered shareholder) for fulfilment of the whole obligations imposed on him by his being a member and holding shares. He is registered individually, and individually he is liable for all the obligations of a shareholder. I think the converse of this must equally obtain. He is registered individually, and individually he must be entitled to all the privileges or benefits arising from the fact of his being a registered shareholder.

The defender, however, relies more on the special terms of the articles of association of this company than on the terms of the statute, in support of his defence. He pleads that both of the directors in question being nominees or holders of shares in trust for a company, itself the real holder, only one of them could act or vote as for the company, and that one director could not validly make the call. I think he is right in saying that any one director could not have made the call. It required at least a quorum of the directors to make the call, and it is provided by the article that two of the directors shall be a quorum. But the articles to which the defender refers appear to me to have no reference either to the qualification of a director or to anything done at a directors' meeting.

That article is the 4th, and the important part of it is the last clause, which provides—"In case any share or interest in this concern shall be held in the name of a company or firm, only one individual partner of that company shall be entitled to attend and vote at the general meetings, and to give proxy as

No. 68. aforesaid, whose name shall be entered in the books of the company as the ostensible holder."

Dec. 12, 1891.
The Galloway
Saloon Steam
Packet Co. v.
Wallace.

I think that provision has no application or bearing whatever on the present question. In the first place, the words, "any share or interest . . . held in the name of a company or firm," must, in my opinion, be held to mean any share or interest registered in the name of a firm, and if that be the meaning of the words, they have no application to the case where the shares are not registered in the name of a firm but in the names of individuals. Secondly, the two directors in question are certainly not entered on the register as the "ostensible holders" for behoof of any firm, and therefore any restriction in acting or voting imposed on such "ostensible holders," registered as such, does not affect them. But, thirdly (and this is of itself a complete answer to the argument maintained by the defender), the article now under consideration provides a certain regulation to be observed in voting at general meetings of the company, and at such meetings only. The meeting of 7th July last was not a general meeting, and therefore the 4th article can have no bearing upon what was then done.

I think the defence maintained here is irrelevant, and therefore the proof allowed by the Lord Ordinary is unnecessary. The defences being irrelevant, the pursuer, in my opinion, is entitled to decree as concluded for.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, repelled the defences, and decerned against the defenders in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

Executor—Removal—Agreement by executor adverse to executry estate—Judicial Factor.—Where a majority of executors entered into an agreement binding themselves to use their powers as executors to further the claims of one of the claimants to the estate, the Court, in a petition at the instance of certain of the next of kin of the deceased (including the minority of the executors), sequestrated the estate and appointed a judicial factor.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

ANDREW PENNY, of Park, Aberdeenshire, died intestate in Bolivia on 18th May 1890, leaving a considerable amount of property in Bolivia and in Scotland.

On 10th October 1890 four sisters of the deceased—Mrs Birnie, Mrs Christie, Mrs Mennie, and Mrs M'Intosh—were decerned executors-dative to him qua four of his next of kin.

About £36,000 of the moveable estate belonging to the deceased in Great Britain was in the hands of his London agents, Messrs Antony Gibbs & Sons, and this sum was claimed by the executors, and also by Senora Maria Galindo Penny, who stated that she was the widow of the deceased and that he had died domiciled in Bolivia, by the laws of which country she was entitled to his whole heritable estate there, and to his whole moveable estate wherever situated. She further stated, that she had obtained the administration of his estates in Bolivia. The executors denied these averments regarding the marriage and domicile of the deceased. In consequence of these claims Messrs Gibbs raised a multiplicity, in which they consigned the sum in their hands in Court.

On 11th September 1891 two of the executors, Mrs Christie and Mrs Mennie, together with the representatives of another, Mrs M'Intosh, who had died, abandoned their opposition to Senora Galindo Penny's claim, and entered into the agreement quoted below with William Penny Craik, to whom Senora Galindo Penny had been married on 20th August 1891, and who claimed to be in right of her whole estate under their marriage-contract.*

* The agreement bore to be between William Penny Craik of the first part, and Alexander Wilson and Alexander Milne, solicitors in Aberdeen, as mandataries for the other parties named above of the second part, and proceeded on the narrative that the said Andrew Penny died intestate at Huanchaca, in Bolivia, on 18th May 1890, survived by his widow Maria Galindo V. de Penny, now wife of the said William Penny Craik, the first party, and that he was possessed at his death, inter alia, of houses, lands, mines, shares of mines, and others in Bolivia (to which the said Maria Galindo V. de Penny succeeded as his widow, according to Bolivian law), and of personal or moveable property both in Bolivia and Great Britain, to the whole of which the said Maria Galindo V. de Penny succeeded if his domicile were Bolivian, but to half of which only she succeeded if his domicile were Scottish, the other half in that event descending to his next of kin; that the said Maria Galindo V. de Penny disputed the decerniture and confirmation of the executrices-dative on the ground that the said Andrew Penny was domiciled in Bolivia at the time of his death, and that she was therefore entitled, as aforesaid, to the whole of his personal or moveable estate; that certain allegations had been made to the effect that the said Maria Galindo V. de Penny was not the lawful wife of the said Andrew Penny, and was therefore not entitled to any part of his estates; but that the second party's constituents were satisfied that the said allegations were unfounded, and that the said Maria Galindo V. de Penny was entitled to succeed, as before stated, to the real or heritable estates in Bolivia; and further, that the first party, as the husband of the said Maria Galindo V. de Penny, is now, in terms of their marriage-contract, in right of all estate, rights, claims, and interests belonging to and vested in her; and that the first party and the second parties' constituents have recently been negotiating for a settlement of all questions which have been or may be raised touching the succession to the said Andrew Penny's whole estates, and that without making any admission on either side as to the place of his domicile, they have now resolved on an amicable settlement as follows: Therefore the said parties agreed as follows:—"First, That there shall be paid out of the personal estate of the said Andrew Penny, but only if and when the said personal estate is effectually vested in the first party as after mentioned, to the said next of kin and representatives of deceased next of kin of the said Andrew Penny, exclusive of the said James Penny (the heir-at-law and so entitled to the Scots heritage), a sum of £25,000, divisible among the said next of kin and representatives foresaid in equal shares per stirpes. Second, That this payment of £25,000 shall be made by the first party and accepted by the said next of kin and representatives foresaid as in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims, rights, and pretensions, by way of succession or otherwise, which the said next of kin or representatives foresaid, or any of them, may have in, to, or against any part of the estate, heritable or moveable, real or personal, wheresoever situated, of the said Andrew Penny. Third, That this agreement shall be operative, and the said sum shall become payable, only upon the second parties or their constituents procuring the consents hereto of the said Mrs Catherine Penny or Birnie, and of the children of the said deceased Charles Penny, which consents the second parties bind their constituents (the trustees of the said Mrs Isabella Penny or M'Intosh being bound only to the extent of Thereafter Mrs Birnie and Mrs Christie brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against Messrs Collie, advocates there, the agents of the executors, for delivery of the whole documents in their hands belonging to the executry estate.

On 19th October 1891, Mrs Birnie, the executrix who had not acceded to the agreement above narrated, together with the representatives of the late Charles Penny, a brother of the deceased, presented a petition for the sequestration of the estate, and the appointment of a judicial factor. Birnie v.
Christie.

Mrs Christie and Mrs Mennie and the other parties of the second part to the agreement lodged answers, in which they denied that the agreement in any way prejudiced the rights or claims of the petitioners; and they further maintained that the appointment of a judicial factor was unnecessary, as substantially the whole estate in Great Britain was already in manibus curiæ in the multiplepounding.

Mr and Mrs Penny Craik lodged answers to substantially the same effect.

On 7th November 1891, the Lord Ordinary (Low) refused the petition.*

The petitioners reclaimed, and argued. The respondent executors were entitled to settle their individual claims, but it was impossible not to see that under this agreement they had bound themselves qua executors to do all in their power to aid Mr and Mrs Penny Craik in their claims to the estate. Such a course was inconsistent with their duty to the estate under their trust. In point of fact all the estate had not been consigned in the multiplepounding, for there was other estate on its way to this country. It would be difficult, if not impossible, for the petitioners to prosecute their personal claims in the Bolivian Courts, so long as the executors remained in office, for the Bolivian Courts might reasonably hold that they alone represented the next of kin.

The respondents Mrs Christie and others maintained in argument the position taken up in their answers.

Counsel for Mr and Mrs Penny Craik were also heard, maintaining that they had an interest to see that the executors were not removed from office, and substantially repeating the arguments of the other respondents.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that the respondents cannot be allowed to remain in office, and that a judicial factor must be appointed. It seems to me that

* “OPINION.—I am of opinion that the petitioners have not made out a case for the appointment of a judicial factor.

“In the first place, as regards the moveable estate of the late Mr Penny in this country, a judicial factor is unnecessary, because the whole estate has been thrown into Court in a multiplepounding, in which the petitioners will have an opportunity of establishing their claim.

“In regard to any moveable estate which may be in Bolivia, I think that the petitioners can themselves take such steps as may be necessary to protect their rights.

“The only other ground upon which the appointment of a judicial factor is asked is, that an action has been instituted in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire against the Messrs Collie, advocates in Aberdeen, who were the executors’ agents, for delivery of all papers in their hands connected with the executry. The action is said to be truly in the interests of Mr and Mrs Craik, and the petitioners say that it would be greatly to their prejudice if Mr and Mrs Craik were to be put in possession of documents and information which were obtained with the view of opposing Mrs Craik’s claim to any part of Mr Penny’s estate.

“Counsel for the majority of the executors, however, undertook that they would not attempt to proceed further in the action pending the process of multiplepounding, and I think that this is sufficient to safeguard the petitioners’ interests in regard to the documents in Messrs Collie’s possession.”

they have taken up a position which is adverse to the due execution of their office, and in reaching this conclusion I cannot leave out of view the very significant speech which Mr Watt addressed to us on behalf of the widow. I can quite understand that beneficiaries or next of kin should be unwilling to face the risk of a litigation, and should prefer to go out of Court in consideration of the payment of a round sum of money; but this agreement pledges the respondents qua executors to give all the help they can to the widow in enforcing her claims against the estate which they represent. They are to get £25,000, and in return they not only surrender all rights and claims which they may have as next of kin, but they bind themselves to procure and deliver all assignments, conveyances or transfers necessary to vest the widow's present husband in the personal estate of the deceased. It is in consequence of this undertaking that the present application is made, and Mr Watt is here to see that the respondents carry out their undertaking by opposing the application. In these circumstances I cannot but say that the petitioners have fair grounds for alarm. It is true that a large part of the estate is already in the hands of the Court in the action of multiplepoinding, but we were told yesterday, and it is not denied, that there is more to come in; and it is further significant that the agreement also provides that the first party—that is the widow's husband—may, if he thinks fit, request from the respondents any deed or deeds according to the law of Bolivia formally transferring and assigning to him all or any rights and claims which they may have in or can pretend to the foresaid whole estate by way of succession or otherwise. Accordingly the result is, that under this agreement, so far as concerns the estate, moveable as well as heritable, whether in Bolivia or in transit to this country, the widow is entitled to demand the whole of it. That is not a position in which executors ought to place themselves, or which the Court sanctions. It is the duty of executors to preserve the executry estate, but if these executors are permitted to remain in office, they are under obligation to diminish the amount of the estate entrusted to them. I am of opinion, therefore, that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and appoint a judicial factor.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. It is not a ground for displacing executors that they have personal interests conflicting with their duty as executors. The law supposes that they are able to reconcile their interest and their duty until the contrary is proved. But it is a different case where they have bound themselves to use their powers as executors for the benefit of one party, and against the estate which they represent. In such a case I think the Court has no alternative but to remove them from office and appoint a factor.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur. If I had any hesitation before about the propriety of removing these executors, it could not have been more effectually dispelled than by the appearance of the widow at the bar.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and granted the prayer of the petition.

Husband and Wife—Terce—Brieve—Appeal—Competency—Act 1503, cap. 77—Act 1681, cap. 10.—The heir-at-law is not entitled to obtain a sist of the proceedings under a brieve of service and cognition to terce on the ground that he is about to bring a declarator of the invalidity of the marriage, or on the ground that he is about to raise an action for declarator that the widow is barred from claiming terce by reason of having accepted a conventional provision out of heritage abroad belonging to the deceased.

Opinion (per Lord M'Laren) that under a brieve of terce it is competent for the inquest to consider whether the widow is barred from claiming terce by reason of having accepted a conventional provision.

Opinions that a brieve of service and cognition to terce may be removed to the Court of Session by appeal at any time before trial before the Sheriff.

Observations as to the competency of an appeal after trial and verdict.

On 15th October 1891 Senora Maria Galindo Craik, wife of William Penny Craik, and claiming to be the widow of the deceased Andrew Penny, of Park, Aberdeenshire, and Oruro, Bolivia, obtained a brieve from Chancery to be served and cognosced to a terce of the lands in the sheriffdom of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff, in which the deceased had died vest and seised.

1st DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine,
 and Banff.

On 20th October the Sheriff-substitute (Grierson) assigned 10th November as the diet for the trial of the brieve.

On 29th October James Penny, the heir-at-law, tendered a minute, in which "he maintained that the said Maria Galindo Penny or Craik was not entitled to be served as craved, in respect (1) that she was never lawfully married to the said Andrew Penny, and (2) that, even if she can establish that she was so married, she had accepted a conventional provision from the deceased, in the form of a conveyance of large estates in Bolivia, whereby she was debarred from claiming terce in terms of the Act 1681, cap. 10, and otherwise. He further stated that there is at present in dependence in the Court of Session an action of multiplepounding in which the petitioner and her husband, and also the respondent, are called as parties. In that action the question of the status of the petitioner, as claiming to be the widow of the said Andrew Penny, is directly raised. Further, the respondent is about to raise an action of declarator against the said Maria Galindo Penny to have it found and declared that she is not entitled to terce for the reasons above stated. He therefore craved the Sheriff to sist process in hoc statu until the said questions shall have been determined by the Court of Session."

The Sheriff-clerk refused to receive this minute on the ground that there was no process before the Court.

On 10th November the heir-at-law (as the minutes of procedure bore) moved the Court to sist in terms of his minute. The Sheriff-substitute refused "to sist in terms of said minute, and thereupon the agent for the objector tendered a note of appeal. The Sheriff-substitute having heard parties' prors. on the competency of the appeal at this stage, ordained the inquest to proceed."

The Sheriff-substitute then remitted the brieve and claim of service to the knowledge of an inquest, composed of advocates and solicitors in Aberdeen.

After a proof, the inquest unanimously served and cognosced the urger to a just and reasonable terce of the lands described in the claim, where-

No. 70. upon the urger took instruments and acts of Court, and the Sheriff-substitute interponed his authority in the premises, and decerned.

Dec. 18, 1891.
 Craik v.
 Penny.

The heir-at-law appealed to the Court of Session.

The pursuer objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—The appeal was incompetent at any stage. The policy of the law was to give the most summary dispatch in the trial of brieves of service. No exception could be taken to the brieve, the Act 1503, c. 77 being peremptory, and the function of the Sheriff purely ministerial, provided the conditions of the Act were complied with, as they had been here.¹ The reason for this dispatch was that service was necessary to vesting.² The proceedings in the service were regular.³ At all events, appeal was incompetent at this stage, after the Sheriff had interponed his authority to the verdict.⁴ This was a non-retourable brieve, and therefore pleadable, and this distinction was vital.⁵ Pleadability made the procedure equivalent to Sheriff Court procedure, and assuming pleadability this was an interlocutory judgment of the Sheriff, preliminary to kenning. If the Sheriff had erred in refusing to allow an appeal, reduction was the appropriate remedy.⁶ The Court had never in any reported case entertained an appeal after verdict; but even supposing that under the old form of procedure advocacy was competent at that stage, advocations were absolutely abolished by the Court of Session Act, 1868, and the right of appeal given in lieu did not cover an appeal in such circumstances. But assuming an appeal to be competent, the appeal ought to be dismissed. It was an appeal against the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute refusing to sist, and the Sheriff had rightly so refused.

Argued for the defender;—The appeal was competent. At common law it was competent to bring up a process from an inferior Court by way of advocacy at any stage, and it was clear that this was true of a brieve of terce.⁷ The question, therefore, was, how far had this right been restricted by statute? The Sheriff Court Act, 1853, sec. 24, and the Court of Session Act, 1868, could not be construed to apply to brieves of terce, which consequently remained under the old law, and could be brought up to the Court of Session at any stage, there being no other statutes on the subject. On the merits, the Sheriff ought to have sisted. A conventional provision was an absolute bar to a claim to terce, and further, the marriage was about to be called in question in an action of declarator.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The respondent in this appeal obtained a brieve from Chancery in order to be served and cognosced to a terce of the lands in the sheriffdom of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff, in which the late Andrew Penny, of Park, died vest and seised. On 20th October 1891 the Sheriff-substitute assigned the 10th November then ensuing as a diet for the trial of the brieve, and granted warrant to summon a jury to pass upon the inquest. On the appointed day the brieve was duly proclaimed, but at this stage, and therefore before the brieve and claim had been remitted to the knowledge of the inquest, No. 70.

 the present appellant craved the Court to sist the proceedings in terms of Dec. 18, 1891.
 a minute which he tendered. The Sheriff refused to sist in terms of the Craik v.
 minute. Penny.

This is the judgment of the Court below, of which the appellant complains under his present appeal; and unless we were satisfied that the Sheriff-substitute did wrong in refusing this sist, the appeal must fail, irrespective of the other difficulties it would have to surmount were we to think that the Sheriff did wrong. I am of opinion that the Sheriff did right.

In order to judge of the question which I have stated, it is necessary to advert to the terms of the minute just referred to as containing the grounds upon which a sist was craved. The leading proposition which the minute states as requiring judicial establishment in the Court of Session is that the lady was never lawfully married to the deceased. But the Statute 1503, c. 77, dealing with this very case, enacts that, if only the woman is holden and reputed as a lawful wife during the life of the deceased, she shall be terced and enjoy her terce until sentence is given (by the consistorial Court) that she was not his wife. For the Sheriff, therefore, on this ground, to have sisted, would have been flatly to refuse to obey the unequivocal order of an Act of Parliament.

The other matter stated in the minute as the subject of future litigation in the Court of Session, and as therefore a ground for a sist, was that the respondent had a conventional provision from the deceased. On this the Sheriff was not, as in the other matter, concluded by statute; but I do not think he would have been justified in sisting. It is plain that, in the view of the law, the widow's immediate access to her terce is not to be stopped, except by the most peremptory objections, and objections instantly verifiable. Here, all that was said was, that in an action not yet raised (although Mr Penny had been dead for six months), the objector was going to seek to establish that a conveyance of Bolivian lands had been granted, and that it fell under the Statute of 1681, c. 10. It would, I think, have been contrary to the spirit of the law of terce if, on a ground of this kind, the widow had been stopped from submitting her claim to the knowledge of the inquest then and there present, bearing in mind especially (1) that the kenning does not foreclose any such objection to the widow's right to terce being judicially established and made effectual, and (2) that the minuter (the present appellant), if earnest in this objection, had no need to resort to the discretion of the Sheriff, as he did by asking a sist, but might, at his own hand, have removed the case to the Court of Session by an appeal against the deliverance of the Sheriff of 20th October 1891, by which a diet was fixed for the trial of the brieve.

Accordingly, I think that this appeal should be dismissed, on the ground that the Sheriff did right in the matter of which the appellant makes complaint. I must add, however, that a verdict having been returned by the inquest, I have not been satisfied by the appellant that he could obtain redress under an appeal, as distinguished from an action of reduction, if our opinion were adverse to the decision of the Sheriff. I shall state in a word how I take the law to stand, so that the limits of my reservation may be understood. (1) The proceedings under a brieve of terce may be appealed to the Court of Session by note of appeal whenever prior to the Court of Session Act, 1868, they could have been advocated; and the Sheriff Court Acts do not apply to such proceedings to the effect of limiting the stages at which appeal may be taken. The former of these propositions rests on the 64th and 65th sections of the Court of Session Act, 1868; the latter upon the nature of the proceedings under a briefe. (2) While appeal is clearly competent for the purpose of removal at an early stage of the proceedings, there are precedents rendering it impossible to pronounce appeal after verdict to be incompetent, absolutely, and irrespective of the remedy which is sought. But there has been no case cited in which the Court of Session under an advocacy of a briefe has interfered with the verdict of an inquest, either to the effect of setting it aside or to the effect of suspending its legal consequences. So far as I am concerned, therefore, in proposing judgment now, I am not to be held as implying that, had we thought the Sheriff wrong in the matter in hand, we would have given to the appellant any remedy under his appeal.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—Two questions have been raised in this appeal, one as to the competency of the appeal, the other as to the right of the appellant to demand a sist of the proceedings in the Sheriff Court. I am inclined to think that the appellant is technically right on the question of the competency of the appeal, because it is, I think, impossible to look at the explanations given in Stair and Hume as to the history of our ancient civil and criminal procedure without coming to the conclusion that advocacy was a universal mode of bringing up proceedings in an inferior Court to this Court at any stage until the conclusion of the cause, which was definitely ascertained by the extracting of the process. The remedy afterwards was of a different nature. For obvious reasons the universal right of removing cases from an inferior to a superior Court was restricted by statute. The first step in that direction was taken in the Act of Regulations in the seventeenth century, and the tendency has since been to limit the unqualified right of appeal. But, so far as I can discover, these restrictions have never been made applicable to the ancient procedure by briefe, probably because it was very rarely resorted to. It appears to me, therefore, that if it had been desired to remove such a process to this Court for trial, that might have been done by advocacy before the order for trial was pronounced. What was proposed here, however, was not an appeal for the purpose of trial, for what the Sheriff was asked to do was to sist procedure in order that the same question might be tried in another different action. I have a difficulty in seeing that in any circumstances it is the duty of a Court having jurisdiction to try a question to decline to exercise that jurisdiction in order that the same question may be tried in a more elaborate and costly way in a higher Court. There are, it seems to me, just two ways in which a party who wishes the benefit of trial in a superior Court may proceed. He may either, in a case of this kind, advocate at once, or he may raise an action of declarator in this Court, and then apply for permission to appeal the process in the lower Court ob contingentiam. But in this case the appellant took neither of these courses. He simply asked the Sheriff to sist proceedings, not because there was an action in dependence in this Court raising the same question, but because he meant to bring such an action. I am clearly of opinion that the Sheriff was right in refusing the application.

It is said that the Sheriff practically deprived the appellant of the right to appeal by directing the Sheriff-clerk not to mark the appeal. I cannot help thinking that the appellant might, by a study of the provisions of the Act of 1868, have got over this difficulty, and that the case might have been brought here by appeal before the trial; but as we are of opinion that the only ground of appeal is one in which the appellant cannot succeed, I am unable to see that he has suffered any loss in consequence of his appeal not having been received at that stage. I agree that the Sheriff was bound in the circumstances to proceed to trial, and that he was not entitled to try the question of the validity of the marriage in order to determine the claim to terce, because that would have been quite contrary to the provisions of the statute.

As regards the other legal consideration urged in support of the application for a sist, namely, that the pursuer's claim of terce is excluded by her having accepted a conventional provision in lieu thereof, we have not heard any argument, and are not giving any opinion upon that point. But if it had been argued before the Sheriff that the pursuer's claim was barred because she had accepted a provision from her husband out of his heritable estate in Scotland, I should then have supposed it to have been his duty to consider the point, and I do not see why the Sheriff should not have considered the question whether the pursuer was barred from claiming terce by having accepted a provision out of land in Bolivia if it had been raised before him. There might have been some difficulty in obtaining evidence on the subject, but the question was capable of decision, and I do not doubt that the jury, who seem all to have been men of learning, being either advocates or solicitors in Aberdeen, would have paid respect to the Sheriff and have followed his directions. That course, however, was not taken, and it appears to me that the whole proceeding was conducted on the footing that the appellant meant to have the case reviewed in a different form of proceeding altogether.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree in the ground of judgment proposed by your Lordships, and also in the desire to reserve my opinion as to the competency of appealing instead of bringing an action of reduction after the verdict of the inquest has been given.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

Preparation—Fault—The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 55)—General Rules, No. 15.—No. 15 of the General Rules of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, enacts,—“Every road on which persons travel underground where the load is drawn by a horse or other animal, shall be provided at intervals of not more than fifty yards with sufficient manholes or with places of refuge, and every such place of refuge shall be of sufficient length, and at least three feet in width between the waggons running on the road and the side of such road.”

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that the mouths of the cross roads which led off the main level of a mine, and which were within fifty yards of each other, were to be considered as “manholes or places of refuge” in the sense of rule 15.

Opinions reserved by Lord Young, Lord Rutherford Clark, and Lord Trayner.

Clyde Coal Co.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

ON 19th October 1889 Bernard Hughes, miner, residing at Hamilton, was injured in a pit belonging to the Clyde Coal Company, Limited, and brought an action against the company for £300 damages, or for £273 under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The pursuer averred that he had been run over by a hutch in the main level, and that the defenders were in fault, as "there were no manholes or places of refuge in said main level. This was a distinct breach of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, rule 15"—(quoted in rubric).

The defenders denied fault, and maintained that there were sufficient manholes or places of refuge in terms of the Act and rules. There were the mouths of branch roads leading off the main level at various intervals from each other, but not exceeding forty-eight yards at the utmost. The mouths of these branch roads were open and free to a much greater extent than required by the Act and rules.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) In respect the accident was caused, or was at all events materially contributed to, by the pursuer's own fault, the defenders should be assoilzied.

The import of the proof fully appears infra in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

On 17th June 1890 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that upon the 19th October 1889 the pursuer was in the defenders' employment, and on that day was injured while in No. 3 pit by a horse and hutch which were being used in connection with the working of said pit: Finds, under reference to note, that the pursuer was mainly, if not wholly, responsible for the accident; therefore sustains the second plea in law stated for the defenders, and assoilzies them from the conclusions of the action."*

On appeal, the Sheriff (Berry), on 24th March, adhered to the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, stating in his note to his interlocutor that he considered the openings made by the cross roads were sufficient compliance with the statutory enactment regarding manholes or places of refuge.

The pursuer appealed.

The defenders were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In my opinion the judgment of the Sheriff is right.

The Mines Regulation Act requires that in all mines where the hutches are drawn by horses, in every road where this is done there shall be placed at intervals of not less than fifty yards manholes of a certain depth and breadth where the men can go for safety while hutches are passing.

The meaning of that provision is plainly this, that where there is a stretch of road on which the miners working at the face would not be able to escape from the hutches except by going a distance of more than fifty yards, then there shall be places of refuge provided in that stretch. In my opinion, however, the provision does not apply in places where no such stretch of road exists. That this is so appears to me all the more likely, because, while we were told by Lord McClure that in the whole district where this mine in which the accident happened is situated, no manholes at all exist in the workings, it does not appear that any complaint has been made of the want of them, or that the mining inspectors have ever required that they should be provided. I do not doubt that this is on the ground that the mode of working provided a refuge at the necessary intervals without manholes.

* In his note, the Sheriff-substitute said,—“It was contended that the defenders were in fault, because it was argued that there were no manholes in terms of the statute. It is proved that there were cross roads within the statutory limits laid down for manholes. Now, I regard cross roads as manholes. The greater includes the less, and a manhole is simply a means of escape. That universal practice seems to be only to place ‘manholes’ in the sense the provision desiderates when there are no cross roads within the statutory distance. . . .”

Hughes v.
Clyde Coal Co.

In the case before us the pursuer who had been leaving the mine with his companions had gone back for some article he had forgotten, and was again on his way to the bottom of the shaft, when in the space between two cross roads running into the road upon which he was walking, a space of forty-seven yards in length, he saw a horse dragging hutches coming towards him. At first he attempted to run forward and get to the cross road marked C upon the plan, but seeing he must fail to get there before the horse reached it, he turned to go back. He had, however, got so far forward that the horse seeing the light in his cap, and being excited by the shouting of the pursuer and of the driver of the hutches, got frightened and ran off. The pursuer ran in front of the horse so as to reach the cross road marked D, which was a place of refuge, but while he was running he also tried to stop the horse, with the result that he was thrown down, and the hutches ran over him, and he sustained the injuries of which he complains.

It was a very unfortunate accident, but I do not think that the pursuer has proved that any blame attaches to the owners of the mine for what has happened; and in my opinion that is sufficient for the decision of this case without any reference to the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act.

It was a pure accident, resulting from his mistaken view that he could reach C before the horse came up.

Had he reached C in time it would have been a refuge such as the Act contemplates, and as there was only a distance of forty-seven yards between the cross roads, there was no necessity for a manhole.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur in the result. My opinion rests on this entirely, that the accident to the pursuer has not been shewn to be attributable to any want of care on the part of the owners of the pit.

I desire to reserve my opinion as to whether the cross roads are to be considered as manholes within the meaning of the Coal Mines Regulation Act.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I also think we ought to abstain from deciding any general question. I think it is not proved that the accident happened from want of manholes.

LORD TRAYNER.—It appears to me that this accident cannot be attributed to any fault on the part of the defenders.

I also think that we should not decide any general question as to what may constitute a manhole within the meaning of the Act.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact in terms of the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed against."

M'Laurin v.
North British
Railway Co.

Reparation—Amount of damages—Excess of damages.—The Court will be slow to set aside the verdict of a jury in an action for damages for personal injury on the ground of excess of damages, if it cannot be shewn that the jury took into account elements which they were not entitled to take into account.

Observations as to the elements which a jury might legitimately take into account in estimating the amount of damages for personal injury in an action in which it was judicially admitted that the pursuer had suffered no "specific loss to his business in consequence of the injury sustained by him."

A merchant and manufacturer, forty-nine years of age, raised an action of damages against a railway company to recover damages for injuries received by him in a railway collision. His nose was crushed, and although by surgical appliances it was to a certain extent restored, he entirely lost his sense of smell, and partly also his sense of taste. He was confined to bed for some weeks and suffered great pain. The collision occurred in August, and he did not begin to attend business again till November; from November till March he could only attend about half the usual business hours, and for some months thereafter was unable to do full work. The loss of his sense of smell interfered with his business capacity so far as it disabled him from testing yarns, in which he traded, by their smell. He also suffered from nervous shock. He had not entirely recovered from the effects of this shock at the date of the trial, but the medical men, called for him as witnesses, deponed that in all probability he would entirely recover from this. His outlay for medical attendance and treatment was £213. It was admitted by minute that he had not suffered any specific loss to his business. The jury awarded him a sum of £1800. In an application for a new trial on the ground that this was an excessive amount, the Court refused to disturb the verdict.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Wellwood.

JAMES COCKBURN M'LAURIN, a partner of the firms of M'Laurin Brothers, yarn and grey cloth merchants, Glasgow, and of A. Y. M'Laurin & Company, muslin manufacturers there, was injured in a railway collision on the North British Railway on 28th August 1890. He raised an action to recover damages in respect of his injuries. The company did not dispute liability, and the only question was as to the amount of damages. The pursuer laid these at £5000.

A minute was lodged by the pursuer in which he stated that "he did not propose at the trial of the cause to prove that the pursuer had suffered any specific loss to his business in consequence of the injury sustained by him in the collision."

The case was tried on 12th November 1891 before Lord Wellwood and a jury. The main facts proved were these: The pursuer was forty-nine years of age, and up to the date of the accident took an active part in his business, in which, however, he had partners. He lived with his wife and family in a villa, which he had bought for £2800, near Glasgow, and had two servants. The most noticeable effects of his accident were bruise on his forehead, and a compound fracture of the bones of his nose; his nose was described as being smashed to a pulp. For some hours after the accident he was unconscious, and for several days he lay in a very critical condition, being excited by the slightest noise, such as the turning of the door handle or footsteps on the gravel outside the house. With view to the restoration of his nose he was obliged to lie for three weeks on his back with a lead case on his nose. For a great part of this time the blood from his nose passed into his stomach, causing him to vomit blood in considerable quantities. He suffered great discomfort, and was very sleepless. After recovering to a certain extent he went first to Shandon and then to Crieff. While there he still suffered from sleeplessness, pains in the forehead, and twitching in the limbs. His expenses in the course of this holiday, along with doctors' fees, amounted to £213, 9s. His nose was in the end to a certain extent set up again; it was described, however, as being a very different nose from what it had originally been, both in shape and symmetry. It had formerly been a Roman nose; the ridge of it was now depressed and it was not straight.

M'Laurin v.
North British
Railway Co.

The pursuer returned to business in the end of November. From that time till the end of March he only went for half-days to the office, and had not, up to the time of the trial, resumed full work. He still complained of a "crushed" feeling in his head, and of twitchings in his arms, e.g., when he held up a newspaper to read it. His taste for society was gone, and he and those connected with him in business remarked that in the conduct of his business he was a changed man, no longer so well informed, keen, and energetic in business affairs as he had formerly been. The doctors examined on his behalf deponed that there was no damage to the nerve-centres, and that the symptoms spoken to would, they expected, disappear altogether. He had, however, lost all sense of smell, and in part his sense of taste, the latter to such an extent that he could not tell beef from mutton; the former so that he was unable on two occasions to detect serious escapes of gas that had occurred in his house, once from a gas stove in his bedroom, and once from a gas-cock in the lavatory. His sense of smell had been of practical use to him in his business, as by it he could, before his accident, detect mildew in yarns. This power he had now lost.

A remarkable feature in the trial was that the defenders examined no witnesses.

The jury unanimously found for the pursuer, assessing the damages at £1800.

The defenders moved for a rule, which was granted. In support of the rule they founded on the absence of all evidence of pecuniary loss, and maintained that for personal suffering and disfigurement, the only elements of damage left, the sum of £1800 was egregiously excessive.

The pursuer in shewing cause pointed out that the time which had elapsed between the date of the accident and the trial—fifteen months—was sufficient to allow it to be seen what the permanent results upon the man were. They were serious, even if the doctors' hope of complete recovery were realised. There had been great pain and permanent disfigurement, with permanent incapacity to some extent. The rule laid down by Lord M'Laren in Young v. The Glasgow Tramway Company,¹ for assessment of damage, was the rule to be applied here, viz., that the jury must be accepted as the best judges on the matter of damages, unless they had taken some illegitimate considerations into view, or left some legitimate considerations out of view.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The subject-matter of this trial is certainly singular, and perhaps unique, and I am not surprised that there prevails at the bar considerable difference as to the manner in which the different elements which affect the amount of damages should be appraised. I shall notice some of these elements, to see how far it is true, as the defenders have pressed upon us, that the jury have gone so egregiously wrong in the estimate which they have made as to call for our interference.

Now, as regards a sum of £213 for medical attendance and treatment, &c., we are upon solid ground. No one doubts that the pursuer is entitled to recover that sum. We have, therefore, to deal with the residue only of the £1800 which the jury have awarded.

M'Laurin v.
North British
Railway Co.

It is certain that the pursuer suffered a shocking injury, and he must have endured deplorable pain. His nose was smashed to pulp, although it has, by artificial surgical means, been reinstated and reformed so as to minimise, as far as may be, the injury done to the features. But while he was undergoing the necessary treatment for this artificial restoration of his nose, he lay for weeks in a constrained position, which in itself must have been a serious infliction, in addition to the pain and anxiety necessarily involved.

Then, when he went back to business, he was found wanting in the nerve, the energy, the power of concentration, and the activity, which had before enabled him to take a successful part in the conduct of his affairs. Various expedients were tried to remedy this; he went on a holiday to begin with, then from November to March he only attended at his office for half the business day, after that he stayed longer at work, but even down to the end of July—nearly a year after the accident—he was not doing a full day's work.

What was his state after this period of rest and partial convalescence? His activity was impaired, his memory was blunted, and his general alertness perceptibly diminished. It is true that the medical men examined on his behalf believe that these symptoms will yield to treatment, and that there is no permanent injury done to the nerve-centres. That statement we are quite entitled to take as the judgment of experts on the future, but we must not convert prediction into fact.

We come next to a very definite and specific injury. While the pursuer's nose has been restored, not indeed to a condition of identity, but to a respectable appearance, his sense of smell is gone, and there is a corresponding loss of sense of flavour. Now, this deprivation of the sense of smell is not only total but it is permanent; and this presented a serious and somewhat singular problem for the jury. It so happens that in this man's own history there has already been striking evidence of what is implied in the loss of all sense of smell. It seems that, in consequence of this loss, he was, on an occasion to which members of his family speak, unable to detect an escape of gas which had taken place, and was thereby exposed to some peril. That is a fact by which I can quite understand that the jury might be impressed, and by which I think, they might quite properly be set a-thinking. It demonstrates that this loss of smell is not only a loss of all the pleasures connected with that sense, but of a certain safeguard against familiar dangers. It has also been shewn that this loss of the sense of smell would disable him from detecting certain defects in the yarns in which he dealt, and would thus directly incapacitate him to that extent for business.

It has been admitted by the pursuer that he did not, as a consequence of his accident, suffer any "specific" loss in his business, but the question is quite open as to the conditions of comfort, ease, and success which will attend him either in the trade in which he is at present engaged, or in any other trade which he may hereafter find it necessary or convenient to take up. I make this observation, because it would be a mistake to say either that the departure by the pursuer from any claim for loss of business eliminates the consideration of his physical and mental condition as a business man, or that the loss of the sense of smell is a thing to be regarded apart altogether from this gentleman's position as a man of business. It is not so. It is quite legitimate to consider that loss as affecting his aptitude and capacity in that character, and the same observation applies to the effects of the accident on his nerves and memory.

I find therefore that there are in this case a number of elements of damage, each of them of considerable flexibility, so as to admit of different estimates in different minds when it becomes necessary to put a pecuniary value upon them. On the other hand, it is not said by the Dean of Faculty for the defenders that any element has been taken into account which was not a legitimate element for consideration.

No. 72.

M'Laurin v.
North British
Railway Co.

Can we then, adopting the criterion laid down in the case of Young (10 R. 242), say that the jury have gone so egregiously wrong that it is necessary for us to interfere with their estimate?

After the argument which we have heard, I would probably not myself, if it had rested with me, have given so much as £1800, but I would certainly have given a good deal more than £1000. The sum of expenses the pursuer must have—that is his ex debito justitiæ.

Then he has totally lost his sense of smell, and to some extent, at least, his sense of flavour, involving not only a loss of all pleasure connected with it, but also of a certain safeguard, a certain diminution of business aptitude.

In the next place, I take the condition of the man in nerve and memory. He is a damaged man. I take him as having a prospect—a good prospect—of complete recovery, but I do not take that as an ascertained certainty. I must add, taking a broad and rough view of the matter, that I do not regard as anything but a very serious matter that a man has had his nose smashed, with a certain change of appearance. That is a matter on which he may very naturally be sensitive, and it is a matter for substantial reparation. In addition to all this there is the pain and anxiety inseparable from such injury.

The jury heard the whole case, and saw the moderation with which it was conducted on both sides. I cannot say that they have committed any error, and if my own estimate of the amount of damages would have been somewhat less than theirs, the difference between us would not have been so large as to warrant me in moving your Lordships to grant a new trial.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—The ground on which a new trial is here claimed is excess of damages. "Excess of damages" is, if I recollect aright, the expression used in the statute by which jury trial was introduced into Scotland. Simple excess of damages would then entitle the Court to interfere. But the statute has been interpreted to mean that relief will only be given on grounds analogous to those on which we give relief in other cases, viz., that the sum awarded is against the weight of the evidence, and is wholly disproportionate to the circumstances. That is the footing on which the case has been argued to us.

If I were considering this case as a jurymen, I should probably hold that a sum considerably less than £1800 was sufficient compensation for the serious injuries which were proved. I should have inclined to award £1000, but always under the reservation, that I should not consider any sum within a few hundred pounds of that sum as unfair. A somewhat higher sum is indicated in your Lordship's opinion, and this difference of opinion among the Judges illustrates the difficulty of estimating damages for personal injury, and induces caution in interfering with the verdicts of juries where injury is proved. Here there are two elements which in every such case have to be taken into consideration, (first) the pain and suffering which the pursuer endured, and (secondly)

No. 72.

M'Laurin v.
North British

the cost of the necessary medical treatment and change of air during convalescence.

Then there are also in this case the elements of personal disfigurement, the loss of the use of one of the senses, and the possibility of loss in business in the future.

Personal disfigurement is a different thing from broken bones or any other injury which can be completely repaired. The sufferer has the prospect of going through life disfigured, a thing that will continue to be a source of pain and annoyance to himself and of distress to his friends.

The terms of the minute, to which reference has been made, would not prevent the jury from taking into account the fact that this man is permanently disabled, and can only maintain his business in the same condition as before by making larger use of the exertions of his partners, a circumstance which may lead to eventually diminished income. Taking account of all these elements, I am unable to say that the verdict is one which should be set aside, although my personal opinion is that a smaller sum would be sufficient.

LORD KINNEAR.—The only rule or principle of law I know of for estimating damages in such cases is that it shall be the estimate which twelve reasonable men in a jury box, after instruction by the Judge, arrive at. Excess of damages can only mean that the sum awarded is more than what reasonable men would have given after taking a full view of the whole matter, and having been instructed by the Judge. We cannot set aside a verdict unless we think that no reasonable man would have awarded so much. I cannot possibly say that here.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I agree with Lord M'Laren that £1000 would have been sufficient here. But the pursuer was entitled to a substantial sum, and the question is whether £1800 is excessive. After hearing the opinions which your Lordships have delivered, I am not prepared to dissent from the views which have been expressed, although I think that a much smaller sum would have been sufficient in a case in which it is admitted that the pursuer has suffered no pecuniary loss in his business.

THE COURT discharged the rule of consent, applied the verdict, and decreed for £1800.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Malice.—In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that he was a joiner in the employment of C. M. & Co., shipwrights; that on a certain day he and three other workmen were sent by the firm to execute a piece of work on board a vessel lying in the docks at Glasgow belonging to the defenders; that some days after the said workmen had left the vessel the defenders sent an account to C. M. & Co.,—"To six bottles of whisky, at 3s. 6d. per bottle, abstracted by your men while putting up, &c., on board" the vessel, and subsequently wrote this letter to C. M. & Co.,—"In reply to yours of yesterday's date, we know that when your men went down the hold to put up the powder bulkhead the whisky cases were intact, but after they left we found, on examination, that a case had been tampered with and six bottles of whisky abstracted. We could come to no other conclusion but that your men had taken it." The pursuer averred that the account and letter "falsely, maliciously, calumniously, and without probable cause," represented the pursuer as being dishonest, and as having stolen six bottles of whisky. There was no other averment of malice.

Held (dub. Lord Rutherford Clark) that the pursuer's averments shewed that the defenders were privileged in making the statements complained of, and that as the pursuer had failed to set forth facts from which malice could be inferred, the action was not relevant.

HECTOR M'FADYEN, joiner, Glasgow, raised an action in the Sheriff Court, at Paisley, against James Spencer & Company, owners of the ship "Frith of Forth," for damages for alleged slander.

The pursuer averred that he was a journeyman in the employment of Campbell, M'Donald, & Company, shipwrights and joiners, Glasgow, that on 11th September 1891 he and three other workmen were sent by the firm to erect a powder bulkhead in the vessel "Frith of Forth," lying in Queen's Dock, Glasgow, which was to sail next day, that he and the other three workmen were the only workmen of the firm employed on the vessel, and that they completed their work and left the vessel about seven o'clock on the evening of the 11th.

The pursuer further averred,—“On 14th September 1891 the defenders rendered to the said Campbell, M'Donald, & Company an account in the following terms:—‘Messrs Campbell, M'Donald, & Co. to James Spencer & Co.,—316 Paisley Road, Glasgow.—To six bottles whisky, at 3s. 6d. per bottle, abstracted by your men while putting up the powder bulkhead on board “Frith of Forth,” £1, 1s.—Glasgow, 14 Sep. 1891.’”

“On 15th September 1891 the defenders wrote a letter to the said Campbell, M'Donald, & Company in the following terms, viz.:—‘Glasgow, 15th Sept. 1891.—Messrs Campbell, M'Donald, & Coy., Crookston Street.—Dear Sirs,—In reply to yours of yesterday's date, we know that when your men went down the hold to put up the powder bulkhead the whisky cases were intact, but after they left we found, on examination, that a case had been tampered with, and six bottles of whisky abstracted. We could come to no other conclusion but that your men had taken it.—JAMES SPENCER & Co.’”

The pursuer further averred;—“While the said vessel “Frith of Forth” was lying in said Queen's Docks being loaded, there were numerous labourers and workmen continually going back and forward between her and the quay up to the time she sailed.”

“The account and letter quoted were of and concerning, inter alia, the pursuer, who was one of the said Campbell, M'Donald, & Co.'s men therein referred to, and wickedly, falsely, maliciously, calumniously, and without probable cause, represented the pursuer as being dishonest, and as having stolen six bottles of whisky.”

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The account and letter libelled being of and concerning the pursuer, and having been written by defenders, and being false and slanderous, the pursuer is entitled to reparation.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to warrant the prayer of the petition. (2) The defenders having probable cause for sending the account and letter founded on, and these communications being privileged, decree of absolutor should be granted. (3) The defenders not having slandered the pursuer, and having expressly disclaimed all imputations against the pursuer's character, they should be assoilzied.

No. 73.

M'Fadyen v.
Spencer & Co.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial, and proposed the following issue:—"It being admitted that, on or about Friday, 11th September 1891, the pursuer was a journeyman joiner in the employment of Campbell, M'Donald, & Co., shipwrights and joiners, 53 Crookston Street, Glasgow, and was engaged in putting up a powder bulkhead on board the vessel 'Frith of Forth,' then lying in Queen's Dock, Glasgow; that, on or about 14th September 1891, the defenders rendered to the said Campbell, M'Donald, & Co. the account contained in schedule I. annexed hereto; and on 15th September 1891 addressed to the said Campbell, M'Donald, & Company the letter contained in schedule II. hereto annexed, both of which documents were duly received by the said Campbell, M'Donald, & Co. Whether the said account and letter are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represent him as being dishonest, and as having stolen six bottles of whisky, to his loss, injury, and damage?"

Argued for the defenders;—The action was irrelevant. The pursuer's statement shewed that the defenders, in sending the account to Campbell, M'Donald, & Co., and in giving the explanation in the letter complained of, were privileged.¹ The pursuer must if he wished an issue in such a case specify some facts and circumstances pointing to malice.² This the pursuer had not done. It would be necessary for him to state that the defenders knew something about him, and apart from their own duty and interest intended to injure him.

Argued for the pursuer;—If there was slander malice was presumed. The account stated that he and the other pursuers had abstracted whisky. The letter reiterated that. That was a slander. If the defenders thought someone had stolen whisky of which they had charge they certainly had a privilege in saying so. But that privilege was in saying so to the procurator-fiscal for a public purpose. They had no privilege to accuse people of theft to a private individual for the purpose of making a money claim.³ It was worse rather than better that they went with the slander to the pursuer's master. There was no relation between the defenders and Campbell, M'Donald, & Company, which gave the former any privilege. It was all the worse if the defenders knew nothing of the pursuer, yet called him a thief.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts as disclosed upon record by the pursuer, and in respect of which he asks an issue, are that the pursuer and certain brother workmen were employed in the hold of the ship "Frith of Forth" on a certain occasion, that after they left it the defenders sent an account to the pursuer's employers for whisky alleged to have been "abstracted by your men," and that they (the defenders) followed that up by a letter saying that "we know that when your men went down into the hold to put up the powder bulkhead the whisky cases were intact, but after they left we found on examination that a case had been tampered with, and six bottles of whisky abstracted. We could come to no other conclusion but that your men had taken it."

* "NOTE.—Even if it were true that whisky was abstracted from the hold of the 'Frith of Forth,' the defenders were beyond their legal right in demanding from the pursuer's employer payment of it. The delict of the servant does not constitute a ground of claim against the master. The defenders might properly have made inquiries at the master to ascertain what workmen had been employed at the vessel; they might even as the result of such inquiries, have lodged a criminal complaint against the pursuer, and such action on their part would have been privileged. They chose, however, to render a baseless claim to the pursuer's master, adding the statement complained of. The Sheriff-substitute cannot see that they were privileged to do so. . . ."

M'Fadyen v.
Spencer & Co.

These being the material averments of the pursuer, I think we have before us a very peculiar case. It is plain that it cannot be said that the defenders were making an accusation of theft against any individual workman. It is not suggested that they knew who were the men employed by Campbell, M'Donald, & Company, nor even how many of them there might be. The statement complained of is just this, that on examining the cases after the workmen of that firm had left the ship they found that six bottles of whisky were missing, and that they think that the employers of these men ought to pay the value of that whisky since the only conclusion they could come to on the facts is that these men took it. I think that the statement the defenders made was legitimate, in the absence of any averment of circumstances tending to shew that it was maliciously made. The ordinary presumption from the use of words of a slanderous or calumnious nature is not applicable. The defenders had in the circumstances I think a privilege in making such a statement to the pursuer's employers. The next question, therefore, is whether the pursuer has stated any such circumstances as to lead, if they were proved, to the inference that there was malice, and which therefore entitle the pursuer to an issue for trial upon the footing that the burden is laid upon him to prove that the statements were made maliciously. I find no such averment on record. It is only said that by the account and letter the defenders "maliciously, falsely, calumniously, and without probable cause represented the pursuer as being dishonest and as having stolen six bottles of whisky." But this averment is no more than the ordinary statement in any case of slander. It does not supply us with any fact which if established would infer special malice. Indeed it is difficult to see how such facts could be averred.

My opinion is that the account and letter do not contain allegations against any particular person. I do not gather that such allegation is made from the mere statement that the whisky is missing, and that "your men" must have taken it. I can understand that there may be circumstances in which a statement that an article is missing and must have been taken by theft would amount to a charge against a particular individual or more than one individual. But I do not think that we have such a case here. All that is said is, the whisky was there, you had workmen there, and as it disappeared when they were there we call on you to pay for it. That may or may not be a claim which they could enforce. I should doubt their right to maintain it. But as regards the statements themselves I see nothing of the nature of a charge of theft against any individual or individuals. I am of opinion that the action should be dismissed as irrelevant.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. Especially do I concur in the observations which your Lordship last made. The defenders made a charge against the pursuer's master for whisky abstracted while their men were putting up a bulkhead. I think they would have justified that by proving that it did disappear while their men were there, so that some of them—even one it might be—must have taken it. It was not necessary in order to justify what they said to shew that all were engaged in taking it, or who they were who were so engaged. It would have been enough to shew that it disappeared when the men were there, and must have been made to disappear by all of them, or some or one of them. In the letter which they wrote with regard to the claim contained in the account, that is the justification which they give. It is not a charge against any individual workman. But the case having been laid before legal advisers it occurred to them that each of the workmen who were putting up the bulkhead has a separate action in respect of that statement if he only aver and offer to prove that he was engaged at the work of putting up the bulkhead. But that very matter—whether he was so employed or not—might be the subject of controversy at the trial.

It is impossible to say that the defenders had any feeling, good or bad, as to all or any of the men employed by Campbell, M'Donald, & Company. They simply made a claim against them for the whisky, as they would have done if there had been a hundred men there, and not four, and the missing whisky had amounted to twenty gallons and not one. If there had been a hundred men I suppose we would have had a hundred actions, every one of the hundred men saying that he was engaged there, and therefore has a title to sue because he was called a thief. That seems very extravagant, but I do not pursue it. I refer to my opinion in Shaw v. Morgan, which was cited to us, in which I stated the law as to privilege as I understand it, and having regard to the views there stated I think the occasion of this alleged slander shews a case of privilege which repels the presumption of malice. If so, malice must be averred, and I think the case is not one in which the mere use of the term malice will suffice. It is one in which some facts must be averred which will prima facie justify the use of the term malice. If the facts are only that men are at work in my house, and something is afterwards amissing, and I complain of that to the tradesman who sent them, I think it is ridiculous to say that there exists a presumption of malice against me. Nor is it enough to say that I made my complaint maliciously. The record must state some particular facts which are to be proved which will lead to the inference that there was malice if they are established. There being no such facts averred, I think the action is irrelevant.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I have had doubt on this case. Nor are my doubts, I must say, removed. But as I am alone in these doubts as to the decision your Lordships propose, my opinion is of no importance, and I do not dissent.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think that the circumstances of this case, as the pursuer himself states them, repel the presumption of malice. I also agree that it is a case in which it is not enough for the pursuer merely to say that the slander alleged was made maliciously. He must specify the facts from which the alleged malice is to be presumed, the facts which justify the use of the term malice. As there is no such specification, I think the action is irrelevant.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Find that the pursuer has not averred facts relevant to support the conclusions of the action; therefore dismiss the action."

THE SCOTTISH ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders
 (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Balfour—Jameson—Crole.

 Clidero v.
 Scottish Accident Insurance
 Co., Limited.

Insurance—Life insurance—Insurance against accident—Bodily injury caused by "violent, accidental, external, and visible means."—In an action on an accident insurance policy under which the insurance company were liable in the event of the death of the insured through "bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means," it was proved that the insured had complained of feeling a pain as of something having "given way inside," when he was in the act of pulling on his stockings. He died about thirty-six hours afterwards. The medical men who had attended him examined his body post-mortem, and pronounced that the proximate cause of death was failure of the heart's action through pressure on the heart caused by distension of the colon, which had become obstructed. There was no evidence of disease in any of the organs, and the medical men who had made the examination could give no reason why the colon had become obstructed on the morning in question, except that the deceased, who was a stout man, must have used some extra force when in the act of stooping down to draw on the stocking, and so twisted the colon out of position; but the deceased in his account of what took place, as deposed to by those who heard him, did not mention that he had made any unusual movement when pulling on his stocking.

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) assolzie'd the defenders, holding that it had not been proved that the death was due to bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means.

WILLIAM CLIDERO, currier, Northallerton, was insured with the Scottish Accident Insurance Company, Limited, under a policy which provided that the company should be liable, "if at any time . . . during the continuance of this policy, the insured has sustained any bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means, and the direct effect of which injury has either caused the death or permanent total disablement (as defined on the back hereof) of the insured." The policy also provided that it should not cover the case of death by suicide, nor the case of death "arising from natural disease or weakness, or exhaustion consequent upon disease, or any surgical operation rendered necessary thereby, or arising from such disease, weakness, exhaustion, or surgical operation, although accelerated by accident."

Clidero died on 12th October 1890.

On 18th March 1891 his widow and son, as his executors, brought an action against the insurance company for payment of the sum in the policy. They averred;—(Cond. 4) "On 11th October 1890 the insured, who was a corpulent man, met with an accident while in the act of pulling on one of his stockings. In the act of stooping he accidentally pressed with violence on the lower abdomen, and the strain thus caused resulted in a portion of the bowel being suddenly displaced and becoming twisted. Pain within the abdomen was felt by the deceased at the time, and distention of the abdomen immediately set in; and notwithstanding the remedies and measures applied for his relief, he died in the course of the following day. His death was due to internal injuries proceeding from a visible external cause—the violent pressure on the lower abdomen—and unintentionally and accidentally inflicted."

The defenders denied that the death of the insured was the result of an accident within the meaning of the policy, and averred that the deceased had died from natural disease of the heart and bowels.

The pursuers pleaded;—The death of the deceased being due to bodily injury directly caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means,

No. 74. within the meaning of the aforementioned policy of insurance, the pursuers, as his executors and representatives, are entitled to decree for the sum sued for, with expenses.

Clidero v.
Scottish Accident Insurance
Co., Limited.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The death of the insured having arisen from natural disease or weakness, or exhaustion consequent upon disease (whether accelerated by accident or not), and not by violent, accidental, external, and visible means, the defenders ought to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

A proof was allowed.

Dr Walton, the medical attendant of the deceased, deponed,—“On Saturday, 11th October, I was sent for to see the deceased. I do not remember the exact hour, but it was sometime in the afternoon. He then told me that he felt intense pain in the abdomen, and that he was very uncomfortable from distention. He told me that in the act of pulling on one of his stockings he felt something give way inside, and that afterwards he had a very acute pain, which passed off and left a dull aching sensation. According to his account he had just got out of bed and was in the act of pulling on his stocking when the accident occurred. I examined him, and found that there was some obstruction of the intestines. I gave him a mixture to take, and visited him again the same evening. I saw him again four or five times on Sunday, 12th October. I was with him for a considerable time on the Sunday. I was there first before eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and afterwards at three, five, eight, and eleven o'clock. On the occasion of my visit at eleven o'clock in the forenoon I was accompanied by Dr Tweedie, and I found that the distention had considerably increased, and the body was cyanosed or blue. Later on in the day I examined the patient's heart, and noticed that the heart-beat was slightly displaced upwards. The apex of the heart-beat was displaced fully an inch above the nipple, whereas it should be an inch and a-quarter below the nipple. I saw the patient again at eleven o'clock at night, when I was again accompanied by Dr Tweedie. Dr Bartrum and Dr Wells were also there on that occasion. About eight o'clock at night we had a conference and decided to open the patient's abdomen, if we could obtain his consent. We returned at eleven o'clock for the purpose of performing that operation. The arrangements were all complete for the operation, the patient had been laid upon the table, and we were just about to begin, when he suddenly expired.” In cross-examination Dr Walton further deponed,—“I did not ask Mr Clidero how he was sitting when he was pulling on his stocking. I did not think that of importance as shewing how the injury had been caused. (Q.) Did he not tell you where he had been sitting, or the motion he made to pull on his stocking, or whether it was in any way usual or unusual? (A.) I am not certain; I believe he told me that he was sitting on the bed.

This evidence was substantially corroborated by Drs Tweedie and Bartrum, and, as regarded Clidero's own account of what occurred, by Mr Clidero and John Clidero, the son. None of these witnesses deponed to Clidero having stated that anything external of a violent or accidental character took place when he was in the act of pulling on his stocking.

After Clidero's death a post-mortem examination was held, which shewed that the colon had fallen out of its place, and, becoming folded had been obstructed, and this obstruction produced very great distension, which, by pressure on the heart, ultimately stopped the action of the heart, and so caused death.

Dr Walton gave this further evidence,—“(Q.) Were the appearances which you saw consistent with the man's own account of what had happened? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Supposing the deceased was engaged, as it said, in the act of stooping, how do you account for the result which occurred? (A.) I account for it in this way, that the ribs and liver being fixed points, any stooping over would thrust down the moveable part of the bowel, and in restoring himself to a straight position, the bowel, instead of going back into its recess, had slipped in front of the liver, or the liver had slipped behind the bowel. That condition of matters might be produced by disease. We made a careful examination to see if there was any appearance of disease, so far as the abdominal organs were concerned, and we found none. I did not know at the time that the deceased was insured. There being no appearance of disease, the condition which I observed could not have been produced by anything but force." In cross-examination,—“(Q.) How do you account for the ordinary act of pulling on his stocking having caused a displacement of the colon on this occasion, and never having done it before? (A.) He had not come under the same conditions before. (Q.) Do you mean that the bowel had not been in the same condition before? (A.) It may not have been exactly in the same position, and there may not have been the same force.”

Dr Tweedie deponed,—“(Q.) How, in your opinion, did the occurrence take place? (A.) Looking to what the deceased told me as to his being stooping at the time, I think the force conveyed through the ribs and the liver would be quite sufficient in a stout man to press the transverse part of the colon downwards, and when the man was readjusting himself the free edge of the liver had slipped behind instead of in front of it. . . . A sudden displacement of this kind could only be due to external force. The force resulting from the sudden act of stooping would be enough, in my opinion, to cause such a displacement, more particularly with a stout man, such as the deceased was.” In cross-examination,—“(Q.) How do you account for the simple act of stooping to put on a stocking producing this displacement in a healthy subject? (A.) I suppose a very stout man would have to use more force to reach his foot than a thin man, and the extra amount of force would be sufficient to cause some displacement in the bowel. (Q.) I suppose Mr Clidero had put on his stockings all his life; how do you account for its happening in this way? (A.) I cannot account for its happening at the particular moment.”

The defenders adduced several doctors as experts, who deponed that in their opinion Clidero must have died of disease—as to the precise disease these witnesses were not at one.

On 1st July 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

* “OPINION.—I cannot say that I have much doubt as to what my judgment in this case should be. I am of opinion that it is sufficiently proved that the deceased did not die of disease in any proper sense of that term, but that on the contrary he died of an accident which may quite reasonably be described as ‘violent, external, and visible.’ Speaking generally, I prefer the real evidence afforded by the facts as described by the deceased himself, by his family, and by the medical men who attended him—I prefer that real evidence—to the speculations and theories of the medical witnesses for the defenders. And further, if I have to choose between the medical opinions on the one side and those on the other, I confess that I prefer the testimony of the doctors who attended the deceased, who heard him describe what occurred, and who afterwards made the post-mortem of his body, to the testimony of the gentlemen, however eminent, who were to-day adduced for the defenders, and who, without the least disrespect to them, had not, and could not have, the same opportunities for forming a judgment as the three gentlemen examined for the pursuer. Perhaps, when I say that, I say enough. But I may add just one or

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuers had failed to prove that Mr Clidero had died from accident; the true cause of his death was natural disease. At all events, the bodily injury, if there was such an injury, had not been caused by some “violent, accidental, external, and visible means.” All these qualities must concur; but in the first place there was no evidence whatever of violence. The Lord Ordinary had based his judgment on the hypothesis of there having been some wrench or strain, but this was pure hypothesis, which received no support from the evidence. Then the means must be “accidental.” It was, perhaps, difficult to define “accidental” in the abstract, but for the purposes of the present policy its meaning was sufficiently plain. It meant something which could not be anticipated in the ordinary course of things, and what that was in the present case the pursuers had failed two observations which I think must have occurred to everyone who has listened to the evidence.

“In the first place, I think it does not admit of doubt that the proximate cause of this gentleman's death was not heart disease, or diarrhœa, or flatulence, or any similar form of disease, but was simply and solely an obstruction of his bowels, resulting in extreme distension, and thereby causing pressure upon the heart and lungs sufficient to produce a stoppage of the heart's action. There is no doubt that that was the proximate cause of death, and being so, the question is what was the cause of this obstruction of the bowels which operated in the way I have described. Now, what we know about that obstruction is this—we know for certain that it was not a thing which came on gradually, but that it came on suddenly, and also contemporaneously, with a certain strain or wrench or untoward movement of his body, which deceased somehow produced in pulling on his stockings on the morning in question, and which he described at the time as making him feel that something had given way in his inside. We do not know exactly how he stood or sat on the occasion in question, whether he made some slip, or how exactly the thing happened. All we know is that something unusual occurred, sufficient to produce the unusual result of such a sensation suddenly supervening in the course of that ordinary operation. That being so, the next fact is, that a displacement of the intestines involving an obstruction of the bowels immediately supervened, and the question really is, whether this displacement can be reasonably attributed to any other cause than the occurrence by which it was immediately preceded. The doctors examined for the pursuer have no doubt on that subject. They say that what happened was, in their opinion, a sufficient cause—a cause amply sufficient to explain the symptoms and appearances which they observed. And they say further, that neither the post-mortem examination nor the deceased's previous symptoms disclosed or suggested any other cause sufficient, in their opinion, to account for death. Now, that I confess seems to me rather a formidable case to controvert. What is said on the other side? I think it comes pretty much to this, that the suggested cause of death is not one that is probable, that it is one which has not hitherto come within the experience of the medical profession. Well, I suppose everything of the kind must occur for the first time, and it does not seem to me to be in the least conclusive that an occurrence of this kind has not hitherto come within the experience of the doctors examined. They say, however, that everything may be explained by disease. (His Lordship then proceeded to consider the evidence of the medical experts, who had been adduced by the defenders.)

“I find therefore without much difficulty (1) that the cause of death was the obstruction in the bowels, and (2) that the true cause of that obstruction was not disease, but some wrench, strain, or untoward movement caused by the gentleman to himself on the morning in question, and which wrench or strain or untoward movement was so violent as to bring part of his intestines out of their proper place, and put them in front of instead of behind the liver. That being so, I am of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to succeed, and I give them decree in terms of their summons, with expenses.”

to shew. Then the cause must be external, by which was to be understood something independent of the volition of the insured. Here, so far as the evidence shewed, nothing took place, nothing "visible," that was to say, except as the result of the volition of the deceased. No doubt the last condition might be said to be present, for the act of putting on the stockings was visible, but that act could not be said to be either violent or external or accidental. The deceased had performed this act just as he had been accustomed to perform it. What the policy contemplated was that something outside the body and will of the deceased, of a violent character, should cause bodily injury which was the proximate cause of death. Here, so far as appeared, the proximate cause was something internal. The pursuers' contention virtually made the defenders life insurers generally, not insurers against death through accident.

Argued for the pursuers;—The Lord Ordinary was right. The defenders construed the policy too strictly in favour of themselves, whereas such policies were, in dubio, to be construed against the company.¹ The Lord Ordinary's conclusion that death had taken place on the particular morning because the deceased had unintentionally given himself a strain or wrench in pulling on his stockings was the sound conclusion. If that were the cause it complied with the terms of the policy. It could not be maintained, in the first place, that any great violence was essential; to confine the policy to such cases as railway accidents or explosions would be unduly to limit the policy contrary to the true intention of the parties. "Accidental" had no very clear qualifying effect, it simply meant unforeseen; "external" meant outside the body of the insured; to say that it meant outwith the volition of the deceased was truly to make the policy almost nugatory, for few things happened to people wholly independently of their wills. For if they had not willed to be in the particular place the occurrence would not have happened to them. This construction of the policy was borne out by the authorities. Thus drowning when in an epileptic fit had been held to be death through accidental, external, and visible means.² Also injury to the spine when lifting a heavy burden.³ Death from sunstroke, on the other hand, had been held not to be death from accident,⁴ but that was on the principle the death was due to a disease.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is whether, on the evidence before us, William Clidero died of a "bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means." The defenders had insured him against this event, and their liability depends on this event having occurred.

Up to a certain point, the facts about this very unusual death are clear enough. An obstruction occurred in the colon, causing great distension; and the resulting pressure on the heart was so great that its action stopped. To go a step further back, the obstruction in the colon was caused by that intestine having fallen out of its place and got folded.

This is the account given by the three medical men who attended the deceased, and who made a post-mortem examination of his body, which revealed the displacement and obstruction of the colon. That the distension, which was enormous, might stop the action of the heart cannot be disputed, and this I take to have been the proximate cause of death.

It is to be observed that all that I have described is internal to the body of the deceased, and it is as to this region that I consider the evidence to bear out the pursuers' case. But the crucial question is whether the displacement of the colon was caused by external means, which were violent, accidental, and visible. I think not merely that the pursuers have not established that it was, but that this part of their case is a complete blank.

The evidence on this point consists of testimony as to statements made by the deceased during his brief illness. He spoke on the subject to, or at least in presence of, five persons (all of them are witnesses), and he gave quite the same account on each occasion of speaking. "He told me," says Dr Walton, "that in the act of pulling on one of his stockings, he felt something give way inside, and that afterwards he had a very acute pain, which passed off and left a dull aching sensation. According to his account, he had just got out of bed and was in the act of pulling on his stocking when the accident happened." "(Q.) Did he not tell you where he had been sitting or the motion he made to pull on his stocking, or whether it was in any way usual or unusual? (A.) I am not certain, I believe he told me that he was sitting on the bed." "I inquired," says Dr Tweedie, "what had been the cause of his illness, and Mr Clidero said that on the Saturday morning, after getting up, he was sitting on the edge of the bed drawing on his stockings when he felt something give way in his inside, and that immediately afterwards he had a great deal of pain and began to swell up." "I asked him," says Dr Bartrum, "the cause of his illness, and he told me he had been pulling on his stockings the day before and he suddenly felt something give way in his inside. He did not say anything to me about a twist." "I remember quite well," says Mrs Clidero, "of my husband coming downstairs on the Saturday before he died, and complaining that he had felt something had given way in his inside while he was putting on his stocking." "He said," says John Clidero, referring to the same occasion as his mother, "that he had felt something give way in his inside when he was putting on his stocking."

I have now read in extenso the whole evidence of what took place, and in that evidence I fail to discover any description of violent, external, accidental, and visible means of causing bodily injury. The man was putting on his stockings, and he felt something gave way in his inside. The only external fact is his putting on his stocking, and in that of itself there is nothing either violent or accidental. But further, there is in the evidence no hint or suggestion that any misadventure occurred incidental to the putting on the stockings (such as a slip or fall), or that anything external befell, except in accordance with the intention and by virtue of the volition of the deceased. Either, therefore, the movements involved in putting on the stockings caused the displacement of the colon, in which case the means causing the injury were not accidental or violent, or the two things were unconnected, except in point of time.

The Lord Ordinary, however, introduces into the case what appears to be quite another element. He treats it as "certain" that in pulling on his stockings the deceased "somehow produced a certain strain or wrench, or untoward movement of his body." I take it that by these words his Lordship must refer to something external, for otherwise the "external means" postulated by the policy, in terms which he had just quoted, would be still to seek, and he suggests no other. But if so, I must say that of "a strain or wrench, or untoward movement of the body," I can discover no trace in the evidence, and this interpolation, in the chain of facts, of a conjecture of something like violent, external, accidental, and visible means constitutes, in my judgment, a fatal flaw in the reasoning on which the interlocutor rests. No. 74.

Clidero v.
Scottish Accident Insurance
Co., Limited.

The Lord Ordinary, indeed, in the first paragraph of his opinion presents the case as if it depended on a conflict of medical opinion as to the cause of death, and his Lordship prefers the opinion of the medical men who attended the patient and examined the body. In the view which I take, however, the radical defect of the pursuers' case lies outside the region of medical opinion altogether, and in the much simpler region of the external incidents of this unfortunate gentleman's dressing on the morning in question. But I may add that the pursuers' medical witnesses, who had heard from their patient a narrative in which, as already shewn, there is no hint or suggestion of any involuntary external incident, take that narrative as they find it; their scientific theory, such as it is, rests on no other basis, and certainly does not assume any wrench, strain, or untoward movement of the body. Here is Dr Walton's examination in chief: "(Q.) Supposing the deceased was engaged, as he said, in the act of stooping, how do you account for the result which occurred? (A.) I account for it in this way, that the ribs and liver being fixed points, any stooping over would thrust down the moveable part of the bowel and in restoring himself to a straight position the bowel, instead of going back into its own recess, had stopped in front of the liver, or the liver had stopped behind the bowel." Dr Tweedie takes quite the same view: "The force resulting from the sudden act of stooping would be enough, in my opinion, to cause such a displacement, more particularly with a stout man, such as the deceased was." "I suppose," he says in another passage, "a very stout man would have to use more force to reach his foot than a thin man, and the extra amount of force would be sufficient to cause some displacement in the bowel."

Now, if this theory, which is simple if not crude, is open to the criticism that it assigns to those organs a more precarious position than experience has led the world to suppose to belong to them, it at all events has the merit of demanding no more than the proved facts of the case, those being the voluntary and intentional acts of a man putting on his stocking, with nothing violent or accidental about them. This theory, therefore, is equally destructive of the pursuers' case with the competing theory advanced by the defenders, which, with perhaps more plausibility, conjectures that the stability of the colon may have been impaired by previous internal modifications. My opinion, however, that the defenders must be assoilzied rests on the ground that to whatever the death of William Clidero was due, as its ultimate cause, it was not the result of injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means.

LORD ADAM.—There is no doubt, as your Lordship has said, that the death of Mr Clidero was caused by, as the doctors say, cardiac failure; but that again was caused by tympanitis, and the effect of tympanitis was caused by obstruction of the bowel or colon. There is no doubt about that. The question is, whether the death so caused was caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means.

Now, no one was present when this occurrence happened. Mr Clidero seems to have been alone, and we have only his own account of it, as detailed to some five people, I think,—to his wife, his son, and the three medical men. The account which he gives in those passages which your Lordship has read—I shall

No. 74. not read them again—to all and each of them is the same, viz, that he was doing upon that morning what he had done apparently for many years of his life before. He had got up; he was sitting at the side of the bed; and he was in the act of pulling on his stockings, when he felt something, as he says, give way within; that he then felt acute pain, which afterwards passed off, but with the result, as we know, that it led to illness, and ultimately, in about thirty-six hours, to his death. These are the simple facts.

Jan. 12, 1892.
Clidero v.
Scottish Accident Insurance
Co., Limited.

As your Lordship has pointed out, in the account which Mr Clidero gives himself, he describes everything as having taken place on that morning—I mean as far as his own acts are concerned—just as on all previous mornings. He does not describe any accident, such as a fall, during the time he was putting on his stockings; he does not hint at such a thing; he does not describe, and he does not hint, as one would have expected if it had happened, that there was any wrench or anything of that sort taking place,—everything went on as usual, except what happened,—that he felt something give way.

That being so, the question is whether that is violence such as is within the meaning of this policy.

Your Lordship has also read what the medical men, Dr Walton and Dr Tweedie, say upon that, and it is quite clear from their evidence—indeed they say so in so many words—that the account which they received from Mr Clidero himself (which is all we have to go upon) was sufficient to explain his death viz, the simple fact of a stout man stooping down to pull on his stockings was upon this occasion, sufficient to cause, and was the only cause of, his death. Now, if that be so, where was the violence? I cannot persuade myself, as the Lord Ordinary has done, that upon that simple account, and it is the only account we can go upon as to the facts of the case, there was anything like violence upon this occasion. Neither do I think that it was accidental in the sense of this policy. The question, in the sense of this policy, is not whether death was the result of accident in the sense that it was a death which was not foreseen or anticipated. That is not the question. The question is, in the words of the policy, whether the means by which the injury was caused were accidental means. The death being accidental in the sense in which I have mentioned and the means which lead to the death as accidental, are to my mind two quite different things. A person may do certain acts, the result of which acts may produce unforeseen consequences, and may produce what is commonly called accidental death, but the means are exactly what the man intended to use, and did use, and was prepared to use. The means were not accidental, but the result might be accidental. Now, if that is so, where does the question of accident come in here? There is no evidence, as your Lordship pointed out, that anything unusual or exceptional occurred as to the means or cause of this death. The man was just doing what he meant to do, and apparently a most unfortunate and unexpected result happened, the man's death. On these grounds I agree with your Lordship that there is nothing violent in the sense of the policy to account for this man's death.

But I must confess that on reading the doctor's evidence, I was surprised to find that they did not ask Mr Clidero for any further account of what took place upon that morning. Something unusual having happened, that they do not ask him,—at all events they do not tell us,—whether it was caused by an accident, such as a fall forward or backward when in the act of pulling on his stockings. None of the doctors say that; they are perfectly satisfied as to the cause; and, taking the facts upon which they go, viz., that everything was going on as usual—that it was simply a result arising from a stout man stooping forward in the ordinary act of putting on his stockings—I cannot think that that falls within the description in this policy,—that death resulted from violent, accidental, external, and visible means.

Clidero v.
 Scottish Accident Insurance
 Co., Limited.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with all that your Lordship has said in your statement of the case. As we are proposing to alter the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, it may be right that I should briefly indicate the ground of judgment, as it presents itself to my own mind. The question, as your Lordships have pointed out, is really one, in the first place, of construction of the clause containing the conditions of the insurance. This peculiar kind of insurance defines the condition of liability as applicable to death resulting from violent, accidental, external, and visible means. Now, while in this case it appears that the immediate cause of death was stoppage of the heart, and that the doctors account for this by the displacement of the bowel, what we have to look to is the external cause, whatever it was, which contributed towards that result. I consider that a policy of this kind is quite capable of covering the case of injuries that are self-inflicted. It is not necessary as a condition to a claim that the external cause should be either pure accident, or should result from the negligence or agency in some form of another person. But it rather appears to me that the criterion of responsibility must be that the injury has resulted from some involuntary movement on the part of the deceased. I agree with an observation made by the Dean of Faculty in his speech, that where the injury which is the cause of death is the consequence of a voluntary act, taking effect in a way that was intended, and only in that way, then that does not satisfy the condition of the policy. Such an act cannot be described as violent as well as external. The kind of self-inflicted injuries which are covered by such a word embraces such cases for instance as where a person using a tool accidentally makes a slip and severs an artery, or where a person intending to open a window loses his balance and is thrown to the ground. In either of these illustrations, in addition to the voluntary act which the person intended to perform, there is a movement which he never intended to make, and which results from some unexplained and involuntary cause. But in this case the man's own evidence, which we have through the medium of his wife and two medical men, is, I think, quite consistent with the supposition that the internal injury which he received was the result,—so far, I mean, as external means are concerned—merely of the position in which he voluntarily put his body in the act of pulling on his stocking. Now, if in consequence of the strained position which he voluntarily assumed, there occurred internal displacement from some disturbance of the equilibrium of the internal affairs of the body, that would not, in my opinion, come within the scope of this policy, and it lies with the pursuers to shew that there was some movement of an involuntary kind which may be described in a large sense as violent and accidental.

My opinion is, with your Lordships, that no such involuntary action as the Lord Ordinary describes in his judgment has been proved, and therefore that the ground of judgment fails, and that the defenders ought to be assolizied.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assolizied the defenders.

WILLIAM ALLAN AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Appellants).—*Jameson—Younger.*Jan. 13, 1892.
Allan v.
Johnstone.WILLIAM JOHNSTONE, Defender (Respondent).—Dickson—Ur.

The "Archdruid."

Ship—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Demurrage—Lay-days.—A charter-party of a steamship chartered to carry grain from the Black Sea provided that there should be "eleven running days, Sundays excepted, for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay-days at 6d. per ton per running day. The 1885 bills of lading to be used under this charter, and its terms to be considered part thereof."

The printed bill of lading 1885, as filled up by the master at the port of loading, contained this clause:—"Five and a-half 5½ laying-days remain for discharging the whole cargo." The words and figures in italics were filled in by the master.

In an action for demurrage against an onerous indorsee of the bill of lading, the shipowner contended that under the charter-party part of a day fell to be counted as a day, and that the shipmaster went beyond his power in stating the lay-days remaining for discharge at more than five days.

Held that the master was empowered by the charter-party to fill up the blanks in the bill of lading, and that the bill of lading as filled up was binding on the owners. Question as to the time from which lay-days begin to run.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

By charter-party, dated 20th October 1890, the s.s. "Archdruid," belonging to William Allan and others, was chartered to proceed to Kustendje in the Black Sea, and there load a cargo for the United Kingdom.

The charter-party, inter alia, provided,—"2. . . . Eleven running days, Sundays excepted, are to be allowed the said freighters (if the steamer be not sooner dispatched) for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay-days at sixpence per ton on the steamer's gross register tonnage per running day. . . . The 1885 bills of lading to be used under this charter, and its terms to be considered part thereof."

After loading a cargo of barley at Kustendje the master granted a bill of lading, which was headed "Mediterranean, Black Sea, and Baltic grain cargo steamer. Bill of lading 1885," and the terms of which were, inter alia,—"Shipped in good order and condition . . . and to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the port of discharge unto orders or to his or their assigns, he or they paying freight and demurrage, if any, for the said goods. All conditions as per charter-party, dated in London the 20th October 1890. Five and half 5½ laying-days remain for discharging the whole cargo. . . ." The words and figures printed in italics were filled in by the master.

The "Archdruid" reached Glasgow on 26th December 1890, and on that day the owners' agents wrote to Mr William Johnstone, the onerous indorsee of the bill of lading, that the "Archdruid" "will be ready to commence discharging at 6 A.M. to-morrow morning, and lay-days will commence then." The unloading began at 7 A.M. on Saturday the 27th. Her discharge was completed between midnight on Monday 5th and A.M. on Tuesday, 6th January.

The owners now sued William Johnstone in the Sheriff Court Lanarkshire for payment of three days' demurrage, amounting to £93, 3s. The action proceeded upon the footing that six lay-days had been occupied at Kustendje, that five only remained for the discharge and that these began at 12 P.M. on 26th December, and expired at 1 P.M. on 2d January following, excluding the intervening Sunday and New Year's day, which by mutual consent was observed as a holiday.

The defender resisted the claim, relying on the terms of the bill of lading, and stating that the five and a-half days left for discharge began at 6 A.M. on the morning of the 27th December. He explained that the delay in unloading was caused by the defective condition of the steamer's winches, upon which repairs had to be executed, and to the irregular discharge given by the stevedores. He tendered £50 in full settlement of the pursuers' claims. No. 75.

Allan v.
Johnstone.

The "Archdruid."

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) allowed a proof.

It appeared from the proof that the master had inserted the term of 5½ days in the bill of lading as a compromise between five, which he had considered the proper term, and six, for which the merchant had wanted him to sign. The winches had been out of order on three occasions during the unloading for a period of about seven and a-half hours in all.

The Sheriff-substitute found "that the 'Archdruid' finished discharging at Glasgow on Tuesday 5th January, and that allowance being made for detention due to the defective working of the ship's winches, the vessel is entitled to one day on demurrage, over and above the lay-days allowed by the charter-party," and decerned for the sum of £31, 1s.*

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—In a charter-party like the present half days must be counted as completed days.¹ Parts of days were for this purpose whole days, and therefore six days were spent in the loading at Kustendje. It might be that the master had misapprehended the legal effect of the statement he made in the bill of lading, but it could not be said that the master had any power to innovate upon the terms of the charter-party, which were here specially imported into the bill of lading, or that it was within the master's institorial power to make the statement contained in the bill of lading.² In any view, such a statement was not binding upon the owners.³ Further, the bill of lading specially incorporated the charter-party, and the defenders must therefore be held to be cognisant of its terms. As far as regarded the matter of computation, lay-days and demurrage were in pari casu. Accordingly, five days only remained for discharging, and these having begun at 12 P.M. on the 26th December, they were exhausted at 12 P.M. on Friday 2d January. Three days more were occupied in the discharge, which was not completed until late upon the Monday night or Tuesday morning. Sundays, although specially excluded from the lay-days, must count for demurrage purposes. It was admitted that the winches were partially out of order, but the charterers took the risk of that.⁴ On the footing that they did not, seven and a-half hours only fell to be deducted on that account.

Argued for the respondent;—He was merely an onerous indorsee of

* "NOTE.— . . . If the consignees are entitled to five and a-half lay-days, then the ship having been ready to discharge on Saturday morning 27th December, and Sunday, under the charter-party, and 1st January by consent, being discounted, demurrage would properly begin to become due on Saturday 3d January at noon. But it is conceded that a certain deduction ought to be made for stoppages in discharging at two of the holds in consequence of the winches breaking down. The allowance for delay, due to the ship's want of winch power, may fairly be stated at a day and a-half, taking us on to Monday, and in this way, as the ship did not finish her discharge till Tuesday the 5th, one day's demurrage, taking into account the defender's hand-winch and overtime, appears to me to be due at the lowest computation."

the bills of lading, and accordingly could not be bound by the terms of the charter-party, of which he knew nothing, and to which he was a stranger. The bill of lading constituted the contract, and where there was a discrepancy between the charter-party and the bill of lading, as in a question between the owners and the onerous indorsee of the bill of lading, the bill of lading ruled.¹ Here the bill of lading was merely explicatory of an ambiguous clause in the charter-party. The master's authority extended to stating the number of lay-days spent at the port of loading, and his representation of that fact was binding upon his owners, especially as they had given him a printed form with a blank clause in it to fill in. The five and a-half days for discharging must be counted from 7 A.M. on the morning of the 27th December, and they therefore expired at 7 P.M. on Saturday the 3d. But the delays owing to the breakdown of the winch extended the time into the Sunday. There was therefore only one day's demurrage due.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first question in this case is, how many days were the consignees entitled to for unloading the vessel, whether to five or five and a-half days. The answer depends in the first instance upon the terms of the bill of lading. The bill of lading sets out that "five and half 5½ laying-days remain for discharging the whole cargo." It is quite clear that this is not a mere note or statement of fact that, as matter of history, five and a-half days had been consumed in the loading of cargo. On the contrary, it now appears from the explanation given by Mr Dickson that, there being in the charter-party a provision that "eleven running days, Sundays excepted, are to be allowed . . . for loading and unloading," the bill of lading which was granted in pursuance of the 22d clause of the charter-party is in such a form as to place on the master who signed it a duty to apprise the holder of the bill of lading how much time he has for discharging his cargo. Accordingly, as one of the terms of the bill of lading the master made provision that there should be five and a-half days for discharging. His authority for doing so is, I think, demonstrated by the fact that the charter-party provides that "the 1885 bills of lading are to be used under this charter." An 1885 bill of lading is undoubtedly a bill of lading in the form actually used, and it leaves a blank to be filled in by the master stating how many laying-days remain for discharging. Accordingly, it appears that the master is directly empowered to do the exact thing which in point of fact he has done. It was as a legally authorised agent, and so binding his owners, that he inserted in the bill of lading the statement that five and a-half days remained for discharging. Therefore the rights of parties fall to be determined by the provisions of the bill of lading, and they are unambiguous.

The next question is whether more than one day, plus the five and one-half days, have been occupied in discharging. I think the calculation is sufficiently clear,—starting from 6 A.M. or 7 A.M. on the morning of the 27th December,—with the result that the respondents are placed in the situation which Mr Dickson described as entering the Sunday, and the question therefore falls. I do not see how the owners can get over the terms of the letter of 26th December written by Messrs Dixon & Harrison, their agents, in which they state that the vessel would be ready to commence discharging at 6 A.M. the next morning, No. 75. and that the lay-days would begin then. Discharging was commenced not at six, but at seven (for it was not until the latter hour that de facto the vessel was ready), and was completed about 2 A.M. on the 6th January, so that taking the five and a-half lay-days and making an allowance for delays owing to the breakdown of the winches, and leaving out of account the intervening Sunday and New Year's day we get into the following Sunday. It is plain that some allowance must be made for the defect of the winches, for it is part of the contract contained in the charter-party that the ship must be in every way fitted for her work. Taking the most moderate estimate of the time lost by the injury to the winch, we reach the period I have indicated. I do not doubt that the obligation of the owners of cargo is as stated in the case of Postlethwaite, but that does not affect the case of the failure of the shipowner to provide a sufficiency of tackle to carry out the discharge, which is what we have in the present case. Accordingly, I think the result is that one day, and one day only, of demurrage is due.

druid."

It is satisfactory that we have been able to arrive at the same conclusion as the Sheriff-substitute, especially as the sum at stake is very small, but I can say for all of us that we have given the case as much consideration as if the amount involved had been much larger.

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case is whether the shipowners are entitled to one or three days' demurrage, and that depends on three other questions—(1) whether the shippers were entitled to five and a-half or only to five lay-days for unloading; (2) whether the first day commenced at midnight on the 27th December, or only at six or seven in the morning; and (3) whether any, or if so, what time was to be allowed for defects in the winch. The first question is whether the shippers were entitled to have five or to have five and a-half days for discharging. I entirely agree with your Lordship. The answer to the question depends upon the construction of the bill of lading taken in connection with the provision of the charter-party, that "eleven running days, Sundays excepted, are to be allowed for loading and unloading." The contention upon one side is that it was ultra vires of the master to infringe upon the terms of the charter-party by inserting in the bill of lading the statement that five and a-half days remained for discharging; that a day commenced is to be reckoned a complete day, and therefore that five and a-half days must mean six days, the inference from that being that five days only remained for unloading at the port of discharge. The answer is that the bill of lading is the ruling document, and that it was within the right of the master to insert the statement in the bill of lading, and that his owners are bound by it. I think the latter is the right view, and that the master was entitled to fill in the blank in the bill of lading, which had been presented to him by the owners of cargo.

The next question is, when did the lay-days commence at the port of discharge? If there had been nothing special in this case, I do not say that I would not have been of opinion that the hour at which lay-days must begin is twelve o'clock midnight. But this case must depend upon its own circumstances, and I think the letter of the 26th December from the pursuers' agents is conclusive, that the lay-days must be held to have commenced at 6 A.M. on the 27th, or perhaps more properly at 7, when the working day commenced.

With reference to the third question, it was maintained, on the authority of

No. 75.

Allan v.

Johnstone.

the cases of Postlethwaite and Budgett, that the shippers must take the risk of such delays as occurred through the failure of the winch. I cannot assent to that view, and I think the delay was attributable to the defect of the ship. That being so, and allowing a reasonable time for the delay, and excepting Sunday, 28th December, and New Year's day, which it is admitted is to be deducted as a holiday, the lay-days are therefore carried down to Sunday the 4th January. If that be so, the shipowners do not dispute that only one day's demurrage is due.

LORD M'LAREN.—When it is ascertained that the lay-days have been exhausted, demurrage must, I think, be held to begin at the hour at which the lay-days are exhausted, and the days of demurrage are reckoned as periods of two hours from that hour. Any surplus interval of time in excess of a full day is to be counted as an additional day. This point is established by a series of decisions of the English Courts, and cannot now be questioned. It may be settled, as I think we must hold it to be, that demurrage may begin at any hour of the day, that can only be because the lay-days begin and end at the same hour. This is not matter of law, but of arithmetic. There is no valid opinion, any such distinction as was contended for by the appellants to the effect that lay-days always begin at midnight. There is, however, a distinct and different kind. It appears to me that if the ship arrives in port in the afternoon it would not be consistent with good sense that the obligation to load or unload should take effect at the instant when she is brought alongside of the quay. Men cannot be got to assist in the loading or unloading at the moment when notice has to be given to the agent for cargo of the arrival of the ship. Accordingly, I understand that by custom, if a ship arrives after the hour of noon, the lay-days are reckoned from the morning of the following day. But whether they are to be reckoned from midnight, or from the hour at which it is agreed for loading or unloading to begin, is a point on which it is not necessary to give an opinion, because, as your Lordship has pointed out, it is settled for the purposes of the present case by the letter of the owners' agents of 26th December. That letter is assented to, and therefore as regards the time during which the ship was lying at Glasgow, it must be assumed that, by agreement of parties, the lay-days could not be reckoned from an earlier hour than 6 A.M., or 7 A.M. on the 27th, because it is proved that the ship's crew were not ready to assist in the unloading until that hour.

In this state of the facts, we have to consider that by a clause in the charter-party the master was authorised to sign a bill of lading of a specified form prescribed as an "1885 bill of lading." The form contains a clause with a space in it, to be filled up by the master with a statement of the number of days allowed for unloading. That information would be very useful to the consignee, because he would then know what chance there was of demurrage claims being made against him. It was in pursuance of the authority thus given that the master inserted the statement that five and a-half days remained for unloading. The amount which was arrived at as a compromise after a dispute as between five and six days. I am clearly of opinion that the master was acting within the scope of his authority when he made himself a party to this agreement by signing the bill of lading as for five and a-half running lay-days.

I do not enter on the question of fact regarding the time which was allowed for unloading at Glasgow, which has been fully examined by your Lordships. I am satisfied that no more than one day's demurrage is due, and therefore I am of the same conclusion as the Sheriff-substitute.

Mr. KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion.

No. 75.

That point in the case depends upon the construction to be put upon the bill of lading, taken along with those of the charter-party, and I do not think the reading of the documents can be affected at all by the evidence to which we were referred. The bill of lading in terms allows five and one-half days for discharging the cargo. I take it that according to the general meaning of the words, the days mean whole days, but if the parties to the contract are so minded, it is within their power to stipulate that a day shall be divisible; and the question is whether they have not so stipulated in the present case. The bill of lading is imported into the contract which is expressed in the charter-party, and empowers the master to fill up the blank in the bill of lading, and so enables him to fix the period to be allowed to the merchant for discharge. The master having filled up the blank by the statement that five and a-half days were allowed for discharging, and having taken the cargo on the conditions so expressed, it seems to me to be out of the question for the owner to say that he is bound by the master's act, or that the statement amounts to anything else than a stipulation as between the onerous indorsees and the owners that there were to be five and a-half days for unloading before demurrage begins to run. As to the time from which the laying-days are to run, I think that is settled by the determination contained in the letter of the shipowners' agents that the ship was to be ready to discharge at 6 A.M. on the 27th. On the question of fact, I agree with your Lordships, and have nothing to add.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor finding in fact that under the bill of lading, of which the defender was onerous indorsee, five and one-half laying-days were allowed for discharge; that the bill of lading was in the form provided in the charter-party; that it was the duty of the master to settle and fill in the time remaining for discharge, and that he had done so; "that the vessel was not tendered as ready for discharge until 6 A.M. of 27th December 1890, and was not in fact ready for discharge until 7 A.M.; that the discharge was finished on 5th January 1891; that during the said period the discharge was interrupted by the occurrence of a Sunday and of New Year's Day (on which by mutual consent no work was done), and also by the vessel being for upwards of six hours not in a condition to give discharge owing to some of the winches being disabled: Find in law that the pursuers are entitled to one day's demurrage, and no more: Therefore dismiss the appeal."

the cases of Postlethwaite and Budgett, that the shippers must take the risk of such delays as occurred through the failure of the winch. I cannot assent to that view, and I think the delay was attributable to the defect of the ship only. That being so, and allowing a reasonable time for the delay, and excepting Sunday, 28th December, and New Year's day, which it is admitted is to be deducted as a holiday, the lay-days are therefore carried down to Sunday the 4th January, and if that be so, the shipowners do not dispute that only one day's demurrage is due.

LORD M'LAREN.—When it is ascertained that the lay-days have been exhausted demurrage must, I think, be held to begin at the hour at which the lay-days are exhausted, and the days of demurrage are reckoned as periods of twenty-four hours from that hour. Any surplus interval of time in excess of a number of full days is to be counted as an additional day. This point is established by a series of decisions of the English Courts, and cannot now be questioned. If it be settled, as I think we must hold it to be, that demurrage may begin at any hour of the day, that can only be because the lay-days begin and end at the same hour. This is not matter of law, but of arithmetic. There is not, in my opinion, any such distinction as was contended for by the appellants to the effect that lay-days always begin at midnight. There is, however, a distinction of a different kind. It appears to me that if the ship arrives in port in the afternoon, it would not be consistent with good sense that the obligation to load or unload should take effect at the instant when she is brought alongside of the quay. Men cannot be got to assist in the loading or unloading at the moment, and notice has to be given to the agent for cargo of the arrival of the ship. Accordingly, I understand that by custom, if a ship arrives after the hour of noon, the lay-days are reckoned from the morning of the following day. But whether they are to be reckoned from midnight, or from the hour at which it is usual for loading or unloading to begin, is a point on which it is not necessary to give an opinion, because, as your Lordship has pointed out, it is settled for the purposes of the present case by the letter of the owners' agents of 26th December. That letter is assented to, and therefore as regards the time during which the ship was lying at Glasgow, it must be assumed that, by agreement of parties the lay-days could not be reckoned from an earlier hour than 6 A.M., or rather 7 A.M. on the 27th, because it is proved that the ship's crew were not ready to assist in the unloading until that hour.

In this state of the facts, we have to consider that by a clause in the charter party the master was authorised to sign a bill of lading of a specified form, described as an "1885 bill of lading." The form contains a clause with a blank in it, to be filled up by the master with a statement of the number of days left for unloading. That information would be very useful to the consignee, because he would then know what chance there was of demurrage claims being brought against him. It was in pursuance of the authority thus given that the master inserted the statement that five and a-half days remained for unloading, an amount which was arrived at as a compromise after a dispute as between five and six days. I am clearly of opinion that the master was acting within the scope of his authority when he made himself a party to this agreement and signed the bill of lading as for five and a-half running lay-days.

I do not enter on the question of fact regarding the time which was spent in unloading at Glasgow, which has been fully examined by your Lordships. I am satisfied that no more than one day's demurrage is due, and therefore con-to the same conclusion as the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion.

No. 75.

The first point in the case depends upon the construction to be put upon the terms of the bill of lading, taken along with those of the charter-party, and I do not think the reading of the documents can be affected at all by the evidence to which we were referred. The bill of lading in terms allows five and one-half laying-days for discharging the cargo. I take it that according to the general rule laying-days mean whole days, but if the parties to the contract are so minded, it is quite within their power to stipulate that a day shall be divisible; and the question is whether they have not so stipulated in the present case. The bill of lading is imported into the contract which is expressed in the charter-party, which empowers the master to fill up the blank in the bill of lading, and so enables him to fix the period to be allowed to the merchant for discharge. The master having filled up the blank by the statement that five and a-half days remained for discharging, and having taken the cargo on the conditions so expressed, it seems to me to be out of the question for the owner to say that he is not bound by the master's act, or that the statement amounts to anything else than a stipulation as between the onerous indorseees and the owners that the former are to have five and a-half days for unloading before demurrage begins to run.

As to the time from which the laying-days are to run, I think that is settled by the intimation contained in the letter of the shipowners' agents that the ship would be ready to discharge at 6 A.M. on the 27th. On the question of fact, I entirely agree with your Lordships, and have nothing to add.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor finding in fact that under the bill of lading, of which the defender was onerous indorsee, five and a-half laying-days were allowed for discharge; that the bill of lading was in the form provided in the charter-party; that it was the duty of the master to settle and fill in the time remaining for discharge, and that he had done so; "that the vessel was not tendered as ready for discharge until 6 A.M. of 27th December 1890, and was not in fact ready for discharge until 7 A.M.; that the discharge was finished on 5th January 1891; that during the said period the discharge was interrupted by the occurrence of a Sunday and of New Year's Day (on which by mutual consent no work was done), and also by the vessel being for upwards of six hours not in a condition to give discharge owing to some of the winches being disabled: Find in law that the pursuers are entitled to one day's demurrage, and no more: Therefore dismiss the appeal."

child, to which she gave birth on 17th December 1890, and of which she alleged the defender to be the father.

The pursuer averred;—"For several years the pursuer and defender have been very intimate, and the defender was courting the pursuer. The defender has had connection with the pursuer from time to time since the year 1885. In particular, the defender had connection with the pursuer on or about the 7th day of February 1890, and on or about the 16th day of March 1890, in or near a field on the farm of Upper Barr."

The defender denied these statements.

At the proof the following evidence was led:—

Pursuer's proof.—The defender deponed,—“I am twenty-four years of age. . . . I remember being at the Sunday school at Barr. The pursuer was there, too, as far as I remember. I cannot say what year that was. I was at the Sunday school for about six years. I left when I was about thirteen years of age. I was not there in 1885. . . . I used to call occasionally to see pursuer's uncle and his wife, just as I was passing. . . . I know Mrs M'Coll, wife of the gamekeeper at Glencreggan. I have met the pursuer in her house more than once. I cannot tell the dates when I met her there. I remember being in Mrs M'Coll's house one night when the thrashing mill was at Rosehill farm. I met the pursuer there that night. We played cards in the house that night. I did not leave along with the pursuer, nor accompany her part of the way home. . . . I did not meet her by appointment outside her uncle's house on the 16th March of that year. . . . (Shewn letter No 10/1 of process.)—That is the letter which I wrote to the pursuer. When I said in that letter that I was paralysed at the contents of her letter, I meant that I did not know what she was writing about; that I was taken by surprise. When I said there that ‘I was absolutely certain of it,’ &c., I meant that I was certain, because I had no connection with her.”

The pursuer deponed,—“I am twenty-three years of age. . . . I first made the acquaintance of the defender in the Sabbath school at Barr. . . . The defender was there in the school in 1885. He used to go home with me part of the way frequently on Sunday. The school was nearly a mile from my uncle's house, with whom I live. The defender frequently had connection with me going home from the Sunday school in the year 1885. I left the school that year. It was in the winter time—I mean December and November—that he used to have connection with me going home from the school. . . . I remember when the thrashing-mill was at Rosehill on the 7th February 1890. I went to Mrs M'Coll's house after the thrashing was over. The defender came in. I left the house with him about half-past seven. He went part of the way home with me. He had connection with me that night on the side of the hill where we used always to meet previously. My uncle gave me a scolding when I came home for being late.” She further deponed that in March 1890 she and the defender made an appointment for a meeting on the hill, and that she had connection with the defender on 16th March 1890. "Cross.—My uncle is Donald M'Quilkan or Wilkinson. The name of his house is Upper Barr. He is my mother's uncle by marriage. I first met defender seven years ago at the Sunday school. I was then about sixteen. . . . I think it is half a mile, or not quite so much from the Sabbath school to the defender's father's house, where he lives. It will be about a mile and a-half from my uncle's house to the defender's father's house. The road leading to my uncle's house from the Sunday school is an entirely different road from the road leading to the defender's house. I know the defender was in Glasgow in the winter 1884-85. . . . No letters passed between us up to the letters, of which No. of process is one. . . . I never had connection with any other man but the defender."

* “Greenock, 14th August 1890.—Dear Jessie,—I was paralysed by the contents of your letter. If you are with child it is certainly not by me. Before my God and my own conscience, I am prepared to swear that, and under no circumstance will I admit the paternity of it. Were I not absolutely certain of it, I would not say that, but I have said it conscientiously and will stick to it to the bitter end. I am very sorry for you.—Yours, &c. MATTHEW M'MILLAN.”

Donald M'Quilkan, deponed,—“The pursuer is a grandniece of my wife's. . . . I have known the defender ever since he was born. He has been coming about my house for the last seven or eight years when he was at home. I do not think it was to see me he came. I remember his coming in one night shortly after the New Year three or four years ago. That night he came in, and while he was in she went out. He soon after said he must go. I looked out and saw the two of them going down the road. It was quite dark. She did not come back until about eleven o'clock. I went out and whistled, but they made no reply. I was suspicious of what was going on, and I warned the girl now and again. I watched them many a time, but they were too sly for me. I remember one night about the latter end of February or beginning of March 1890 meeting the defender coming over the hill about half-way between my house and Glencreggan. I asked him what he was doing there, and he said he was going home from Rob. Stewart's. He was a mile out of his course for that. The defender used to come frequently when the pursuer and I were working at the potatoes. I am sure he was just wanting to speak to the pursuer. . . . Cross.—It is customary in the district to visit each other's house in the evenings, and sometimes play cards. There is only one apartment in my house. The defender could not be in my house with the pursuer without my knowing it. It was dark when I whistled on the pursuer and defender on the night shortly after the New Year previously mentioned. I saw them when I whistled. That would be about forty yards away. They did not go out of the house together on that occasion. She would be out about ten minutes before the defender. The pursuer never told me that the defender was courting her at that time. When he visited the potato field the pursuer and I were always together. I was digging the potatoes and the pursuer was gathering them. They were never out of my sight at any time. It was by his looks and slyness that I concluded he came to the potato field to see the pursuer. . . . I may have complained to M'Coll or M'Gougan that I was afraid pursuer was carrying on with flows. I have seen pursuer speaking frequently to a farm-servant, called Brown, about two years ago. . . . Re-examined.—I remember when the thrashing-mill was at Rosehill. I remember the pursuer coming home very late that night. I gave her a scolding for being late.”

Re-cross.—I never saw any familiarities between the defender and pursuer.”

Tenna Taylor deponed,—“I am twenty years of age. I know the pursuer and the defender. I was serving with Thomas M'Corkindale from Martinmas 1889 to Martinmas 1890. M'Corkindale's house is close to the pursuer's uncle's house. I was a great deal in the pursuer's company. I do not know if M'Millan used to go into her house at night. She told the defender was courting her. I have seen him go into the house pretty often. It was mostly in the afternoons when he went in. I remember the thrashing at Rosehill in the spring of last year. That was in the month of February. I know the pursuer went to work at the thrashing that day. I was in M'Quilkan's house that night till late, and the pursuer had not come in then. They were wondering what was keeping her. [The witness gave no evidence as to the defender being with the pursuer on this occasion.] . . . I remember going with her one night to M'Coll's house. The defender was there. I cannot say what time of the year that was. . . . Pursuer told me she was in the family-way. She said Matthew M'Millan was the father. Cross.—The defender was not present when the pursuer told me that he was courting her. The night I went to M'Coll's house with the pursuer we came home together, and left the defender there. . . .”

John M'Gougan deponed,—“I am a farm-servant with Mr M'Corkindale at Upper Barr. I know the pursuer and defender. I have seen the defender calling at M'Quilkan's house at all times of the day. . . . Cross.—My house is almost adjoining M'Quilkan's house. I have never seen the pursuer and defender walking together. I have been there all my days. I never saw any familiarities or courtship between them.”

Isabella M'Coll deponed,—“I am the wife of the gamekeeper at Glencreggan. I know the pursuer and the defender. They have both been together frequently in my house. The pursuer and defender never left my house together. Cross for defender.—My husband and I have been eight years at Glencreggan. The pursuer has been going back and forward to my house all that time. It is the custom for the farm-servants—male and female—to come into my house in the winter evenings and play cards. The defender was in the habit of visiting us in the absence of the pursuer. I know that defender was four years at college. He has not been there for the last three years. . . . The pursuer and defender never came to my house together. I never saw any familiarities between them. I never thought they were courting. She never spoke to me of the defender as her sweetheart. She has left the house different times with Hugh Rankine, a joiner. She has told me that Rankine went home with her. M'Quilkan often complained to me about the pursuer staying late at my house, and going home with James Brown.”

Defender's proof.—Donald M'Coll, husband of the preceding witness after giving similar evidence as to the meetings in his house, continued,—“I never saw the pursuer and defender leaving my house in company. I never saw any familiarities between the pursuer and defender. I have never seen him paying any attention to her as his sweetheart. There have been other girls visiting my house and playing cards in the evening. I have repeatedly accompanied the pursuer [defender] part of the way home. It is in a different direction from the pursuer's uncle's house. I have never seen them leaving my house together. I have seen her leaving my house with Hugh Rankine. I remember M'Quilkan once speaking to me about the pursuer's conduct with Brown. . . .”

The defender examined as a witness for himself,—“My acquaintance with the pursuer has been the same as other schoolmates. I have heard what the pursuer said about intimacy with me in the months of November and December 1885. I was at Glasgow attending the college the whole of these months up to the Christmas vacation. It is eight years since I first went to college; I was there five consecutive years. For six summers up to the last summer I was purser in the Campbeltown steamer. I wrote the letter No. 10/1 of process in answer to the first letter I received from pursuer. That is the only letter I wrote to her. . . . I never courted the pursuer. I never had connection with her. I have heard the evidence of M'Quilkan with reference to seeing him on the hill. On the occasion referred to I was herding hogs for my father. On that occasion I had not been seeing the pursuer. M'Quilkan is a married man. Every time I visited his house either he or his wife was in. I have repeatedly been there when the pursuer was not there. I never made any appointments with the pursuer, as she says in her evidence." No. 76.

M'Kinven v.
M'Millan.

On 29th September 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Bell) found that the defender was the father of the pursuer's child.*

The defender appealed.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On the evidence I am of opinion that the pursuer's case is not proved. The Sheriff-substitute uses an expression in his note which, I think, shews that he somewhat misapprehended the considerations which ought to prevail. He says,—“The pursuer's story is a consistent one, and is not contradicted by any neutral witness,” and he further alludes to the circumstance that the pursuer had been seen with the defender solus cum sola on a public road on one or two occasions a year or two before the acts of connection averred. If that were to be taken as corroboration—that a young man was seen in a young woman's company in a public place long before the alleged intimacy—no man living in the rural part of the country would be safe from such an accusation, unless he was a woman-hater, who shunned women's society altogether. Another ground of corroboration is said to be found in a letter written by the defender on being charged by the pursuer with being the cause of her pregnancy. It is undoubtedly not a satisfactory letter, but I am not satisfied that there is anything in its terms amounting to an admission of connection. If there is not, it does not help the pursuer's case. Persons sitting down to write a letter are apt to fall into a somewhat stilted form, and there is a distinct denial of paternity. If that is a falsehood there is an end of the matter, but it may be taken as a denial of the paternity, because

* NOTE.—This is rather a narrow case, but I think the pursuer must prevail. The witnesses, M'Quilkan, M'Gougan, and Taylor, all speak to the defender frequently visiting the house of Mr M'Quilkan, where she resided. M'Quilkan and Taylor both speak to the parties being out solus cum sola, late at night—the former to an occasion a year or two previous to the specific dates of connection libelled, and the latter in particular to its having occurred on the night of the first date libelled, 7th February 1890, the day of the thrashing at Rosehill. Taylor also says the pursuer told her the defender was courting her, and that she spoke to her of her condition, and attributed it to the defender. The pursuer's story is a consistent one, and she is not contradicted by any neutral witness. Unless the witnesses named are to be disbelieved, her case is aided by their testimony to a height of probability which, with her own evidence, strikes, I think, the rule applied to such cases. It is also of importance that he wrote to the defender himself during her pregnancy, attributing it to him. His letter to her (No. 10/1 of process) in answer does not strike me as that of an innocent man, but the reverse. If he had had nothing to do with the girl he had no need to be ‘paralysed’ by her announcement. It impresses me as that of a man conscious of the truth of the impeachment, but who is taking refuge in denial from the inconvenient consequences of his indulgence; and his explanation of it, in his examination for the pursuer—that he ‘did not know what she was writing about’—is not satisfactory. The language of his letter is that of one who has quite appreciated the force of the communication to which it is an answer. If the case is narrow, it is at least a broader one than M'Bayne v. Davidson, Feb. 10, 1860, 22 D. 739, where the paternity was held proved.”

the writer had never had connection with the pursuer. On the whole matter I think that the Sheriff-substitute has approached the case under an erroneous idea. If it is enough that a pursuer's story is "consistent, and uncontradicted by any neutral witness," then a false story might prevail if only it was consistent, and the defender were unsuccessful in obtaining any independent evidence to negative it. That might well happen. A pursuer of such an action must prove her case like any other pursuer, and she does not prove it unless she bring evidence truly corroborative of her evidence, such as would be held sufficient corroboration of the evidence of a party interested in the issue in any ordinary case. I do not find such corroboration here. Therefore I hold that the pursuer has failed to prove her case.

LORD YOUNG.—The truth as to such cases is certainly known only to the parties. Formerly the evidence of both was excluded, and great difficulty was felt. The result was that if what was known as a semiplena probatio was obtained from the competent evidence the woman's oath was admitted to prove the case. That state of the law led to two views upon the true nature of a semiplena probatio. Lord President Blair took one, and Lord Mackenzie (and many persons agreed with him) took another. That latter view was very much that which the Sheriff-substitute has adopted in this case. I cannot find any fault with the reasoning in his note to which your Lordship has referred. In the present state of the law we take the whole evidence together, and if we think the woman's story true we give decree. Such an observation as the Sheriff-substitute has made is a commonplace observation in these actions. The fact to which the woman speaks is one which is in its nature a thing which the parties endeavour to conceal. We require some corroboration. But little will do. That these parties seemed to be "keeping company" is important. It is spoken to by the pursuer's granduncle, M'Quilkan. (His Lordship read the evidence of this witness.) The defender denies all this. If we think that he lies, that is a circumstance that we are entitled to act upon. It is not that his lie proves the case, but that his falsehood is a thing which we are entitled to take account of in considering whether we may safely act upon the woman's statement if we believe it. As regards the defender's letter, I do not say that it is an admission, but it does produce in my mind the impression that it was not written by an innocent man to a woman who was trumping up a case against him, and it does lead me to believe the woman rather than the man. I think there is reasonable evidence for the Sheriff's judgment, and that, there being such, it should not be altered. But further, I think it is the proper result on the evidence.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The conclusion to which I have come is that the pursuer's case is not proved.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree in thinking that the pursuer has entirely failed to prove her case. There is no evidence in support of it but her own. The evidence of her granduncle does not, in my opinion, afford the slightest corroboration of the pursuer's statement. He speaks to a circumstance which he says excited his suspicion as to the relation existing between the pursuer and defender, but that circumstance occurred three or four years before the child in question was born, and cannot therefore have, in my opinion, any bearing upon the question before us. Beside this witness's suspicions are not evidence of fact.

I think the Sheriff-substitute has reached the conclusion given effect to in his judgment upon an erroneous idea of the law applicable to cases like the present. Your Lordship in the chair has already referred to the passage in the Sheriff-substitute's note where he says, "the pursuer's story is a consistent one, and she is not contradicted by any neutral witness." Upon that I observe that the pursuer's story, consistent and uncontradicted as it may be, is still the pursuer's story and nothing more. It is not sufficient to prove the pursuer's case unless it be corroborated. The absence of contradiction does not afford corroboration. But what I more especially allude to is the sentence which follows what I have just quoted. The Sheriff-substitute adds, "unless the witnesses named are to be disbelieved, her case is raised by their testimony to a height of probability which, with her own evidence, satisfies, I think, the rule applied to such cases." The rule to which the Sheriff-substitute refers is, I suppose, the old rule, which allowed the pursuer of an action of filiation, who had adduced a semiplena probatio, to supplement that evidence by her own oath, and thereupon to obtain decree. A semiplena probatio was just such a proof as the Sheriff-substitute describes, namely, such an amount of evidence as created a strong probability that the pursuer's case was well founded. But the Sheriff-substitute seems to have forgotten that that rule no longer exists. It ceased when the law was altered to the effect of allowing the parties to a cause to be examined as witnesses in the cause. I am surprised the Sheriff-substitute should have forgotten this, for it is plainly laid down in the case which he cites, M'Bayne v. Davidson. The rule applicable to filiation cases is now the same as that which applies to any other kind of case which depends upon the ascertainment of disputed fact. The pursuer must prove her averments in an action of filiation just as she would require to prove her averments in an action on a contract where the alleged contract, or the alleged breach of contract, or other allegation on which the action is founded, is disputed.

I would like to add one word about the defender's letter, which the Sheriff-substitute thinks is not the letter of "an innocent man." It is, at all events, a distinct denial of the paternity of the pursuer's child. It does not strike me as suggesting any doubt of the defender's innocence. But is it any proof of the defender's guilt? That is the light in which it should be regarded, and I have no hesitation in answering that question in the negative.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and assolizied the defender.

The pursuer averred ;—"The pursuer, who resides with her mother in Portpatrick, was married to Joseph M'Quillan, seaman. He sailed for Australia about seven years ago, and has not since been seen nor heard of by the pursuer, and she has no knowledge as to whether he is dead or alive."

Smith denied that he was the father of the pursuer's child, and pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuer, being a married woman, is not entitled to sue this action without the consent and concurrence of her husband. (2) The child in question being the offspring of a married woman, her husband is presumably the father thereof; therefore it is incompetent to prove the paternity against the defender without making the husband a party to the action.

After a proof, the Sheriff-substitute (Watson) pronounced an interlocutor containing the following findings :—"Finds in fact that the pursuer's husband left this country and sailed for Australia in the year 1883; that since then he has been continuously absent from her, has contributed nothing to her support, and has made no communication to her of any kind, with the exception of one letter received by her about six months after he left; that on 5th July 1885, William Reid, who was acquainted with the pursuer's husband, and to whom she had applied for information regarding him, wrote to the pursuer from Sydney, that he had seen her husband in that town a few days previous to the date of the letter; that since that time the pursuer has not heard anything of her husband, though she has made such endeavours to trace him as might reasonably be expected of her: Finds in law that, in these circumstances, the pursuer is entitled to sue this action alone, and repels the first and second pleas in law stated for the defender," &c.

The Sheriff-substitute further found it proved that the defender was the father of the pursuer's child.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued ;—A married woman could not sue such an action at her own instance. The action was therefore without any proper instance. At all events she could not sue without the concurrence of a curator ad litem appointed by the Court. Such cases as Orme v. Differs where it had been held that a deserted wife could trade and could defend herself against actions, and was liable to diligence, were not in point.¹

On the merits, the defender argued that the paternity was not established.

Argued for the pursuer ;—The rule that a married woman could not sue or be sued alone was certainly not absolute, as the cases of Chirnside and Orme shewed. The case of Brodie v. Dyce involved the present point. The pursuer appeared from the evidence to have been left by her husband, to have attempted to learn where he was, but failed, and to have become obliged to support herself. It was impossible to hold that she could not sue or be sued by herself. On the merits, paternity was clearly established.

The pursuer's counsel intimated that he was willing to have a curator ad litem sisted to the pursuer and put in a minute to that effect.

The Court appointed Mr P. Morison, S.S.C., to be curator ad litem.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The only real and practical question in this case is, Jan. 15, 1892. M'Quillan v. Smith. whether the pursuer is in a position to sue this action in her own right and without the consent of her husband. Upon the merits of the case there is no doubt that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is right.

In the first place, what are the circumstances of the case? The pursuer was married thirteen years ago, and her husband, who was a sailor, left her on a voyage to Australia in 1883, and since then she has never seen him. The last she heard about him was in 1885, when she got a letter from someone saying he had seen the pursuer's husband in Australia, but since then she has heard nothing about him. It has been found, no doubt very properly, that the pursuer has made reasonable endeavours to trace him.

The question then is, whether if the pursuer in such circumstances should prove unfaithful to her marriage vow and have an illegitimate child, she can insist as in her own right in an action calling upon the alleged father to pay his share of the child's support. It must be kept in view that we are not dealing with a question of status at all, the only question that can arise is whether the pursuer can overcome the presumption, which exists in the case of a married woman if she gives birth to a child, that the father of the child is her husband.

Now, it is not doubtful that a woman in such circumstances as the pursuer is placed in here is entitled to deal with other persons in her own right, and to incur debt on her own account, indeed it is almost essential that she should be able to do so, and in law she has such a right, so that with the exception of matters affecting status she can act as if her husband was dead.

Now, this case raises a question of debt, and nothing else. The question is, whether a debt is due to the pursuer by the defender, because she has to take charge of and provide for the upbringing of the child. She calls upon the defender to pay his share of the expenses so caused as a debt which he owes to her. I therefore think we cannot sustain the preliminary pleas of the defender, and should adhere to the interlocutor in the Court below.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT subsequently pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact contained in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute; therefore dismiss the appeal," &c.

be entered in the log, which is to be delivered to the shipping-master at the port of destination, and also provides that the person charged shall before reaching port be furnished with a copy of the entry, and that his reply, if he makes any, shall also be noted. Wilful disobedience to a lawful order may be punished by imprisonment for four weeks, with hard labour.

The chief officer of a ship raised an action against the master of it, concluding for damages in respect of an entry in the log, made by the master, that the pursuer had "wilfully and intentionally disobeyed" his orders in allowing a particular seaman to steer. The pursuer stated in his condescendence that he had been ordered by the master, at eight o'clock in the evening, not to allow this particular seaman to steer; that at two in the morning, when the pursuer was on duty as officer of the watch he entirely forgot this order, and allowed that seaman to take the wheel; that the master coming on deck, and finding him at the wheel ordered the pursuer off duty, "without inviting or permitting any explanation"; that the master then made the entry in the log complained of, and handed a copy to the pursuer. He did not aver that he had tendered any explanation either at the time, or when the copy of the entry was handed to him.

Held (1) that the circumstances averred were such as to require the pursuer to put want of probable cause in issue, as well as malice, and (2) that as his averments disclosed a case in which the master had probable cause for his conduct, the action was irrelevant, and must be dismissed.

Ld. Wellwood.

THOMAS HILL, master mariner, raised an action against George Thomson, also a master mariner, concluding for £1000 of damages in respect of an alleged slander, contained in an entry dated 18th September 1891 in the log-book of s.s. "Feliciana," of Glasgow, when the pursuer was serving as first mate on board the "Feliciana," commanded by the defender. She had just completed a voyage from the St Lawrence to Dundee, and had left Dundee for London on 17th September.

The pursuer stated that "about eight o'clock" on the evening of that day, "when a seaman was at the wheel, named James Harty, the defender expressed to the pursuer his wish that Harty should not be permitted to steer the ship when his turn for wheel duty again came round. . . . About two o'clock on the morning of the following day, it again came to Harty's turn at the wheel, when pursuer was in charge of the ship. The said James Harty, who is a seaman of much experience, was thoroughly competent to steer said ship, and had regularly steered her without complaint throughout the voyage from Liverpool out and home. To this circumstance, and to the casual intimation of his order upon the day before by the defender, it was probably owing, but in any case it is the fact, that the pursuer for the time entirely forgot the verbal order he to any lawful command" any seaman "shall be liable to imprisonment for any period not exceeding four weeks, with or without hard labour."

By section 244 it is provided that any of the offences enumerated in section 243 shall on its commission be noted in the log-book, and signed by the master and the mate or one of the crew, and the offender, before the arrival of the vessel at the next port shall "either be furnished with a copy of such entry, or have the same read over distinctly and audibly to him, and may thereupon make such reply thereto as he thinks fit." It is also provided that a statement shall be entered in the log that the entry has been so read over, and that the reply, if any, shall also be entered.

Sections 280-1 prescribe the keeping of a log and the manner of it. Section 282 requires the master to enter in the official log, "(3) every offence for which punishment is inflicted on board, and the punishment inflicted." Section 283 imposes penalties for failure to keep the log as required, and section 286 provides that logs are to be delivered to the shipping master, a Government officer, at the port of destination in the United Kingdom, before the crew is discharged.

had received respecting the said James Harty, and permitted him to take the wheel. Sometime thereafter the defender came upon the bridge, and seeing the said James Harty at the wheel, instantly, and without inviting or permitting any explanation, ordered the pursuer off duty, upon the pretext that he had wilfully disobeyed the orders of the defender. The defender, at the time he gave said order, knew well, from his previous experience of the pursuer on board said vessel, that the pursuer was not guilty of wilful and intentional disobedience." Hill v. Thomson.

The pursuer further averred;—"Thereafter, upon the same day, the defender made the following entry in his official log, viz.:—'18 Sept. 1891.—3 h. 20 m. A.M., lat. 52° 52' N., long. 1° 36' E., 9 A.M., Sept. 1891.—This is to certify Mr Thomas Hill, chief officer, wilfully and intentionally disobeyed my orders in allowing James Harty, seaman, to steer the ship in narrow waters, seeing the said seaman was quite unable to steer, and the course he made with the ship could not be relied upon, and it was dangerous while he was at the helm to approach shipping; seeing such was the case, I ordered Mr Hill not to allow him there any more, but in the face of my instructions, and the care of the vessel, he, Mr Hill, allowed him to take the helm again, for which I knocked him off duty. GEO. THOMSON, Master.' The defender handed a copy of said entry to the pursuer. The said entry is false in fact, and a gross slander, in so far as it records that the pursuer was guilty of wilful and intentional disobedience to the defender's orders, and the defender well knew that it was slanderous and mendacious when he made it. The said entry was made, and the punishment foresaid was inflicted maliciously and without probable cause by the defender, with the deliberate intention of injuring the reputation of the pursuer in his profession, and particularly with his employers."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The statement complained of having been made by the defender maliciously and without probable cause, and the same being false and calumnious, the pursuer is entitled to solatium and damages, as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant. (2) Privilege.

The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 18th December 1891, repelled the defender's first plea in law, and assigned a day for the adjustment of issues.*

* "OPINION.— The pursuer admits that at eight o'clock p.m. on 17th September 1891 the defender ordered him not to allow Harty to steer the vessel when his next turn came. It is not disputed that this was a legitimate order for the defender to give; and it is not said that it was given with any sinister motive. The defender, as master of the ship and responsible for its safety, was undoubtedly entitled to give that order, and the pursuer was bound to obey it. But when Harty's turn came at two A.M. next morning the pursuer allowed him to take the wheel. He says that he forgot the order given to him by the defender. That may be true; I assume it to be true; but, prima facie, the pursuer's failure to obey the order was wilful, occurring, as it did, so soon after the order was given; and if the defender honestly believed it to be wilful, there is no doubt that he had probable cause for the charge he made against the pursuer.

"The pursuer avers, however, and offers to prove, that the defender did not bona fide believe that the pursuer's failure to obey the order was wilful, but made the charge of wilful disobedience in order to gratify the malice which he entertained against the pursuer. It may be difficult for the pursuer to establish this, because it will not be sufficient for him to prove antecedent malice unless the evidence of malice is of such a nature as to negative an honest belief in the charge on the part of the defender, which might quite well exist, however malicious the defender was; but I am not prepared to throw the action out without

son.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—In the circumstances the pursuer must take an issue of want of probable cause as well as of malice, and, if that were so, since the record disclosed a case of probable cause, the action was irrelevant. Now, the most recent and authoritative case on the necessity of putting in issue the want of probable cause was the case of Croucher v. Inglis.¹ Undoubtedly, on the authority of that case, a person who had a duty to inform was entitled to this protection, and, it was urged, so was a person who had a right only, provided that information was given in the proper quarter. In cases of judicial slander want of probable cause must go into the issue.² So, too, in cases of the wrongful use of arrestments.³ These were cases not of duties, but of rights merely. Lord Young in the case of Shaw v. Morgan,⁴ had noticed how the tendency of the law in recent years had been to extend the sphere of privilege. That there was a right in the defender here to do what he did was too plain for argument, but it was further submitted that there was a duty imposed upon the master by the Merchant Shipping Act quite as imperative as the moral duty under which the defender in Croucher v. Inglis was held to be protected. If then the relations of the parties required want of probable cause to be put in issue, the pursuer's record would not bear any such issue, for it plainly disclosed that the defender had probable cause for his conduct. He found a plain order disobeyed in the very next watch, and no excuse made for it, either at the time or when the copy of the entry was handed to the pursuer. The existence of probable cause was a matter to be determined by the Court and not by the jury.⁵

The pursuer argued;—The case of *Gibb v. Barron*⁶ shewed that the position and rights of a private individual were very different from those of a public officer, and it was only because the Court in Croucher v. Inglis thought that a minister was a public officer that they pronounced the judgment they did. Now, the captain here was not a public officer. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—But is he not bound to make this entry? That might be so, but not to add that the disobedience was wilful and intentional, unless he satisfied himself by some inquiry that that truly was the character of the offence. He was to record facts, and not inferences of his own from these facts. The question whether there was or was not probable cause was a question for the jury, and the Court, if it took upon itself to judge of probabilities, was usurping the functions of the jury.⁷ Recent decisions did not bear out the defender's statement that want of probable cause must go into issue in all cases in which the defender had a right to make the statement complained of, e.g. in judicial slander.]

allowing him an opportunity of proving, if he can, that the charge was not honestly made. If the whole of the essential facts were disclosed, the case might be disposed of now; but the facts of the case cannot be said to be fully before the Court when it is not known whether the charge of wilful disobedience was made in good faith or not."

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is important in this case to see exactly how the facts stand as they are averred by the pursuer. His case is that he, being chief officer on board the “Feliciana,” of which the defender was master, received an order from the defender that a certain seaman was not to be put to the wheel ; as a matter of fact in the very next watch, when the pursuer was officer on duty, the captain, coming on deck, found this very seaman at the wheel. The captain at once ordered the chief officer below, and made this entry in his log : “This is to certify Mr Thomas Hill, chief officer, wilfully and intentionally disobeyed my orders in allowing James Harty, seaman, to steer the ship in narrow waters, seeing the said seaman was quite unable to steer, and the course he made with the ship could not be relied upon, and it was dangerous while he was at the helm to approach shipping ; seeing such was the case, I ordered Mr Hill not to allow him there any more, but in the face of my instructions, and the care of the vessel, he, Mr Hill, allowed him to take the helm again, for which I knocked him off duty.” This entry was duly made in obedience to the statute, and was signed by the master and another seaman, a copy of it being then and there handed to the chief officer.

The record does not indicate that the pursuer gave any explanation at all of what was, as his own record states, a breach of the master’s orders.

The pursuer raises this action of damages in respect of the statements thus made about him, and the question between the parties is whether the case is or is not of such a character that the pursuer, besides putting malice in the issue, must also put in it want of probable cause.

To determine that question we must see what are the positions and the relations of the parties on record. There is no doubt at all that the master was bound to record in the log any wilful disobedience of an order of importance touching the safety of the vessel and the crew. The record of any such occurrence may be followed up by proceedings of a criminal nature, for a person guilty of wilful disobedience is, under the Merchant Shipping Act, liable to imprisonment with hard labour. There cannot, therefore, be a doubt that, if the captain believed that his orders had been wilfully and intentionally disobeyed, he was bound to record that. Plainly, then, unless there was a want of probable cause, the master was acting in the execution of his duty.

The next point is whether there is any fact set forth here to warrant the inference that the master had not probable cause for doing what he did. It is stated by the pursuer that the master gave an order relating to an important matter, affecting the safety of the ship, and that, coming on deck in the very next watch he found that this order had been disobeyed. It is impossible to conceive that he had not probable cause for thinking that the pursuer had disobeyed his orders wilfully and intentionally.

I am therefore for holding that the action should be dismissed. Looking to the variation which there has been in the decisions of the Court on the question of what circumstances require the insertion of want of probable cause in the issue, it was necessary to have a very full debate, but I am clearly of the opinion which I have just expressed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am satisfied that, if we were to adjust an issue here, we must insert the words, “and without probable cause.” But I think that the record discloses in the very clearest manner that there was probable cause, and consequently, I think, the action is irrelevant.

No. 78. LORD TRAYNER.—The first question is, whether the pursuer is bound to put in issue “want of probable cause,” as well as malice, and I agree with your Lordships that he is.

Jan. 16, 1892.
Hill v. Thom-
son.

There seems, as your Lordship has said, to be some difficulty in determining, according to the older cases on the subject, what exactly is the rule or principle on which these words are or are not required to be put in issue. But the recent case of Croucher v. Inglis (16 R. 774) seems to afford a rule on the subject, which I am prepared to adopt. I venture to express my concurrence with the opinion there expressed by Lord Shand, viz., that “where there is a duty, or rather a right” on the part of the writer, to write and send the writing complained of, in such a case “the issue which the pursuer takes must embrace malice and want of probable cause.” The more limited view of the Lord President in the same case would, however, if applied here, lead to the same result. For in the present case the defender stood in the position of a public official charged by statute with the duty of entering in his official log any act of wilful disobedience on the part of any member of the crew, and of reporting to the public authorities such entries by delivery of the log itself, within forty-eight hours after his arrival in port. Indeed this case would be covered by the rule which required want of probable cause to be put in issue in all cases where the ground of action was that information had been given to the public authorities that a crime had been committed.

The wilful disobedience of orders on board ship is a crime under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and the defender in reporting it to the public authorities would have been entitled to the protection afforded by the words “want of probable cause,” had there been no duty on him to make the report beyond the duty, which every citizen has, of making such a report.

But the duty on the defender to make the entry now complained of in the log-book, and to report it to the public authority, was more than a moral duty. It is imposed upon him by statute, and a failure on his part to perform that duty would have subjected him in a penalty.

Whether, therefore, the older and more limited rule is applied, or the more recent and wider rule of Croucher v. Inglis, I think that the pursuer in this case is bound to put in issue that the report complained of was made, not only maliciously but also without probable cause.

The next question is—Can the pursuer be allowed such an issue in this case? I think not. The pursuer's statements shew beyond any question that the defender had probable cause for believing and saying that the pursuer had been guilty of wilful disobedience, and it is remarkable that the pursuer did not offer to the defender any explanation of his conduct which might have altered or modified the defender's view of that conduct, either at the time when he was ordered off duty on account of his disobedience, or at the time when he was furnished with a copy of the entry made in the log. Without any explanation offered or made, the defender could come to no other conclusion than that the pursuer's disobedience was wilful. I am therefore for refusing any issue, and think that the defender should have absolvitor.

Reparation—Slander—Newspaper—Innuendo.—Terms of an anonymous letter in a newspaper with reference to the state of a public school which were held to entitle the master of the school to an issue whether it represented that the pursuer was unfit for his post, and that it was the duty of the board to dismiss him.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege.—Held (following Brims v. Reid, 12 R. 1016) that the publisher of a newspaper, who has refused to disclose the name of the writer of an anonymous letter to the editor, cannot plead privilege in answer to an action of damages for slanderous statements in the letter.

JAMES M'KERCHAR, the head-master of the public school at Ballachulish, brought an action of damages for libel against Duncan Cameron, the printer and publisher of the Oban Times, for publishing in the Oban Times of 17th October 1891, the following letter:—“Lismore and Appin School Board.—(To the Editor, Oban Times.)—Sir,—The reports of schools under this board have not yet been made public, and, as was indicated by ‘Poor Man and Ratepayer,’ in your issue of 3d curt., the ratepayers are getting impatient, and no wonder. It is now rumoured that the report in the case of one or more of the schools is so bad that the board are ashamed to publish it. If to screen one school the whole of the reports are withheld, it is time the ratepayers took steps to enforce their rights. I wonder if it is the case, as it is rumoured, that the Ballachulish School is at the bottom of the poll this year again; if so, how long is this state of matters to be allowed to go on? Are the interests of the public to be sacrificed for the sake of providing a house and salary for a teacher? I am, &c. ANOTHER RATEPAYER.”

The pursuer averred,—“The letter above quoted is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely, maliciously, and calumniously represents, and was intended by the publication thereof as aforesaid to represent (1) that the report upon the public school at Ballachulish by the Government inspector was so bad that the school board were ashamed to publish it; that, to screen the said school, the whole of the reports of the Government inspector were withheld; (2) that in consequence of the incompetency or fault of the pursuer the said school was at the bottom of the poll this year, as it had been in former years, that is, that it was the worst in point of results of all the schools examined; (3) that the interests of the public in connection with the said school were being sacrificed solely for the sake of providing a house and salary for the pursuer; and (4) that the pursuer was unfit for his post as teacher of a public school, and that it was the duty of the School Board of Ballachulish, in the interests of the ratepayers, to dismiss him from it. The said statements and representations are false and calumnious, and were maliciously made with the view of ruining, or at least seriously injuring, the professional reputation of the pursuer, and destroying his usefulness as the teacher of a public school.” He further stated that he had called upon the defender to disclose the name of the writer of the letter, but that this information had been refused.

The defender in answer stated, inter alia,—“Explained that the matters referred to in said letter were matters of public interest and importance to the ratepayers and inhabitants of Ballachulish and neighbourhood. It was believed that the reports of Her Majesty’s Inspector of Schools on the schools under the Ballachulish School Board for the preceding year had been received by the said board before said letter appeared, and they had not then been made public. The said ratepayers and inhabitants had an interest and a right to know the contents of the said reports, and the letter complained of was inserted in said newspaper solely for the purpose of inducing the said board to publish the said reports, as they were bound to do. The contents of said letter are a fair comment on a matter of public importance; they are not defamatory, and are privileged." He added, that for some time there had been a considerable amount of dissatisfaction among the ratepayers of Ballachulish owing to the condition of the school. "The report for the year 1890-91, though then, it is believed, for some time in the hands of the school board, had not been published, and this fact was causing dissatisfaction in the district. It was in these circumstances that said letter was written, its purpose being solely, as above stated, to procure publication of said report. The defender, however, believes and avers that at the date when said letter was written the pursuer was unfit for his post as teacher of said school."

The defender pleaded;—(2) The letter complained of is not defamatory; and, separatim, it is privileged. (3) The said letter being a fair criticism on a public matter, and not being slanderous, the defender should be absolved. (4) Veritas.

The following was the issue for the pursuer, approved by the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy),—"It being admitted that the defender published in the Oban Times of date the 17th October 1891 the letter set forth in the annexed schedule, whether the said letter is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer was unfit for his post as teacher of a public school, and that it was the duty of the school board, in the interests of the ratepayers, to dismiss him from it, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £1000."

His Lordship also approved of the counter issue,—"Whether, at or about the date when the letter libelled on was written, the pursuer was unfit for his post as teacher of the said public school at Ballachulish?"

* "OPINION.—I think the issue proposed by the pursuer in this case must be allowed.

"1. As to the reasonableness of the innuendo, I do not require to consider what view the jury may take of the meaning of the letter. They may, when they hear the evidence, consider that what was really meant by the writer was only this—that the school board were perpetrating a job by keeping a school open in this locality. But, in the meantime, I have only to consider whether the innuendo is so extravagant and unreasonable as to make it useless to send the case to trial. I cannot say that I think this is so. On the contrary, I rather think that, prima facie, the innuendo is justified.

"2. I am not prepared to hold that to impute to the teacher of a public school that he is unfit for his post is not defamatory and actionable. It is settled that it is defamatory to impute to a professional man incapacity in the exercise of his profession, and I have not been satisfied by anything I have heard that there is a sound distinction between the two cases. There may, of course, be a difference as regards privilege; and malice may be more readily presumed in the one case than in the other; but assuming malice, presumed or proved, I do not see why the imputation complained of should not be actionable.

"3. With respect to the question of privilege, I need only refer to the opinions of the Court in the comparatively recent case of Brims v. Reid, 12 R. 1016. Here, as there, the alleged slander is contained in an anonymous letter addressed to a newspaper, the printer of which refuses to disclose the writer's name. That being so, I must hold, as the Court held in that case, that there is no room for the defence of privilege, so as to make it necessary to put malice in issue.

"With respect to the counter issue, I have heard nothing against it, and shall accordingly allow it."

No. 79.

The defender reclaimed.

The three points argued sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of the Lord President.¹ On the case of Brims, it was argued for the reclaimer that malice had not been put in issue there because the writer of the article had attacked the private life of the pursuer.

Jan. 19, 1892.
M'Kerchar v.
Cameron.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion. Upon the first question, it is to be observed that all that the pursuer requires to make out at this stage is that the letter complained of is susceptible of the interpretation he assigns to it. It is quite true that the letter purports to state, or to conjecture, the effect of a report of the Government Inspector of Schools. It is conceivable that, even granting that the school is in a deplorably bad condition, that may not be due to the incompetency of the teacher. It might be accounted for by the paucity of scholars, or by their absence from illness, or to other causes which one may figure. That is quite intelligible. But the writer, in the last sentence of the letter, certainly goes a long way towards indicating a specific cause for the alleged defective state of the school. He says—"Are the interests of the public to be sacrificed for the sake of providing a house and salary for a teacher?" That seems to me to afford ample basis for the pursuer's allegation that he will be able to make out to a jury that the letter contains a covert attack upon his competency. I therefore think that the Lord Ordinary was quite right in allowing the issue.

The next question is whether malice must be inserted in the issue. Several questions of great interest and of wide social importance have been mooted during the discussion,—the question, for example, whether a member of the public, in attacking any person holding any office under any public body, can shelter himself behind the plea of privilege. But I do not think such questions arise, or rather are open for decision in the present case; because the case of Brims v. Reid affords us a clear ground of judgment where the defence of privilege is pleadable by reason of the occasion upon which the alleged slander was spoken or written, and the relation of the writer to the subject-matter of which he speaks. What was the position of the writer of this letter? So far from our having any information about him, we have not even been told who he is, and the libel therefore must be held to be the letter of someone who has no ascertainable identity, and no duty or responsibility or relation to the subject. Accordingly, the whole reasoning of Brims' case applies, irrespective altogether of the difference in the nature of the attack made upon the pursuer in that action.

What the Court in that case held was that it is impossible to allow the defence of privilege in a case where the libel is an anonymous letter in a newspaper, and the writer is undisclosed. I therefore think the plea of privilege is inadmissible, and that malice ought not to be put in issue.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—The first defence to this action is that the libel can bear no other meaning than that it is an imputation on the school board, who are blamed

But the letter ends by suggesting that the school board are condoning the inefficiency of the teacher, because they are unwilling to deprive him of his house and salary. I think there can be no doubt that it is a fair question for a jury to consider whether that does not amount to an imputation upon the teacher.

M'Kerchar v.
Cameron.

On the question of privilege, I scarcely think that the present action raises directly the point how far a ratepayer, or an inhabitant in a district, is entitled to indulge in public criticism of the capacity and character of salaried officials within his district, and how far there may be privilege to make such comments. We know that there are many degrees of privilege. There is the privilege of counsel in the conduct of a case, where observations upon the conduct of persons are privileged, even although they may be irrelevant. The exigencies of a defence make it necessary that counsel should sometimes be irrelevant, and they are protected if in such circumstances they should say what may be hurtful to others. There is also the lesser privilege given to persons who are laying information before the public authorities, and there "probable cause" is an excuse. There is the case of an elector at a public meeting, who has a duty to express his opinion as to the fitness of a candidate; and there is the still lower privilege of a master giving a character to a servant. Although a master has no duty, and may refuse to give a character if he likes, yet he is held to be in the exercise of a right provided he gives the opinion honestly and without malice. The present case seems to be even lower than any of these, because it is difficult to see what duty or right there is on the part of a member of the public, as such, to criticise the conduct of a public servant who is in the public employment. But for the reasons given by your Lordship in the chair, founded on the case of Brims, I think it is a sufficient and satisfactory ground of judgment that there never can be privilege where the newspaper, which publishes the letter, refuses to disclose the name of its correspondent. There is in such a case no known relation which will raise the plea of privilege.

THE COURT adhered.

Jan. 19, 1892. NORTH OF SCOTLAND STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.—Comrie Thomson—
Walker v. Aitken.

Ship—Salvage—Remuneration for services.—In an action for payment of £100 as salvage services rendered near Aberdeen by a small boat about 9 o'clock on the evening of 21st June, to a passenger steamer which had run aground upon a rock in a dangerous neighbourhood in a dense fog, it was proved that the boat had been the first to come to the steamer's assistance, and was instrumental in passing a hawser from the steamer to a tug, which came to her assistance soon after, and which towed her into harbour. The Sheriff-substitute fixed the value of the services at £10, and on appeal by the pursuers the Court (Lord M'Laren) refused to increase the award.

1ST DIVISION. ON 21st June 1891, about nine o'clock in the evening, the steamship "Queen," belonging to the North of Scotland Steam Navigation Company, arrived in Aberdeen Bay on her voyage from the north to Leith with passengers, mails, and goods. There was a dense fog at the time, and the "Queen" lost her way, and was carried past the entrance to the harbour southwards towards the rocks off Girdleness. Her master finding his vessel upon a rock fired guns of distress, which were heard on shore. A boat put off from the land end of the north pier, and was taken in tow by a steam-tug, which had also been attracted by the signal guns. The boat was thrown off by the tug when the bar was crossed. The "Queen" was a short distance off, but could not be seen for the fog. After rowing from ten minutes to a quarter of an hour the small boat came first in sight of the "Queen," and went alongside. The tug soon after came in sight, and the master of the "Queen" asked the boatmen to pass a hawser from the "Queen" to the tug-boat. The "Queen" was then towed off the rock, one plate only being damaged. A second tug-boat had come up, and had also assisted.

The "Queen."

William Forbes Walker, and five other men, who had manned the boat, sued the owners of the "Queen" in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen for £100 for salvage services. The pursuers stated that when the services were rendered there was a dense fog, and that a heavy sea was running, and there was a strong tide, and that the risk and danger to the "Queen" and themselves had been great; that the "Queen" had grounded amidships when the tide was full, and near dangerous rocks, but that she came off quite easily when the tow-rope was attached to the tug.

In addition to the facts above narrated, it appeared from the proof that the fog was very heavy, but was the only cause of danger, and there was no wind nor sea.

William Nicolson, master of the "Queen," deponed,—“There was no risk to the small boats so far as the sea was concerned, unless they came upon rocks. . . .” Cross-examined.—“I knew I was on the Girdleness. I was not sure of what shallows might be round about me. I did not know the exact spot. I kept my own boats up for the benefit of my own passengers, in case the ship filled with water before assistance came. I think the tug acted on the safest principle in what she did, by getting a small boat to pass her hawser. Mr Walker offered to pass the rope, and I was quite willing to take his assistance. I could have done it with one of my own boats.”

Alexander Paterson, an Aberdeen pilot, who was in another small boat which had put out, and who was examined for the defenders, deponed,—“There was a bit of swell, but nothing to speak of. . . . The people in our boat were in some danger. We might have got some harm from the 'Queen' or from the 'John MacConnochie,'” the tug-boat, “owing to the thick weather. We might have run among the rocks, as we did not know where we were. Captain Nicolson told me after he had got into the harbour that he was glad to see the boats when they came.”

The “Queen” had about thirty passengers, twenty-eight of a crew, and the Shetland mails on board when the accident happened. Her value was £5500.

The claim of the two tugs for the salvage services they had rendered was settled for £100, and a judicial offer of £10 was made to the pursuers.

After a proof the Sheriff-substitute (Grierson), on 24th November 1891, gave decree for £10 against the defenders, and because of the judicial offer gave decree for £20, 5s. 4d. of expenses against the pursuers.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The award of £10 was quite inadequate looking to the risk incurred by the salvors, and the nature of the salvage services rendered. They were the first to come to the “Queen’s” assistance, which was always an important element.¹

Walker v.
North of Scotland Steam Navigation Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is probably always difficult in such cases for different minds to arrive at the same figure in estimating the value of the services rendered in a case of salvage. The Legislature has confided the settlement of such matters, in the first instance (in cases like this), to the Sheriff-substitute; and in the present case the inquiry seems to have been conducted in a painstaking way, and the facts were fully before him. I think it fair to say that it appears to me his award is somewhat on the meagre side, but at the same time he was possessed of all the facts, and had local knowledge of the existing conditions which we have not.

The services were rendered not in any solitary or remote place, but at the mouth of the harbour of Aberdeen, and they were not such as could not have been rendered by anyone else,—by the “Queen’s” own boats, for instance. The facts are very simple. Walker, who is one of the pursuers, says that he was standing with the other pursuers at the end of the north pier on an evening which he describes as being “such that I have often gone for a pleasure sail upon a sea similar to it.” It is true that there was a dense fog at the time, but the pursuers were thoroughly acquainted with the place, which was just outside the harbour mouth. The service rendered was of the easiest description, viz., the passing of a hawser from the “Queen” to the tug, which was to tow her off, and it was rather as a matter of convenience than of necessity that the assistance of the small boat was asked at all. That is the whole matter, and there is nothing which imparts anything of a peculiarly meritorious nature to the character of the assistance given.

Accordingly, it is only within very moderate limits that a difference of opinion can occur as to what is suitable remuneration for these services. On the one hand, it is the duty of the Court to do nothing which will discourage the laudable helpfulness and courage which ought to prevail at our ports; but on the other hand, it would be a most unfortunate thing if we were to assume a mean standard of courage on the part of the fishing or seafaring population at these places.

I find, however, one solution of the pecuniary value of these services which appears to me to be adequate. I take the pursuers’ own estimate of the consideration they place upon them. They came into Court suing for £100, upon the footing, as set forth in their averments, that the weather was very unfavourable to navigation, and there was a heavy sea and strong tide, causing great personal risk to themselves and their boat. If £100 is the estimate put upon the exaggerated services described in the summons, what is the sum appropriate to the prosaic facts which we find proved in the evidence? Certainly, £25 would be a liberal if £10 is a small award, and that being so, and the question lying within these limits, I think it would be contrary to the policy of the statute to interfere with the award of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred with the Lord President, their

The "Queen."

LORD M'LAREN stated that he had formed a very definite opinion that the sum awarded by the Sheriff-substitute was quite inadequate, and that a sum of between £30 and £50 would have been fair remuneration, taking into account the fact that the "Queen" was in serious peril, and that she might have broken her back if not rescued before the tide receded.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

Trust—Charitable trust—Sale of trust property.—In 1885 a working-men's institute was established by voluntary subscription in a small town, the constitution of the institute being embodied in a trust-deed, under which the property of the buildings was vested in trustees. The institute was maintained by annual subscriptions from the members. In 1889 a native of the place, who was resident abroad, died leaving the residue of his estate to the magistrates for the purpose of establishing and maintaining an institution also for the benefit of working-men. The trustees of the earlier institute, believing that it would be impossible for their institute to coexist along with the new endowed institution, entered into an arrangement with the magistrates under which the institute buildings were sold to the magistrates at their cost price, the magistrates undertaking in the disposition to continue the buildings in their former uses. Thereafter certain working-men of the town brought an action against the institute trustees and also against the magistrates, as trustees under the bequest, for reduction of the sale, on the ground that it was ultra vires of both sets of trustees, and for interdict against the institute trustees distributing the price among the subscribers. In defence the institute trustees stated, inter alia, that they had no intention of distributing the price except with the authority of the Court. The Court dismissed the action, holding that the sale was legal and proper in the circumstances, and that, in respect of the statement of the institute trustees, interdict should not be granted.

IN 1885 certain persons resident in Moffat and the neighbourhood sub-1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Wellwood.scribed for the purpose of establishing a reading-room and institute there for the benefit of working-men. A provisional committee having been appointed, a site was obtained and buildings, including a reading-room and a gymnasium, were erected at a cost of £1745. The Institute was opened in 1886.

In the trust-deed, which contained the constitution and rules of the Institute, twelve of the subscribers to the fund, who had been chosen by the body of the subscribers, were named trustees. By the terms of the trust it was provided that the whole property, heritable and moveable, belonging to or which might be acquired by the Institute should be vested in the trustees and their successors in office; the Institute was to be designated "The Moffat Working-Men's Institute"; and "its primary object" was declared to be "to afford facilities to working-men for social intercourse, mutual improvement, instruction, and rational recreation."

No. 81. Only paying members were entitled to the privileges of the Institute, but the committee had power under the rules to admit bona fide working-men above the age of eighteen, who were not members, to the reading-room at a small charge for each visit. The trustees had power to revise the constitution, and to readapt it when necessary to the general purposes of the trust. The trust-deed did not give the trustees power to sell heritage.

Simpson v.
Trustees of Moffat Working-Men's Institute.

In 1890 William Proudfoot, a native of Moffat who had settled in Natal, died leaving a last will and testament, by which he left the residue of his estate (amounting to over £12,000) "at the disposal of the provost and bailies of the town of Moffat, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, to be applied to the benefit of the working-men of Moffat. My wishes will be complied with if this money is laid out on a reading-room, in connection with which refreshments on temperance principles are supplied at a low cost."

On hearing of this bequest the Institute trustees, believing it to be impossible that the Institute, which depended on annual subscriptions, could exist, in a place of the size of Moffat, alongside of a free institution with identical objects, proposed to the Magistrates of Moffat, as trustees under the Proudfoot bequest, that the Institute should in future be managed by a joint trust composed of the magistrates and some of the Institute trustees, the Proudfoot funds being applied in support of the Institute. To this the magistrates objected, on the ground that it would be ultra vires of them, under the Proudfoot bequest, to allow any other persons to be joined in the management of the funds. They, however, proposed that the Institute buildings should be made over to them on payment of their cost price. To this proposal the Institute trustees agreed after obtaining the assent of all the subscribers, and the buildings were disposed for £1745 to the magistrates, who in the disposition practically undertook that the buildings should be used in like manner as before.

On 20th May 1891 David Simpson, stonedyker, Moffat, and eight other persons, designing themselves as "working-men resident in Moffat, as individuals, and as a committee chosen at a meeting of the working-men of Moffat, held within the Baths Hall there, on 2d May 1891, to represent them," brought an action against Robert Hannah Begg and others, the trustees of the Institute, and also against Thomas Kennedy and the other magistrates of Moffat, as the Proudfoot trustees, concluding for reduction of the sale of the Institute; for declarator that the defenders the Institute trustees were not entitled to sell the property of the Institute to the other defenders and to apply the price otherwise than for the purposes of the trust; for decree ordaining the Institute trustees to repay the sum of £1745 to the other defenders, failing which, for decree ordaining the other defenders, the Proudfoot trustees, personally to repay the said sum to their own trust; and for interdict against the Institute trustees paying over the said price to the subscribers to the Institute funds.

The pursuers (after setting forth the circumstances already narrated) stated;—(Cond. 5) "The defenders the Proudfoot Endowment trustees have thus paid away out of the funds, which they hold for the benefit of the working-men of Moffat, a sum of £1745 for a property which already belonged to, or was held for the benefit of, the working-men of Moffat, and this they have done in spite of very strongly expressed opposition thereto by the working-men of the town. The working-men being desirous, if possible, to avoid disputes that might end in litigation, tried to get a guarantee that the proceeds of the sale of the institution, which was built by public subscription for the benefit of the working-men of Moffat, should be applied for their behoof. They have ascertained, however, that the magistrates have paid over this large sum of money to the Institute trustees without any restriction as to the purpose to which it would be applied.

and their suspicions that the fund would be misapplied have been confirmed by a statement which has been issued by the said Reverend A. R. MacEwen, on behalf of the Institute trustees, in which he says that the said sum of £1745 belongs to the subscribers, and may be claimed by them, and it is believed that the Institute trustees are about to raise an action of multiplepinding to distribute the said sum among the subscribers." (Cond. 6) "Immediately on the sale of the Institute becoming known, great dissatisfaction was created among the working-men of Moffat. There was no necessity for the sale. As it was suitable for its purpose, the working-men already had it, without £1745 of their funds being given for it. The price paid by the Proudfoot trustees for the Institute was much beyond its value, and known by both sets of defenders to be so. The sale was never consented to or approved of by the working-men of Moffat, who alone had the beneficial interest in the subjects."

The defenders the Institute trustees in their defences stated, inter alia; — "That had the present proceedings not been commenced, they would have raised an action of multiplepinding for distribution of the proceeds of the sale. The defenders are now, and all along have been, anxious that the balance of the price should be utilised for the benefit of the community of Moffat, and they have reason to believe that this end will be attained."

The defenders the Proudfoot trustees stated "that they bought said Institute after very careful consideration as to how they might best carry the intentions of the testator, Mr Proudfoot, into effect, and after consideration of different representations made to them. . . . The defenders, when they purchased said building, saw none more suitable in Moffat that they could obtain. It had been used, and was and is eminently adapted for the very purpose contemplated by the testator. . . . In acquiring it, they were influenced by the fact that in Moffat it was useless and inexpedient that there should be two reading-rooms for the benefit of working-men. The population of Moffat is 2000 or thereby. . . . The price (£1745) paid by the defenders for the said building, including furnishing within the previous years, was what the same originally cost."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The sale of the property belonging to the Moffat Working-Men's Institute, by the trustees thereof, to the trustees of the Proudfoot Endowment, being ultra vires of the Institute trustees, and illegal, the same, and the deeds constituting it, ought to be reduced. (2) The trustees of the Proudfoot Endowment having, without authority or right, paid away funds held by them for the benefit of the working-men of Moffat in the purchase of what was already held in trust for them, the said purchase was ultra vires and illegal, and ought to be set aside. (3) The defenders the trustees of the Moffat Working-Men's Institute are bound to apply the whole funds and property of the Institute to the benefit of the working-men of Moffat, in terms of the constitution and rules of the Institute trust, and decree of declarator to that effect ought to be pronounced. (4) The Institute trustees are not entitled to sell the property of the Institute and apply the proceeds otherwise than to the purposes of the trust under which they act, and the pursuers are entitled to have it so found and declared. (5) The said sale being set aside, the defenders the trustees of the Moffat Working-Men's Institute are bound to repay the price of the subjects to the trustees of the Proudfoot Endowment, and decree of repetition ought to be pronounced as concluded for. (6) Failing decree of repetition as craved, or in the event of the Institute trustees failing to make payment to the trustees of the Proudfoot Endowment of the said sum of £1745, 2s. 4d., the defenders the said Thomas Kennedy, James Hall Black, and Robert Knight, are liable as individuals, jointly and severally, to pay the said sum to the trustees of the Proudfoot Endowment. (7) The subscribers to the said Institute have no right to payment of the funds of the Institute, and the defenders the Institute trustees ought, in any event, to be interdicted from paying over to them any part of the price of the Institute, and from applying it otherwise than for the benefit of the working-men of Moffat.

The Institute trustees pleaded ;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusion of the summons. (3) The transaction challenged having been within the powers of the defenders, they are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

The Proudfoot trustees pleaded ;—(1) No title to sue. (2) Action incompetent, and, separatim, irrelevant. (3) The said disposition having been granted by the said trustees after the consent and concurrence of the subscribers to said Institute had been obtained to the sale, the present action ought to be dismissed, with expenses. (4) On a sound construction of said last will and testament, the present defenders were entitled to acquire said Institute for the purposes set forth in the disposition thereof in their favour, and decree of absolvitor ought to be pronounced, with expenses.

On 11th August the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced this interlocutor :—" Dismisses the action, reserving to the pursuers all claims competent to them as to the application of the sum of £1745, 2s. 4d., being the purchase price of the subjects described in the summons, and decerns : Finds the defenders entitled to expenses." *

* "OPINION.— . . . The case is peculiar, and I think a broad view must be taken of it. The pursuers have plainly no interest to object to the sale of the Institute to the Proudfoot trustees, taken by itself, because the Institute is still to be carried on as before, free of charge, I understand, and by a body of trustees possessed of ample funds.

"The pursuers' interest, if they have a title to enforce it, lies in the application of the purchase price. The defenders maintained that the Institute was merely a voluntary association, which could be dissolved at any time with the consent of the subscribers and the paying members—if indeed the consent of the latter was required. This is a doubtful proposition, because the subscribers appear to have created what, ex facie, is a permanent trust for the benefit of working-men. But I do not think it necessary to decide this point, which involves a question with the original subscribers, because I hold that the pursuers have no interest, and therefore no title to object to the transference above, or, to put it otherwise, that they have not stated any relevant grounds for setting the sale aside.

"In judging of the reasonableness of the sale, it is right to remember that it was effected with the unanimous consent of all who, for the time, had a voice in the management, or share in the benefits of the Institute, viz., the trustees, the subscribers, and the paying members of the Institute; that the pursuers were none of these—they never even availed themselves of the opportunity of becoming members of the Institute; that the purposes of the constitution did not include the unconditional admission of working-men—payment being essential even to membership; and that the trustees could, at any general or special meeting, have raised the annual payments as they thought fit, or in other ways revised and readapted the constitution when necessary to the general purposes of the Institute; thus, even if, strictly speaking, the trustees had no power to sell without authority of the Court, the circumstances were such as would, in all likelihood, have ensured such authority being given. Owing to the threatened formation of a rival free reading Institute, the trustees found themselves obliged to abandon the particular scheme which had been selected for the improvement and recreation of working-men. If the Proudfoot trustees had established another reading-room, the Institute trustees could not

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuers had a title to sue. No. 81.
 It was true that they were not members of the Institute, but they belonged to the class intended to be benefited, and that was enough in the case of a charitable trust.¹ The sale of the Institute was ultra vires of the Institute trustees. They held the buildings for a specific purpose, which had not failed, and as it was not alleged that the buildings had become unsuitable for that purpose, they had no power to sell them. It was irrelevant that the institution which the Proudfoot trustees were directed to establish might have the effect of practically extinguishing the Institute. That was not a ground entitling the Institute trustees to sell at their own hands and then extinguish the trust;² although if in the result things turned have carried on the Institute, because subscribers would naturally have dropped off. They, therefore, made the best bargain they could, and succeeded in recovering the cost of the Institute. What is to be done with that money is another matter, which I do not mean to prejudge. The pursuers have an interest, and may have a title, to be heard hereafter as to its application.

"In regard to the demand that, standing the sale, the Proudfoot trustees should replace the money, a separate or additional view may be taken as to the pursuers' position. They are entitled, no doubt, to see that the Proudfoot residuary funds are administered for their benefit; but their averments of misappropriation of the funds on the part of the trustees are not, in my opinion, relevant. What is the practical result of the transaction complained of? The working-men of Moffat have, as I have said, not only still got the full benefit of the Institute, but they have got it, I understand, free of charge. So far, they have actually benefited by the change, and have no interest to complain. But, they say, the Proudfoot trustees need not have spent £1745 or any other sum in buying the Institute. They should have co-operated with the other defenders, and arranged some joint scheme by which this outlay should have been saved. The question, however, is not whether the Proudfoot trustees would have acted more judiciously and more beneficially for the working-men had they done so; but whether they acted illegally in doing what they did. Now, the trustees thought that they were virtually directed and certainly entitled to apply the residue as suggested by the testator; and they have also thought that they were not entitled, in so doing, to divide the control of the reading-room to be established with any other body of trustees. Assuming that the Institute trustees had full power to sell, and were willing to do so, could the Proudfoot trustees have been restrained from buying? Would a Court of law have compelled the two sets of trustees to frame a joint scheme? I think not. I think it was fairly within the discretion and powers of the trustees to resolve not to content themselves with simply supplementing the existing Institute, and not to join a mixed trust of doubtful legality. If so, no loss was caused by the purchase of the Institute which could legally have been prevented. Two rival Institutes could not have existed together; the non-paying establishment would have ruined the other, which in that case also would have had to be sold in the end.

"Assuming that the pursuers have a title to question the actings of the Institute trustees in regard to the future application of the £1745, no sufficient grounds exist for, at present at least, granting interdict as craved; because the Institute trustees do not intend to pay the money back to the subscribers without the order of the Court. A multipiepinding may perhaps be necessary if any of the subscribers demand repayment of their subscriptions. But, so far as I can see, most of the subscribers are anxious, even though not bound, to apply the money for the good of the working-men. I venture to express the hope which I formerly expressed, that, instead of prolonging this litigation, parties may amicably arrange as to the application of the money."

out as they alleged would be the case, that might be a ground for coming to the Court for directions.¹ Then the Proudfoot trustees were not entitled to buy the buildings with their trust money. Their duty was to establish an Institute in terms of their trust, not expend the trust money in buying buildings already dedicated to a practically identical purpose. The only object in paying the money was that it might be handed over to the original donors, or given over to some other trust than the original Institute trust, for if the money was to be retained for the original trust it might as well not have been paid at all, and the buildings handed over for nothing.

Argued for the Institute trustees;—The pursuers had no title to sue. They had neither contributed to the funds of the Institute nor made use of its benefits. The sale was within the power of these defenders. In the whole circumstances, it was inexpedient to continue to apply the money to the original purposes, and the trustees had under their deed power to alter the application of the money. The subscriptions had been voluntary, and there was no irrevocable dedication of the money to this one purpose.² It was not proposed to do anything with the money except under the authority of the Court.

The Proudfoot trustees argued that in buying the buildings they were acting within their powers.³

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Various interesting and important topics were touched upon in the debate before us although not very fully argued, but the questions requiring discussion under the summons are comparatively limited. With the exception of one conclusion, the summons is directed solely against the sale of the building of the Working-Men's Institute of Moffat by the trustees to whom it belonged, to the trustees of the Proudfoot Endowment. Now, I can not say I think that the legality of this sale is open to successful attack, even if there had been conceded to the pursuers for the sake of argument almost the trust law upon which they found.

I shall take first the case of the trustees of the Working-Men's Institute who are the sellers. Let it be that a perpetual trust has been constituted for the purpose set out in the printed rules, let it be that the pursuers have a good title to insist for fulfilment of these trust purposes, although I pronounce upon neither proposition,—even upon these assumptions it seems to me that in the event which has happened and which is set out by the pursuers, namely, the establishment of the Proudfoot Endowment, the continuance of the Working-Men's Institute as a reading-room was demonstrated to be impossible, and that if the trustees had not made the bargain they did they would very soon have had to close the Institute, probably after losing money or running into debt. This conclusion seems to me irresistible, for the simple reason that in this very limited community it would be idle to expect that the Proudfoot Endowment which afforded for nothing to exactly the same class exactly the same thing only on a larger scale, would not extinguish the paying membership of the Working-Men's Institute. The trustees of the Institute did, what I thi judicious trustees were bound to do when they looked the facts in the face and realised the trust property, whatever might become their resulting duty as regards the proceeds. Up to this point, therefore, I think, so far as they are concerned, their conduct is unassailable. If, as is suggested, they have made a good pecuniary bargain, that is so much the better for them and their trust.

Turning now to the Proudfoot Endowment trustees, I say that it became their duty under their trust to find a habitation for their Institute, and seeing one ready to hand, owing to the vicissitude already stated as actuating the Institute trustees, they seem to have acted very prudently in seeking to buy it instead of building a new one with the certainty of the other soon standing empty. Moreover, looking to the terms of their truster's direction, I think they were quite entitled to take into account, after they did so, the desirableness of preventing what would have been a foolish and wasteful rivalry, injurious to the interests of the working-men of Moffat, for whose benefit Mr Proudfoot had left his money. Accordingly, even if the Proudfoot trustees did not drive a hard bargain with their sellers, I can find no legal objection to their thereby conducing to the furtherance of the testator's object. Here again, therefore, so far as the purchase goes, I see no breach of trust on the part of the Proudfoot Endowment trustees. To complete the case as regards them, I may add that I do not think they had any concern with the application of the price by the Working-Men's Institute trustees, being entitled to assume that it would be dealt with as the law directs. So far, therefore, as those conclusions of the summons go which dealt with the sale of the building as distinguished from the application of the price, I think that on the merits the pursuers have no case even on their own shewing of the facts.

Now, largely as the question of the application of the price figured in the argument, there is only one conclusion of the summons which deals with the matter, and that is the conclusion for interdict against the trustees of the Working-Men's Institute paying over any part of the price to the subscribers (by whom is meant the original contributors to the capital). But before considering the legal merits of this question, we must be satisfied (this being a conclusion for interdict) that the defenders are in course of doing or propose to do what is sought to be interdicted. Now, so far is this from being the case that the defenders have not done this, and disclaim any intention of doing it unless under the decree of Court. Under these circumstances the only course we can take in regard to this conclusion is to dismiss it, and for this reason we have no occasion to discuss the legal grounds upon which this application of the money can be challenged or supported. I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

Munro.

JOHN MUNRO (Inspector of Lochbroom), Defender (Respondent).—

R. V. Campbell—Dickson.

Poor—Derivative settlement—Forisfiliation—Imbecile.—Held (following the cases of Fraser v. Robertson, 5 Macph. 819, and Lees v. Kemp, supra p. 6), that a girl, twenty-three years of age, who was living in her father's house and was unable from mental weakness to maintain herself, although able to do some light work under supervision, was not forisfiliated, and followed her father's settlement.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ross.

THE inspector of the parish of Kilmuir-Easter in Ross-shire raised an action in the Sheriff Court against the inspector of Lochbroom to recover certain advances made for the relief of a girl, Mary Mackenzie, who was living in Kilmuir-Easter with her father, who also for some time had been receiving out-door relief there. Lochbroom, as the parish of the father's birth, was admittedly liable for the payments made on his behalf. The question between the parishes was whether the daughter followed her father's settlement, and was therefore chargeable to Lochbroom along with him, or was chargeable independently of him either to her own birth parish which was Edderton, or to any parish of residential settlement which she might have.

The pursuer pleaded that as the advances had been made for an emancipated daughter of Mackenzie, the defender was liable.

The defender pleaded;—The said Mary Mackenzie being forisfiliated or emancipated, has her settlement elsewhere than in the parish of Lochbroom.

On a proof it was shewn that Mary Mackenzie, who was born in 1840, had attended school for about a year, and had acquired "a glimmering of the alphabet." She had done a little household work at home, made porridge, and baked the bread. She had also at times done some field work, earning in one year 12s., and in another year £1, 17s. Any other small sums she had earned had been paid to her rather out of compassion by neighbouring farmers than as a recompense for her work. Her fellow-workers and others deposed that she was very lazy, and unless she was constantly watched would throw down her hoe, or whatever it was she was working with, and go home. Most of the witnesses spoke of her as a silly weak woman. She lived in a state of "phenomenal filth," and often went about the country begging. In the beginning of 1890 she was delivered of an illegitimate child.

Dr Mackenzie of Inverness, who was examined for the defender, deposed in cross-examination,—“(Q.) Do you mean to say that this person, apart from her parents, is able to make a living for herself? No; I would scarcely say that. (Q.) Then you admit that she would have to be cared for? (A.) We have all to be cared for. I have to be cared for every day. (Q.) Is she able to earn her own livelihood? I have heard to-day that she has been occasionally employed, and is able to earn something, and if provided with proper requisites, she could always do so. . . . Would you take her yourself as a domestic servant? (A.) Decidedly not. (Q.) And who do you think would take her? (A.) I have seen scores like her in houses.”

Dr Adam of Dingwall, also examined for the defender, deposed in cross-examination,—“Is she silly? (A.) She answered my questions readily, but she was very ignorant. (Q.) Then you do not think she weak-minded? (A.) I would say that her mental development is weak. (Q.) Then do you admit from what you heard to-day that she is weak?”

minded? (A.) I must go by what I discovered on my examination of her. (Q.) Do you think she is weak-minded? (A.) I think her intellect is not up to the average. I could not certify her as an imbecile.”

Mackay v.
Munro.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hill), on 3d August 1891, found it proved that Mary Mackenzie was of weak mind, “but that it has not been proved that her mental capacity is such as to make her incapable of acquiring a settlement for herself,” and therefore assolized the defender as regarded the amount of advances applicable to her.

On 26th October 1891 the Sheriff-depute (Jameson) adhered.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The present case was ruled by Fraser's case,¹ and, had the Sheriff-depute had an opportunity of seeing a report of the case of Lees v. Kemp,² he would have recognised its authority as ruling the present case in accordance with Fraser's case. In the case of Cassels v. Somerville,³ on which the other side relied, there was no question as here whether in fact the pauper had had a home of her own. The question there was as to capacity to acquire a settlement, and that capacity was possessed by anyone who had a mind at all. There the pauper was forty-nine years of age, and for years had lived away from home, supporting himself, not indeed by his own industry, but on the help of friends. But here the question was, had the pauper ever as matter of fact legally left the familia, and set up for herself? In such a case much more was required than merely mind sufficient to acquire a settlement. There must be ability to maintain one's self outside the father's house. The facts here were on all-fours with those in Fraser's and Lees's cases.

Argued for the defender;—Forisfiliation was not incompatible with still living under the father's roof.⁴ The question was whether the girl was capable of acquiring a settlement for herself, and the cases of Watson,⁵ Cassells,⁶ and *Nixon*⁷ had decided that persons of no higher mental capacity than the pauper in the present case could acquire a separate settlement. She could not perhaps support herself, but she could do something, and had done something for her support. Derivative settlement had to be proved, the rule being that at twenty-one, or perhaps at puberty, every one attained a settlement for themselves.¹ The exception of derivative settlement was introduced in the first place to keep children of tender years in family with their father. It would be absurd to extend that exception to the case of a daughter who was herself a mother. The other exception was that of which the cases of Lees and of Fraser were illustrations, viz., the perpetual pupil. But the pauper here was of higher mental development than that. The case of Fraser might also have been decided as it was without holding the child to be still in familia, for the child might in that case have been held not to have lost the residential settlement of its father, which it had acquired for itself, and in its own right. Lord Kinloch's opinion favoured this view.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts of this case are pretty clear, and there cannot be any substantial difference of opinion about them. The only evidence which is of a character such as to present any difficulty is the evidence of the two doctors. But I do not attach any importance to that evidence. Both the style and the character of it are eminently what is called "professional," and is not at all satisfactory. The most favourable course for these gentlemen is to dispose of the case without taking any note of their evidence, and I think that is the course we ought to follow. Turning to the evidence of fact obtained from those persons who were in daily contact with this woman, it is quite plain that she was not able to be entrusted with the conduct of her own affairs. She was able to do, and did a certain amount of work; many persons of very deficient mental powers are able to do a good deal of work under close supervision. But at the same time, if she had been turned out into the world to shift for herself she would certainly have been a lamentable failure. She did some work in her father's house and some field work, but when she was at the field work, unless she was constantly watched, she would throw away her time or whatever she was working with, and leave her work. I am satisfied that the farmer who employed her did so largely from charitable motives. That is my decided impression of the evidence.

Therefore, if this is a question of forisfamiliation, the girl here was not forisfamiliated, but remained a child in her father's house. The whole history of the law in regard to imbeciles indicates that they are to be looked upon as unable to take up responsibility as they grow up. This woman is still a child in law, unable to pass out of the stage of pupillarity into the stage of personal responsibility.

This is the case of Lees over again. I think the Sheriff has erred, and that the aliment must be paid by the parish of the father's settlement.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I think that this woman, although of full age, was not forisfamiliated, and that by reason of mental weakness. The case is substantially the same as the cases of Fraser and Lees.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I think this case is really ruled by the cases of Fraser and of Lees.

The girl here was of very weak mental capacity; it is not proved that she ever did, or ever could maintain herself; she has lived all her life with her father, in his house, and as a member of his family.

Therefore she is not forisfamiliated, and not being forisfamiliated she takes her father's settlement. No. 82.

Taylor v. Earl

Landlord and Tenant—Decree of removing—Enforcement of charge upon decree—Delay.—Held that a charge upon a decree, dated 20th November 1890, ordaining a tenant to remove at Whitsunday following was timeously enforced three weeks after that term, and suspension on the ground of the lapse of time between the decree and its enforcement refused.

Landlord and Tenant—Holding—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, (46 and 47 Vict. c. 62), sec. 35.—Held (following Mackintosh v. Lovat, 14 R. 282), that the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883,* did not apply to subjects of about three-quarters of an acre in extent, one-third of which was occupied as a dwelling-house and garden and the remainder as a grass park,—the rent of the whole being £3, and the annual value of the land 15s.,—in respect that the house and garden were the principal subjects, and not accessories to the land, and could not be regarded as either agricultural or pastoral.

PETER TAYLOR was tenant from year to year under the Earl of Moray of certain subjects situated in the parish of Alves and county of Elgin. In November 1890 Lord Moray brought an action of removing against him in the Sheriff Court at Elgin, and on 20th November following the Sheriff-substitute, in respect of no appearance, ordained Taylor to remove "at and against the term of Whitsunday next 1891," and the officers of Court to charge him to do so at that term, "if the charge to remove be given forty-eight hours before that term, or within forty-eight hours after the charge, in case the same is not given forty-eight hours before that term." The form of decree used was that prescribed by the Act of Sederunt of 27th January 1830, schedule C.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

Taylor continued to possess his holding until, on 18th June 1891, he was charged upon the decree to remove within forty-eight hours.

He then brought a suspension of the charge, pleading (1) that the decree and charge were inept and invalid, for these reasons . . . (c) Assuming the validity of the decree, the petitioner allowed his remedy thereunder to lapse; (d) The complainer, being tenant of a holding in the sense of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62), got no notice, in terms of sec. 28 thereof. (2) Esto that the Removal Terms (Scotland) Act of 1886 applies, the complainer got no valid warning.

He denied that the Removal Terms (Scotland) Act, 1886, under which the action of removing had been brought, applied to his tenancy, and averred that in any case he had not received the forty days' notice to remove provided by that Act. He alleged that he was a "tenant" within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, and that his tenancy was a "holding" within the meaning of that Act, and that he was entitled to have notice under it if it was desired to bring his tenancy to an end.

In answer to the complainer's averment regarding the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, the respondent denied that it applied, and founded on the 35th section of the Act.*

* The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, sec. 35, provided,—

No. 83.

Jan. 23, 1892.
Taylor v. Earl
of Moray.

It was proved that Taylor (a travelling grocer) had occupied the subjects in question from Whitsunday 1878, at a rent of £3 per annum. The subjects consisted of a dwelling-house, stable, and pig-house, certain sheds in which he kept his travelling van and empty boxes, a piece of garden ground extending to 11 poles, and a field surrounding the garden extending to 2 roods and 7 poles—the whole subjects embracing an area of three-quarters of an acre. The complainer lived in the house, and kept his horse in the stable, and his van in one of the sheds in the garden. He occupied the field as a grass park, the field in which the horse fed not having been ploughed up since 1884. The value of the land was put at 15s. a-year.

Receipts for payment of rent for 1887, 1889, and 1890 were produced, bearing to be “for crop” for these years, and the entry in the Valuation-roll, description column, was “house and land Crook of Alves.”

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 16th December 1891, repelled the reasons of suspension, and found the charge orderly proceeded.*

“Nothing in this Act shall apply to a holding that is not either wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or in part agricultural and as to the residue pastoral, or in whole or in part cultivated as a market garden, or to any holding let to the tenant during his continuance in any office, appointment, or employment of the landlord.”

* “OPINION.— . . . The first question the complainer raises is this, and Mr Watt stated it very distinctly. He said that, although the charge was in conformity with the decree, yet it came too late; because, while the decree authorised a charge either before or after the term of removal, yet that merely permitted a latitude of a day or two beyond the term, and did not authorise the postponement of the charge for a period of three weeks. In other words, the term being allowed to pass,—and three weeks after it being allowed to pass,—the tenant was entitled to assume that the decree was passed from, and that he was to be allowed to remain in possession for another year. That is the first point. Now, I say nothing against the argument that a decree of removal may be passed from. It may well be that if the charge under such a decree is delayed for a lengthened period beyond the term of removal the tenant is entitled to infer that he is to remain in possession for another year. But this case does not seem to me to raise any question of that kind. Three weeks is certainly not an undue period for the necessary steps to be taken, and for the decree to be put in force and therefore I am not prepared to hold that there was any undue delay in enforcing the charge, or that there has been anything so far irregular in the proceeding.

“But then the complainer takes this second point; and he says rightly it is a point of more general importance. He contends that this is a subject to which the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883 applies, and he maintains that, assuming that the Act did apply, he did not have the statutory warning. Now, it is admitted that if the Agricultural Holdings Act applied, the warning was not sufficient. It was sufficient in point of time, because it was given fully six months before the term of removal, but it was given, it is said, not in the statutory form prescribed by the Act, but in the form of a summons of removal; and therefore the question comes to be whether the Agricultural Holdings Act applied to subjects of this description. Now I am of opinion that it does not. I consider that the Agricultural Holdings Act, by the 35th section, excludes from its operation holdings of this description. This is not a subject which, in my opinion, is either wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or partly agricultural and partly pastoral. To the extent of a third of its area it is occupied by the travelling grocer as a dwelling-house and garden; and it is, I think, impossible to contend that the house and garden are here, as in the case of an ordinary farm, mere adjuncts or accessories of an agricultural or pastoral subject. On the contrary, it is, I should say, clear that the field or park, or whatever it may

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—1. From 20th November 1890 until he was charged on 18th June 1891, there was nothing to indicate that the landlord meant to enforce the decree. The terms of the decree ordaining him to remove “at and against the term of Whitsunday” fell to be strictly construed, and were referable to Whitsunday only. The landlord could not arbitrarily select a day for enforcing the decree. Tacit relocation applied against a landlord who omitted to take steps to carry his rights into effect.¹ 2. The subjects were a “holding” in the sense of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, and the complainer had not received the statutory notice there provided. They were occupied as a croft in the ordinary way, and although not cultivated as arable land latterly, they were at least wholly pastoral, and satisfied the terms of the 35th section of the Act (quoted supra). Their size was immaterial, and so was the nature of the occupant’s employment, admitting that he sometimes worked for his living in other ways than by crofting. The receipts which had been produced shewed the respondent’s view of the nature of the subjects, and were supported by the Valuation-roll entry. The case of *Mackintosh*² was distinguishable, as the subjects there were clearly of the nature of house property.

Taylor v. Earl
of Moray.

The respondent was not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I cannot say that I entertain any doubt on the questions in this case. I agree on both points with the Lord Ordinary.

On the first point his Lordship observes,—“I say nothing against the argument that a decree of removal may be departed from.” With that I agree. I can figure cases in which the lapse of time between the granting of the decree and its enforcement was so great as to give rise to a presumption of waiver on the part of the landlord, requiring to be rebutted by explanation. I can also figure cases where the lapse of time, and the fact that the tenant had acted in the belief, created by the landlord’s delay, that he was to be allowed to remain on his holding, would present a composite case, giving rise to a plea of bar against the landlord if he attempted to enforce his decree. But, if we were to decide in favour of the complainer in this case, our decision would necessarily be taken as meaning that, in all cases, unless a decree ordering a tenant to remove at the Whitsunday term was put in force before the 18th June, the landlord must be held to have waived his right to enforce it. I am not prepared to be a party to such a decision. I think it is unwarranted by authority, and would be injurious in its effect on tenants against whom decrees of removal had been obtained, as it would close the door to any indulgence being granted them by their landlords.

As regards the question whether the Agricultural Holdings Act applies to such a holding as the complainer’s, the Lord Ordinary has dealt with that question thus—“This is not a subject which, in my opinion, is either wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or partly agricultural and partly pastoral. To the extent of a third of its area it is occupied by this travelling grocer as a dwelling-house and garden; and it is, I think, impossible to contend that the house and garden called, is a mere adjunct or accessory of the house; and that being so, the house is the principal subject, and it cannot, by any stretch of construction, be held to be an agricultural or pastoral subject within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act. In short, I think this case is a fortiori of the case of Lovat v. Mackintosh, decided in 1886, and I therefore refuse the note of suspension, with expenses.”

are here, as in the case of an ordinary farm, mere adjuncts or accessories of an agricultural or pastoral subject. On the contrary it is, I should say, clear that the field or park, or whatever it may be called, is a mere adjunct or accessory of the house; and that being so, the house is the principal subject, and it cannot, by any stretch of construction, be held to be an agricultural subject within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act. In short, I think this case is a fortiori of the case of Lovat v. Mackintosh, decided in 1886." These sentences express my views so accurately, and comprehensively, that I propose to add only one observation. Mr Watt asked whether the size of a holding could be held to affect the question whether it was a subject within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act. My answer is, Yes; if the size of the holding bears so small a proportion to the size of the house that the land is an adjunct or accessory of the house, then the legal quality of the holding is determined, and it is seen that the subject is not wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or partly agricultural and partly pastoral.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The complainer puts his case upon tacit relocation, but tacit relocation operates only where neither party has given notice within forty days of the stipulated termination of the lease that he means to take advantage of that termination. It has no application here unless it can be said that the landlord departed from the right which his decree gave him, in such a way as to indicate that he meant to allow the tenant to remain in his holding for another year. The only circumstance upon which the plea is founded is that, instead of putting his decree into force immediately on the arrival of the term, which might have been an extremely harsh proceeding, he delayed doing so until 18th June. If it had been said that the tenant had been induced by this delay after the date at which he was ordained to remove had passed to expend money or labour upon the cultivation of his land, and therefore that his position had been altered to his prejudice by the landlord's delay one could have understood that there might have been some ground for the contention that the landlord had lost the right to enforce his decree. But there is no allegation that the tenant did anything whatever in the belief that the decree was not to be enforced. All that is relied on is the mere lapse of time. I agree that it is possible to imagine cases where the delay may have been long enough to ground a plea of bar, but it is quite out of the question to maintain such a plea in the present case.

I agree also on the second question. We are asked to consider this point on the assumption that both parties are agreed that the decree of removing is not good if the subject occupied by the complainer falls under the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, in respect that warning was not given in the form prescribed by the statute. I desire to reserve my opinion on that point. It is unnecessary to consider it, because I think the Agricultural Holdings Act is inapplicable for the reasons stated by your Lordships and by the Lord Ordinary.

JAMES MIDDLETON (Hewat's Marriage-Contract Trustee), Pursuer

No. 84.

WILLIAM CARRUTHERS SMITH, Defender (Appellant).—*W. Campbell—

Jan. 27, 1892.
Hewat's Trustee v. Smith.

Possession—Reputed ownership—Marriage-contract—Conveyance of moveables to trustees retenta possessione.—By antenuptial marriage-contract H. (the husband) conveyed to trustees his dwelling-house and "all and sundry the whole household furniture, . . . pictures, and other effects" therein. The trustees were infeft in the house, which was occupied by H. and his wife, who also enjoyed the use of the furniture, pictures, &c. After some years H. became insolvent and compounded with his creditors. S., his brother-in-law, became security for part of the composition. In security of this obligation H. conveyed to S., by written agreement (with power of sale), and delivered, his pictures, including six which were in his house at the date of the marriage-contract. S. had no notice or knowledge of the terms of the marriage-contract. In an action by the trustee under the marriage-contract to have the pictures or their value restored to the trust, held that as S. had obtained the pictures under an onerous contract without knowledge of the conveyance in the marriage-contract, he was not bound to restore them.

JAMES MIDDLETON, M.D., trustee under an antenuptial contract ^{2D DIVISION.} between Richard G. Hewat, tea-merchant, residing in Portobello, and his wife Mrs H. A. Middleton or Hewat, raised an action in the Sheriff Court ^{Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.} at Edinburgh against William C. Smith, Hope Street, Leith Walk, for delivery to him as such trustee of six pictures, or £250 as the value thereof.

The pictures in question had been delivered by Hewat to the defender, who was his brother-in-law, in the circumstances after narrated, and the pursuer maintained that they belonged to him as trustee. Mr and Mrs Hewat were married in 1883. By antenuptial contract, dated 3d December 1883, Hewat conveyed to trustees, inter alia, his house at Bellfield, Portobello, and "All and Sundry the whole household furniture, silver plate, bed and table linen, books, pictures, and other effects of every description in his house at Bellfield, Portobello." The purposes were for the liferent use of the spouses and the survivor, and for division among the children of the marriage.

The marriage-contract trustees were infeft in the house. The spouses continued to reside in it, and to enjoy the liferent of the furniture and pictures, including the six pictures in dispute.

About the beginning of the year 1890, Hewat became embarrassed in his circumstances, and he offered to his creditors a composition payable in three instalments. Security for the third instalment was required. Hewat applied to the defender to become cautioner.

The defender refused to be cautioner unless he obtained security. The security offered was a sum in cash, a quantity of tea, and a number of pictures belonging to Hewat, including the six in question. It was arranged in March 1890 that in consideration of the security thus offered the defender should be cautioner for part of the third instalment.

A written agreement, dated 21st and 26th March 1890, was entered into between the defender and Hewat, narrating that the former had agreed to sign the composition bills to the extent of £540, and in security had arranged to obtain immediate possession of, inter alia, Hewat's pictures; that he was to be entitled to hold the securities till relieved of his engagement; and to realise the whole or part of them at such price as he thought proper, and retain the funds so realised, and that the realisation might proceed at once.

Hewat then had his pictures removed from Bellfield House to a sale-

No. 84. room, where they were delivered to the defender. The pictures so removed included the six in question and some others which he had acquired after his marriage. A sale of pictures took place on 19th April 1890, at which the defender sold the pictures, and among them five of the six which were the subject of the action.

Jan. 27, 1892.
Hewat's Trustees v. Smith.

The pursuer averred that these six pictures belonged to Hewat at the date of the marriage, and were in Bellfield House at and prior to the execution of the marriage-contract, and had been conveyed to the trustees in virtue of that contract; that the arrangement between Hewat and the defender was illegal, and had only recently come to his notice; further, that the defender was well aware of the terms of the marriage-contract.

The defender denied that he was aware of the terms of the marriage-contract. He stated further that he had had to meet the whole of the bills for the third instalment of composition, and after computing the value of the securities had suffered loss to the extent of £50 or £60.

He pleaded;—(3) The conveyance in said marriage-contract being granted by Mr Hewat of moveables retenta possessione, and the moveables sued for having been delivered by Mr Hewat to the defender, who received them without notice or knowledge of said conveyance, the defender is not bound to deliver them to the pursuer, or to account to him for the value thereof, until he is relieved of the obligation referred to in his answers, of which he holds them as security.

The proof was somewhat conflicting as to whether the defender knew of the terms of Hewat's marriage-contract. It is sufficient to say that the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford) was of opinion that he had such knowledge, but the Court held that he had not. The Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor in which (after findings in fact to the effect before stated) he found in law "(1) that the defender, being in the knowledge of the said antenuptial contract of marriage, was not entitled to rely upon Mr Hewat's possession of the pictures aforesaid as a ground of credit, or to assume that Mr Hewat was at liberty to deal with the pictures as he pleased; and (2) that the defender is bound to account to the pursuer for the said pictures, or the value thereof: Therefore repels the defences, and decerns and ordains the defender to deliver to the pursuer the picture which is still in his possession, as aforesaid, videlicet, a picture entitled "London Bridge," by Mr F. C. Noble: Quoad ultra, continues the cause that parties may be heard as to the sum payable by the defender in lieu of the other pictures mentioned in the prayer of the petition," &c.

The Sheriff-substitute subsequently gave decree for delivery of the unsold picture, and for £66, 3s. as the value of the other five.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—It was not proved on the evidence that the defender knew the terms of Hewat's contract of marriage. If not, the Sheriff-substitute's ground of judgment was removed. If the defender received the pictures in good faith, without notice of the alleged conveyance in the marriage-contract, he was not bound to deliver them to the pursuer unless and until the pursuer relieved him of his security.

Argued for the respondent;—It could not be said upon the evidence that the pictures had been specially mentioned to the defender as conveyed in the marriage-contract, but there was ample evidence that he knew that the whole furnishings of Hewat's house were conveyed in the contract. That was sufficient. Further, the principle of *Orr's Trustee v. Tullis*¹ applied to the case.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think the Sheriff-substitute has fallen into error. No. 84.
 When Hewat became a party to his marriage-contract there were six particular pictures in his house, and these he is said to have conveyed to the marriage-contract trustees by that deed. He fell into difficulties and he endeavoured to get Smith, the defender, who is his brother-in-law, to assist him. In the course of this endeavour Hewat agreed to convey these six pictures, along with a number of others, as a security for the advances which he was to receive. They were handed over, and the defender sold them in order to save himself from loss. But the pursuer, the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs Hewat, now says that these six pictures were not the property of Hewat, but that, like everything else in Hewat's house at the date of the antenuptial contract they became the property of the marriage-contract trustees, and that the defender must either give up the pictures or account for the value of them.

 Hewat's Trustees v. Smith.

Now, it was not contended that Hewat and the defender had entered into a fraudulent scheme to defraud the marriage-contract trustees of property falling under their trust. On the contrary, the whole transaction was gone about in good faith. And that being so, the true state of the law regarding it is, as I think, accurately set forth in the defender's third plea, which is: "The conveyance in said marriage-contract being granted by Mr Hewat of moveables retenta possessione, and the moveables sued for having been delivered by Mr Hewat to the defender, who received them without notice or knowledge of said conveyance, the defender is not bound to deliver them to the pursuer, or to account to him for the value thereof, until he is relieved of the obligation referred to in his answers, of which he holds them as security." I think that plea sound in law, and directly applicable to the facts. I am therefore for recalling the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. I think we should assoilzie the defender.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree. I think that the defender was a bona fide onerous holder of the pictures.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think it out of the question to impute fraud to the defender. He obtained these pictures for value in an honest transaction. I agree that he should have decree of absolvitor.

LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find in fact (1) that Mr Hewat remained in possession of the furniture and other effects conveyed in his contract of marriage; (2) that the defender received the pictures mentioned in the prayer of the petition in security of an onerous obligation without notice or knowledge of the conveyance in said marriage-contract: Find in law that the defender is not bound to deliver the said pictures to the pursuer or to account for the price or value thereof: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against, assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action," &c.

Douglas v. Young, November 14, 1879, 7 R. 229, followed.

Exchequer Cause.

1st DIVISION.

AT a meeting of the Commissioners for General Purposes for the Forfar district of the county of Forfar, William Petrie, hotel-keeper, Forfar, appealed against the assessment made upon him for the year 1891-92 of £1, 19s. for inhabited house duty, at the rate of 6d. per pound on £78 sterling, the annual value of the Salutation Hotel and stables and coach-house occupied by him at East High Street and South Street, Forfar, so far as the assessment included the stables and coach-house.

The assessment appealed against was levied in terms of the Inhabited House Duty Act, 1851 (14 and 15 Vict. c. 36), and the House Tax Act, 1808 (48 Geo. III. c. 55).*

The Commissioners sustained the appeal, and a case was stated, at the request of the Surveyor of Taxes, for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer.

The following facts were set forth in the case:—(Second) The hotel of which, along with the stables and coach-house adjoining, Mr Petrie was proprietor and occupier, has a frontage both to East High Street and South Street, Forfar, with a bar entrance at the junction of those streets. The kitchen door of the hotel enters from a passage running from South Street to East High Street at the back and side of the hotel. The said passage separates the hotel from the stables and coach-house, which are under an entirely separate roof from the hotel building, and are situated at the back corner thereof. The carriage entrance to the stables and coach-house is from East High Street, the said passage being only a foot passage from South Street.

(Third) The general public have a right of way over this passage, and it is subject to a servitude of passage in favour of three feuars having properties adjoining.

(Fourth) In addition to the hotel business, the appellant carries on a horse-hiring business, and puts up horses at livery in the said stables.

* The schedule annexed to the Act 14 and 15 Vict. c. 36, provides,—“For every inhabited dwelling-house which, with the household and other offices, yards, and gardens therewith occupied and charged, is or shall be worth the rent of twenty pounds or upwards by the year, . . . and also where any such dwelling-house shall be occupied by any person who shall be duly licensed by the laws in force to sell therein by retail beer, ale, wine, or other liquors, although the room or rooms thereof in which any such liquors shall be exposed to sale, sold, drunk, or consumed, shall not be such shop or warehouse as aforesaid, . . . there shall be charged for every twenty shillings of such annual value of any such dwelling-house the sum of sixpence. . . .”

By section 2 of that Act certain of the powers and provisions of former Acts were continued, inter alia, those set forth in Schedule B of 48 Geo. III. cap. 55.

Schedule B of the Act 48 Geo. III. cap. 55, provides (rule 2),—“Every coach-house, stable, brew-house, wash-house, laundry, wood-house, bake-house, dairy, and all other offices, and all yards, courts and curtilages, and gardens, and pleasure-grounds belonging to and occupied with any dwelling-house, shall, in charging the said duties, be valued together with such dwelling-house, provided no more than one acre of such gardens and pleasure-grounds shall in any case be so valued.”

(Fifth) The value of the hotel was £58 per annum, and the value of the stables and coach-house was £20 per annum. No. 85.

The appellant claimed relief from the assessment as far as it included the stables and coach-house, on the ground that the hotel and the stables and coach-house were distinct tenements, separated from each other by the public right of way and servitude of passage above mentioned.* Jan. 27, 1892.
Smith v.
Petrie.

The Surveyor of Taxes, on the other hand, contended that the hotel and stables and coach-house formed one assessable subject, and were all chargeable under the second rule of Schedule B of the Act 48 George III. cap. 55, and in support of his contention he referred to the case of Douglas v. Young, November 14, 1879, 7 R. 229.

Argued for the appellant;—The point here raised was settled by Douglas v. Young,¹ in which it was decided that the mere severance of one portion of let premises from another portion did not affect their unity as an assessable subject.

There was no appearance for the respondent.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this case has been wrongly decided by the Commissioners, and that we must sustain the appeal. The case of Douglas v. Young certainly comes very near it, the only points of difference between them being (1) that in this case there is a passage between the hotel and the stables, while in Douglas' case they were separated by a court or yard; (2) that in Douglas' case the court seems to have been occupied partly by the hotel-keeper and partly by other persons, while here the public have a right of way, and three adjoining feuars a right of servitude over the passage. These, however, are very unsubstantial distinctions, and do not take this case out of the rule laid down in Douglas' case.

I think the stable and coach-house are occupied along with the hotel, and it being now settled law that a hotel is a dwelling-house, I think the stables and coach-house must be held to be an adjunct of a dwelling-house, notwithstanding the fact that they are separated by the passage.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think the stables and coach-house belong to the dwelling-house. This case is, I think, ruled by Douglas' case, which was a case of a hotel not occupied by the landlord's family personally, for he had a separate dwelling-house, but only as a hotel in the strict sense of the word.

I do not think I should ever have found out for myself that such an hotel was an inhabited house in the sense of the Act. But the point has been conclusively settled in Douglas' case, and we must accept it as binding.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—"Reverse the determination of the Commissioners : Sustain the assessment, and decern, and remit to the said Commissioners to refuse the appeal."

Succession—Settlement—Conditio si sine liberis decesserit.—Where the terms of a testamentary deed shewed that the testator had contemplated the contingency of legatees dying and leaving issue by making certain legacies payable to the issue of legatees in the event of their predecease, held that the conditio si sine liberis was not to be implied in the case of a legacy where he had made no such provision.

Question whether the conditio si sine liberis can be implied in favour of the issue of a conditional institute.

1ST DIVISION. BY trust-disposition and settlement, dated 7th May 1862, John Carter conveyed to trustees his whole heritable and moveable estates. He directed them in the third purpose to hold his whole property (except money in bank and cash in hand) for behoof of his wife in liferent. In the fifth purpose he directed his trustees to pay certain legacies, viz. :—“To my son John Carter personally the sum of £500 sterling, but declaring that this legacy shall not be payable to him unless upon his return to this country within ten years after the death of the survivor of me and my said wife: And also declaring that at the end of the said ten years the said sum of £500 shall be divided equally among my surviving children. To my daughter Margaret Carter and her heirs the sum of £500 sterling to my daughter Catherine M'Ewan Carter and her heirs the sum of £500 sterling, to my son Thomas Carter and his heirs the sum of £500 sterling, and to my daughter Agnes Barbara Carter and her heirs the sum of £500 sterling.” In the seventh purpose he directed his trustees, six months after the death of the longest liver of himself and his wife, and after paying the foresaid provisions, to make over to his son James Carter and his heirs and assignees, heritably and irredeemably, the lands of Castlehill and others.

As regarded the residue of his estate, he directed as follows :—“Lastly, I hereby nominate, constitute, and appoint my son James, and my daughters Margaret, Catherine M'Ewan, and Agnes Barbara to be my residuary legatees: And I direct and appoint my trustees, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall happen six months after the death of the longest liver of me and my said spouse, and after payment of or provision for the legacies, bequests, and annuity above written, or which may hereafter be made by me, to pay and deliver over the residue and remainder of my said means and estate to my said son James, and my said daughters Margaret, Catherine M'Ewan, and Agnes Barbara, and that equally among them, share and share alike, declaring that the shares of such of my said residuary legatees as shall die without leaving lawful issue shall belong to the survivors of my said residuary legatees equally.”

The testator died on 19th January 1864, survived by his widow and by his sons James and Thomas, and by his three daughters. John Carter, the testator's son, went to America in June 1856, and had not been heard of for many years. At the time of his father's death it was not known whether he was living or not, and since then no tidings had been heard of him. Agnes Barbara Carter, one of the testator's daughters, died in 1868, without issue, and James Carter, the testator's son, died on 4th January 1877, survived by five daughters.

The testator's widow died on the 26th September 1881.

Ten years having elapsed since Mrs Carter's death on 26th September 1881, a question arose as to who was entitled to the legacy of £500 left to John Carter. No. 86.

A special case was accordingly presented to the Court by (1) Mr. Carter's trustees, (2) the testator's surviving children, (3) the five daughters of James Carter. Jan. 29, 1892.
Carter's Trustees v. Carter.

The second parties maintained that they were now entitled to receive payment equally among them of the legacy.

The third parties maintained that they were entitled to the share of the £500 which would have fallen to their father, James Carter, if alive.

The questions of law were,—“(1) Are the second parties entitled to receive payment equally among them of the said sum of £500? or (2) Are the third parties entitled to receive the share thereof which would have fallen to the testator's son James, if now alive?”

Argued for the third parties;—This was a plain case for the application of the conditio si sine liberis. The legacy was by a father to his children as a class, and his presumed intention let in the conditio.¹ There was a direct bequest to the class merely burdened with a condition founded upon a chance of John's returning home within ten years. The case of *M'Call*² had no application. It was dealt with as a case relating to a specific legacy bequeathed conditionally upon the legatee's survivance of a certain event. In *Morrison's Trustees*³ the conditio plainly did not apply, because the person instituted had died in the knowledge of the testator prior to the date of the settlement. It was by no means established that the conditio did not apply to legacies, as was maintained by the second parties. In Douglas' case there were opinions both ways.⁴

Argued for the second parties;—(1) The question was one as to the testator's intention.⁵ The terms of the settlement here shewed very clearly that the testator had fully before his mind when he made it the possibility of his children dying leaving lawful issue. The provision in question was one of a series of bequests given in severalty to different members of his family, and they were each and all, with the exception of the provision in question, payable to them and their heirs. But (2) James died four years before his mother. He was never instituted, and did not survive the date of vesting. His issue were not then entitled to take in virtue of the conditio a share which he would have taken if he had survived. The words were that John's bequest should be divided, not “among my other children,” but among “my surviving children.”⁶ (3) The conditio applied only to provisions, and not to a simple legacy such

Jan. 29, 1892.
Carter's Trustees v. Carter.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears to me that the case of Greig v. Malcolm, to which the attention of parties was called by Lord Kinnear, affords a sound rule of judgment here. The conditio si sine liberis is applicable where the terms of the settlement are such as to conduce to the conclusion that the testator has not taken into account that one of his children may die survived by issue. But if it should turn out upon an examination of the whole deed that the testator has had that contingency in view, and has provided for it, then the room for the application of the condition disappears.

The doctrine as put by Lord Corehouse in the case of Greig v. Malcolm, 13 S. 611, is this,—“This doctrine, which we have borrowed from the Roman law, proceeds entirely on the presumption that the testator, having overlooked or forgotten the contingency of the institute having children has left children unprovided if they come into existence. But this presumption may be defeated by opposite presumptions or evidence, and there can be no stronger evidence to that effect than a clause in the settlement by which the testator does make a provision for the issue of predeceasing legatees, because it incontestibly shews that he had them in view when he made the substitution.” Now, applying the principle to the settlement before us, it is important to observe that in the clause of the deed dealing with residue there are these words,—“Declaring that the shares of such of my said residuary legatees as shall die without leaving lawful issue shall belong to the survivors of my said residuary legatees equally.” That shews that the contingency of his children dying leaving lawful issue was fully in the mind of the testator when he made the deed.

I think, therefore, the result is that Mr Johnston's argument must prevail and he has fortified it by pointing out that the testator has very carefully discriminated between the various provisions in this very matter. The legacy with which we have to do is one of a series of legacies in the proper sense. In it there is no mention of issue or heirs, but in the other legacies we find that they are granted “to my daughter Margaret Carter and her heirs,” “to my daughter Catherine M'Ewan Carter and her heirs,” and so on.

It therefore appears to me that this deed is one giving ample scope for the application of the doctrine laid down by Lord Corehouse, and that it is impossible to hold that this clause can be read as containing an implied provision in favour of the children of the predeceasing son.

Many cases have been cited which go to shew that the current of decision has run strongly in favour of the application of the conditio. None of these cases, however, gainsay the justice and efficacy of the rule laid down by Lord Corehouse.

I am therefore of opinion that the argument of the third parties cannot receive effect.

LORD ADAM.—I agree with your Lordship. I think the case of Greig

³ Gauld's Trustees v. Duncan, &c., 4 R. 691.

Malcolm rules the present case. It proceeds upon the principle that the conditio si sine liberis applies where there is a presumption that the testator in making his will has overlooked the children of his direct descendants.

Carter's Trustees v. Carter.

When we look at this deed it is impossible to conclude that the testator has overlooked the children of his son James. The terms of the other clauses of the deed shew this. I therefore think the principle does not apply here.

It is not necessary to say more; but I have been unable to follow the argument that the conditio affects this case at all. Here we have a clause substituting a certain person conditionally to another who is already institute, because John Carter is the institute in this clause beyond all doubt, and the surviving children of the testator only take conditionally on his non-appearance within a certain time. Therefore, what is proposed here is that the conditio should be held to apply to the case of the issue of persons who are not instituted in the first place.

I am aware of no case which will support this, and doubt the soundness of the proposal.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think that in considering this class of cases it must be kept in view that our law allows perfect freedom of bequest not only in the original limitations of a will, but in conditional institutions and other rights of a subsidiary character intended to have effect in certain contingencies.

We must therefore be careful not to give this useful principle, the conditio si sine liberis decesserit, an extension which would practically have the effect of making all conditional institutions alike, and of depriving a testator of the liberty allowed to him by the law.

I make this observation because in the opinion which was returned by the consulted Judges in the recent case of Hall, 18 R. 690, we expressed the view that there had been a tendency to extend the conditio beyond its proper limits.

I agree with your Lordship that the principle to be kept in view in applying the conditio is that it involves an equitable extension of the scope of the bequest to persons who have been altogether overlooked in the testator's scheme of settlement. Such extension is founded on the relationship of the parties, and on the presumption that the testator had not intentionally disinherited persons having a claim on his goodwill.

If that is the true principle of the conditio, I think all the elements of this case go to exclude its application.

First of all, what is claimed by the third parties is not a part of a general family bequest. The testator gives his heritable estate to his eldest son, and provides that the residue is to be shared by his three daughters and another son. No share of the residue is given to his son, John Carter, as he had been abroad for a long time, and had not been heard of by his family.

But this bequest of £500 to the absent son is one of a series of pecuniary legacies given in severalty to different members of the family, and therefore it is not a part of the family provision. But, again, it is not claimed by the issue of the person to whom it was originally given, but by the children of a deceased brother. The claim is therefore contrary to the direction of the testator, who contemplated the case of his son not returning to claim the legacy, and who says in the deed that it is in that event to be shared by his surviving children.

I agree with Lord Adam in his expression of a doubt as to whether the benefit of the equitable rule can ever be claimed by the issue of one who is only instituted in the second order. My doubt, however, reaches a certainty that the rule has no application to this case, because it has been expressly ruled in a series of decisions which have been quoted to us, including the carefully expressed judgment of Lord Westbury in the case of Young v. Robertson, who lays it down that the issue only take their parents' original share, and not what their parents would have taken under a clause of survivorship.

Further, I agree that the phraseology here used excludes the conditio, and that, perhaps, is only another way of putting what I have already observed, that the clause is inconsistent with the claim put forward by the third parties.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the third parties' claim cannot be sustained, and upon the grounds stated.

I also agree in thinking that it is at least doubtful whether the conditio sine liberis decesserit can be applied in favour of the children of legatees who are themselves claimants only on the failure of some prior legatee whom the testator preferred to them.

In the present case the children to whom the condition, according to its ordinary construction, would have applied would be the children of John Carter, because he is the institute, and the children to be benefited by the condition are the children of the institute, si institutus decesserit sine liberis. But it is proposed that the children of a person conditionally instituted on the failure of John Carter should have the benefit of the presumption upon which the condition is founded.

I am not satisfied that the presumption could arise in such a case; but I think with Lord Adam that it is unnecessary to decide that point, because the grounds of judgment stated by your Lordship in the chair are perfectly clear and sufficient.

THE COURT found and declared that the second parties were entitled to receive payment equally among them of the £500, and answered the second question in the negative.

Jurisdiction—Foreigner—Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa.—Arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem were used against a foreigner in the hands of his shipping-agents in Leith. The defender pleaded no jurisdiction, alleging that at the date of the arrestment the ~~arrestees were not his debtors~~. The pursuers denied this averment, and a proof was allowed. The evidence shewed that at the date of the arrestment the balance on an accounting was in favour of the arrestees. The pursuers maintained that it was enough that at the date of the arrestment there was a relationship between the defender and arrestees which made the latter liable to an accounting, even though ultimately it should be found that there was a debit balance against the defender.

The Court sustained the plea of no jurisdiction.

Ld. Stormonth

ON 3d June 1891 Messrs Napier, Shanks, & Bell, shipbuilders, Glasgow, used arrestments in the hands of Breyen, Richardson, & Company shipping-agents in Leith, to found jurisdiction in an action against P. G. Halvorsen, shipowner, Bergen, for the amount of the third instalment of a marine engine supplied to him for a steamer called the "Britannia."

In his defences Halvorsen stated;—"No sums belonging to the defender were attached by the arrestments in the hands of Breyen, Richardson & Company, who act as the agents of the 'Britannia' in Leith, and who were not indebted to the defender at the time of said arrestment. In these circumstances, the Court of Session has no jurisdiction over the defender." (Ans. 3) for the pursuers, "Denied."

v. Halvorsen.

The defender, inter alia, pleaded;—No jurisdiction.

The defender was allowed a proof of his averments on the question of jurisdiction, and the pursuers a conjunct probation, from which it appeared that, at the date when the arrestments were used, Messrs Breyen, Richardson, & Company, who acted as agents for the defender and the other owners of the "Britannia," were not due the defender anything, and that the defender owed them a small sum. The state of the accounting between them appears from the note to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, infra. A final settlement took place on 12th August 1891.

On 7th November 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) found, inter alia, that no sums belonging to the defender were attached by the arrestment founded on; therefore sustained the first plea in law for the defender, and in respect thereof dismissed the action, and decerned.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The second question is, whether the pursuer has validly attached funds belonging to the defender in the hands of Breyen, Richardson, & Company, of Leith, and there the main argument for the pursuers was, that however the account between these parties may have stood at the date of the arrestment, there was in point of fact no settlement between them till 12th August following, and accordingly that, at the date of the arrestment, there was an obligation on Breyen, Richardson, & Company to account to the defender. Now, I quite subscribe to the doctrine that in a question of jurisdiction, which is necessarily of a somewhat summary character, Courts of law are not in the habit of entering upon prolonged and elaborate investigations as to the state of accounts between parties in order to ascertain how the balance stood at any particular date. That would be unsuitable and out of all proportion to the end in view; but, on the other hand, it appears to me to be an everyday practice to shew, where it can be shewn shortly and conveniently, that at the date when the arrestments were used there were no funds in the hands of the arrestee. Now, that is what has been done here. It is clearly proved, as I think, that Breyen, Richardson, & Company began the year 1891 with a claim against the defender of £4, 10s. In the month of February that claim was turned into a debt by the receipt on their part of £5, 12s. 6d., . . . and that therefore left a sum of £1, 2s. 6d. due by them to Halvorsen and the other part-owners of the ship. Well, then, if that small balance of £1, 2s. 6d. had remained at the date of the arrestment, I do not doubt that, small as it is, it would have been sufficient to found jurisdiction. But it is proved by Mr Breyen (and his evidence is uncontradicted) that that balance was wiped out by a number of small disbursements, amounting together to £2, 13s. 7d., and consisting chiefly of postages and telegrams, which had been laid out for behoof of Halvorsen and his co-owners before the date when the arrestments were used. Now, if that be so, then unquestionably when the arrestment came to be used Mr Breyen's firm were not due anything to the defender. On the contrary, the defender was due a small sum to them, and it does not seem to me to make any difference that, for convenience sake, no actual settlement of the accounts between these parties took place till the month of August. I am throwing out of view some other items which still further swell the balance in favour of Breyen, Richardson, & Company. If necessary, I should hold that these sums were fairly debited against the former owners of the ship, because some of them had reference to this very vessel. But it is unnecessary to go into that. The uncontradicted evidence before me is, that the small balance of £1, 2s. 6d, was, before the date of the arrestment, entirely wiped out by disbursements made on behalf of the defender and the other part-owners of this vessel, thereby leaving a balance the other way in favour of Breyen, Richardson, & Company. . . ."

v. Halvorsen.

Argued for the pursuers;—In order to render an arrestment operative to the effect of founding jurisdiction it mattered not how the accounts between the defender and arrestee stood at the date of the arrestment. It was enough if the arrestee was, when the arrestment was used in his hands, under an obligation to account to the defender, even although it should ultimately on a settlement of accounts be found that the arrestee was due money to the defender.¹

Argued for the defender;—The result of the authorities was that an arrestment to found jurisdiction must attach something. But here the proof had shewn there was nothing. The pursuers' argument was repugnant to common sense. The rationale of *Douglas' case*² was that it appeared from the record that there was a claim by the defender against the arrestee which if prosecuted would prima facie result in money. In Baines' case,³ again, the arrestee was in possession of certain bonds of face value which made him the defender's debtor.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question to be decided here is whether jurisdiction was founded against the defender by the arrestments used in the hands of his agents in Leith.

The statement of the pursuers as to the funds arrested is a general one. They say,—“The defender is a foreigner, but he is subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session by virtue of arrestments used against him ad fundandam jurisdictionem.” They then produce an execution of arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem in the hands of Breyen, Richardson, & Company, the defender's agents in Leith, on 3d June 1891. The answer of the defender on the subject is,—“No sums belonging to the defender were attached by the other arrestment in the hands of Breyen, Richardson, & Company, who act as the agents of the ‘Britannia’ in Leith, and who were not indebted to the defender at the time of said arrestment,” and the answer of the pursuers to this is “Denied.” The pursuers thus make no specific averments as to the nature of the assets arrested but meet the defender's statement by a general denial.

Mr Dickson maintained that the cases go this length, that if there is disclosure on the admission of the defender any relationship which would give claim to an accounting, that that is sufficient to support the validity of the arrestments.

Now, how stand the cases? The only two cited as bearing directly on the subject are Douglas v. Jones and Baines & Tait. In Douglas' case, the decision of the Court proceeded on the record; and the facts on record were that the defender was a partner at the date of the arrestment of a certain company and the arrestment covered visible assets belonging to the company of a visible value. The Court then said that they must determine the question according to the ostensible facts of the case, and these were that the defender was a partner of a company which had visible assets. Deciding the case on these facts, the held that there was a claim which might be prosecuted by the partner, and which would prima facie result in money. It is true the defender was interested to dispute the validity of the arrestment, and asserted that while he had a claim it would not result in money, but, as I read the judgment, the Court held that there was nothing to instantly verify that statement. Napier, Shanks, & Bell

v. Halvorsen.

The case of Baines & Tait was still simpler. There the person in whose hands the arrestments were used held Roumanian bonds of a face value which made him to the amount of £4000 debtor to the defender. There again, prima facie of the facts, the arrestee was in possession of value. That distinguishes the case from the present, because it shews that the arrestment covered something. In the present case the parties have joined issue upon the question of fact whether the agents at Leith were indebted to the defender at the date of the arrestment; the case comes before us on the proof thus taken, and it is impossible for us to disregard the results of that inquiry.

The result of the inquiry is as clear as can be, indeed it is barely disputed. If we take the issue between the parties as being whether the agents were indebted to their principal at the date of the arrestment, a negative answer must be returned. We are, in the result, in the same position as if it had appeared from the pursuers' own averments upon record that there was a balance in favour of the agents.

If therefore I am right in saying that we are not to discard the proof, we shall follow Douglas' case and apply the same rule by considering the facts of the case. In Douglas' case the Court were dealing with the record, and in the present we are dealing with proved and ascertained facts; and in holding that the arrestments attached nothing we are acting in conformity with previous cases, because we are deciding according to the facts before us.

There is nothing in the cases to countenance the argument that the arrestments will be good wherever there is a claim of accounting between the parties no matter on which side the balance may be, and even admitting (or it being proved) that the balance is against the party asserting such claim. The argument is repugnant to common sense, and I cannot assent to it.

We must then, I think, adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—The defender in this case is a Norwegian, and the question for consideration is whether jurisdiction has been founded by arrestments used in the hands of certain agents of the defender in this country. There is thus raised a question of fact and a question of law.

The question of fact is, whether there was a balance due by the agents to the defender. There was a proof on the matter, and the result is that it is proved that at the date of the arrestments the agents were not due any sum to the defender. Therefore upon the facts the arrestments fail.

But then the question of law has been strenuously argued, and Mr Dickson maintained that where it appears that there is a possible claim of accounting between the principal and the agent the arrestments would be valid, and that even though it should turn out that the balance was the other way.

I must say I know of no case that goes so far, and certainly neither Douglas' nor Baines' cases give countenance to such a view.

I do not dispute that there may be a prima facie case for sustaining the arrestment, and that the Court may do so without awaiting the result of the accounting. But I know of no case in which the jurisdiction has been sustained where

No. 87. it is ascertained in point of fact, as here, that nothing is covered by arrestment. Baines' case was entirely different from the present, for there property of a large face value belonging to the defender was in the hands of the arrestee.

Jan. 29, 1892. Napier, Shanks, & Bell v. Halvorsen. On the whole matter I agree with your Lordship that we ought to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question here is, whether jurisdiction has been constituted against the defender by arrestments used in the hands of his agents in Leith.

I know of no decision which has gone the length of excluding inquiry into the state of the cash account between the parties for the purpose of seeing whether there are funds subject to arrestment.

If the balance due to or by the arrestee depends on something which cannot be immediately ascertained, e.g. on profits or commission to be estimated at the end of the financial year, or on the value of securities which the arrestee or agent holds primarily for his principal, but also as a collateral security to himself, the Court will not enter into an inquiry for the purpose of framing a hypothetical balance. But where there is only a cash account the difficulty does not arise, because the balance can be immediately ascertained by summation and subtracting the sum of the one side of the account from the other. I apprehend that when this can be done, and there are in fact no disputed items of account, it ought always to be done. I should not hold a Court competent to sustain jurisdiction in respect of an account which brings out a debit balance against the defender. That is what has happened here, and I agree with your Lordship that the case can be clearly distinguished from other cases which have been cited to us where either in respect of judicial admissions or on the facts disclosed, it was held to be impossible to ascertain the state of the balance, and the jurisdiction by arrestment was accordingly sustained.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also agree. I think any difficulty in the matter arises from a misapprehension of what was decided in the cases of Douglas and Baines. There is no doubt that if there are primary grounds for holding that the arrestee has funds in his hands belonging to the debtor there may be a perfectly good arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causâ, even although it is possible that, if proof were taken, the balance might be found to be against the arrestee. But there must at least be a prima facie case which cannot be disproved immediately or without a collateral litigation. This is very clearly illustrated by the case of Douglas v. Jones. There the defender was a partner in a mercantile firm possessed of property, and had therefore a share in all the property of the firm, and had also a right and interest in every outstanding debt which was due to the company. It was therefore held that it was no sufficient answer to allege that if an accounting was gone into between him and the company of which he was a partner, he would be found to be in the company's debt. The Lord Justice-Clerk (Boyle) says,—“I know it is said that on an investigation would be shewn that Jones had no interest in the company effects, but at the time the arrestments were laid on he was a partner”; and he then proceeds, “it is a sufficient answer as to jurisdiction to aver that after a long litigation I will shew that there were no funds of mine to arrest? If there is prima facie evidence of funds, the arrestment is sufficient to make him liable to our jurisdiction.” The conclusive distinction between that case and this is that we have not here to consider the question on a prima facie case that a debt exists, but on a concluded proof that there is no such debt. I think it perfectly clear from the proof that there is no such debt. We are in the same position as if the pursuer had admitted on record the facts which are established against him by the proof.

In his defences the defender stated that he refused to pay the charge of 13s. per week on the ground that under the statutes he was only liable to repay "the moneys expended on behalf of the pauper," and that the rate charged exceeded these. In particular he objected to the following items of charge per week, as in state No. 7 of pro.* (1) medicines, 1½d. in respect the pursuer's parish participates in the medical relief grant, "which covers medicines"; (2) salaries and wages (less tradesmen), 2s.; (3) farm, 1s. 0½d.; (4) interest at 3 per cent on total indebtedness, 4s. 2½d. (which the defender avers is charged in lieu of rent) to the extent of 3s. 0½d., being the amount by which that charge exceeds the rate of rental as shewn by the Valuation-roll, or at all events, was not entitled to charge as rent more than 3 per cent per annum on the actual amount of indebtedness as at 14th May 1888. In any view, the defender objected to the charge of 13s. in so far as it exceeded the charges appearing in the annual accounts of the pursuer's parish for the years ending 14th May 1888 and 14th May 1889, or at least in so far as the said charge of 13s. exceeded the charges returned by the pursuer to the Board of Supervision as the total average weekly cost of lunatic poor.

The total cost on capital account incurred and expended as aforesaid, up to 14th May 1889, amounts to £212,642, 5s. 6d., 3 per cent on which is £6379, 5s. 7d., or 4s. 5·42d. per head per week, while the actual indebtedness outstanding at said date amounts to £141,081, 13s. 6d., 3 per cent on which is £4322, 9s., or 3s. 0·19d. per head per week.

"(5) The average weekly cost per head for the year ending 14th May 1888, as appearing from the state of maintenance account of the pursuer's accounts for that year, is, after deducting the value of farm produce used in the asylum, 7s. 10·64d., and for the immediately succeeding year the cost, appearing as aforesaid, is 8s. 1·24d. As appearing in the annual report of the Board of Supervision for the year ending 15th May 1888, the cost per head is 9s. 8½d., and for the immediately succeeding year 9s. 9½d. The pursuer does not admit that the items which go to make up the said average weekly cost include all the items chargeable by him against other parties.

"(6) The assessed value of the asylum establishment as entered in the valuation-rolls for the years 1887-88 and 1888-89 was £2577."

The defender objected to the charge for tobacco and snuff.

The pursuer claimed also (2) £5, 14s. 7d., advances on account of two paupers Elizabeth Shaw and the illegitimate pupil child of Bridget M'Guire, who maintained in Barony Poorhouse, the former from 21st February to 1st June 1889, the latter from 30th June to 21st August 1888, when it died. The pursuer made a charge of 5s. 6d. per week for each of these paupers. The pursuer stated that the charge included "charges for maintenance, management, medical relief, funeral expenses, and lodging or house accommodation. A state shewing the charges taken into account in fixing the rate of board at 5s. 6d. per week is herewith produced."*

"In any view, the defender objects to a higher charge than 4s. 1½d., or 4s. 5d. respectively, being the total average weekly cost of ordinary indoor poor as appearing in the said annual accounts of the pursuer's board for the years ending 14th May 1888 and 14th May 1889 respectively, or at least in so far as said charge of 5s. 6d. exceeds 4s. 9½d., being the rate returned by the pursuer to the Board of Supervision as the average weekly cost of ordinary poor for the year ending 14th May 1889, after deducting the charge of 5d. for medical relief, which the pursuer does not claim to be a proper charge against the defender."

In a joint minute the parties made the following admissions:—

"(1) Land charges, £264, 1s. 4d.—This item consists of feu-duty, ground-annual, &c., payable for poorhouse and grounds; but it appears that while that sum was paid there was received by the pursuer the sum of £345, 3s. 1d. from feu-duties, ground-annuals, &c., as set forth on page 6 of Barony Board accounts, and the parties agree that this amount should be placed to the credit of the said account, No. 6 of process, branch 2.

"(2) Funeral charges, £99, 12s. 10d.—The parties admit that the defender ought not to be charged with funeral expenses, in respect that the pursuer charges these against the parish of settlement in each case.

"(3) Salaries of officials, £2737, 7s. 9d.—This item consists of the salaries of the official staff connected with the poorhouse, excluding (1) the medical officers, and (2) tradesmen, gardeners, and sewing-mistress.

The total actual cost of the poorhouse, including as aforesaid, and capital expenditure thereon up to 14th May 1889, amounted to £62,107, 12s. 8d., 3 per cent on which is £1863, 4s. 6d., or 8·07d. per head per week, while the total indebtedness outstanding on said account at same

On 19th December 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) decreed against the defender for the sum of £33, 3s. 4d.* Jan. 29, 1892. Beattie v. Muir.

* "OPINION.—Counsel on both sides explained that what they desired in this case was not so much an ascertainment of the sum due by the defender to the pursuer in respect of the particular paupers mentioned on record, as a determination of the principles on which the parish of a pauper settlement is bound to reimburse the relieving parish for the relief afforded (1) in a parochial lunatic asylum, and (2) in a poorhouse. The questions raised are thus of general interest to poor-law authorities.

"The material sections of the Act 8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, are the 70th, 71st, and 72d, and I shall first state what I conceive to be the result of these sections, as bearing on the matter in hand.

"Destitute persons are entitled to be relieved by the parish in which they apply for relief, first by the inspector till the first meeting of the parochial board, and then by the board until the parish of settlement is ascertained, and the pauper's claim upon it is admitted or otherwise determined, or until he is removed. Where relief is thus afforded, the relieving parish is entitled to 'recover the moneys expended on behalf of such poor person' from the parish of settlement, or from parents or other persons legally bound to maintain him. If within a reasonable time after notice the parish of settlement does not either remove the pauper or make provision to the satisfaction of the relieving parish for his constant weekly subsistence, the relieving parish may remove him to the parish of settlement at the expense of the latter, unless from sickness or infirmity he is incapable of being removed, in which case the relieving parish is bound to go on relieving him, and may recover from the parish of settlement the amount so expended, provided such amount does not exceed the rate expended for the relief of other poor persons in the relieving parish.

"There are in these sections various expressions denoting the relief to be afforded, e.g., 'sufficient means of subsistence,' 'such interim maintenance as may be adjudged necessary,' 'necessary means of support,' 'constant weekly subsistence'; but the very variety of these expressions serves to indicate that there is no magic in any one of them, and they seem to me to be all synonymous with the single word 'relief,' which, of course, means relief according to law.

"It is obvious that the inquiries necessary for the determination of the question of settlement may often be of a protracted nature, and that thus, apart altogether from any voluntary arrangement for the continuance of relief by one parish to a pauper belonging to another, the relieving parish may often be compelled, by force of the statute, to give relief to an extraneous pauper for a very considerable time. The pauper lunatic in the present case remained in the pursuer's asylum for fourteen months, and one of the ordinary paupers for four months.

"Prima facie, it seems to me that the policy of the statute, as expressed in these sections, is to make no distinction between paupers belonging and paupers not belonging to the relieving parish, and, in the case of the latter, to lay on the parish of settlement the full burden of the relief afforded, subject only to the condition that the relieving parish shall not make a profit out of the transaction by charging a higher rate than the rate expended on its own poor.

"When the relief afforded is out-door relief no difficulty can arise, except as regards the cost of the inspector's office and staff. For it is plain that, in the case of out-door relief, the weekly payments cover board, lodging, service (if any), and generally the whole expenses incurred in maintaining the pauper, with the single exception I have mentioned.

"It is otherwise where the pauper is accommodated in a poorhouse or lunatic asylum. There it is impossible to ascertain precisely, or otherwise than by way of average, what the cost of maintaining any particular pauper is; and the

The defender reclaimed. The only point in which he asked an alteration of the Lord Ordinary's judgment was as to the 2s. per week for salaries moment an average comes to be struck the question arises, What heads of expenditure are to enter the average?

"The extreme view for the parish of settlement would be that, as the relieving parish has its poorhouse or asylum built, furnished, and provided with a staff of officials and servants for the accommodation of its own poor, no extra expense is incurred by the admission of an extra parochial pauper beyond the food which he consumes and the clothing (if any) which is supplied to him; and that, therefore, the average rate should be limited to those articles of actual consumption. I could understand that view, although I should think it very inequitable, and not warranted by any words in the statute.

"But the defender does not put his case so high as that. He concedes that, in the case of the asylum, he must pay an average rate covering not merely provisions, clothing, and medicines (so far as not met out of the medical grant), but fuel, light, and water, furniture, furnishings, and bedding, sundry supplies and expenses, and a sum corresponding to rent. In the case of the poorhouse, he conceded the same charges, except rent, which he disputes altogether.* As regards both asylum and poorhouse, the principal items which he challenges are those covering the salaries and wages of officials and servants connected with the two institutions.

"I can find no intelligible principle in these distinctions. I do not understand why the defender should be willing to pay for the roof which covers a pauper lunatic, and not for the roof which covers an ordinary pauper. I am equally at loss to know why, in the case of the latter, he should pay for his bed and not for his bedroom. And, as regards both classes of paupers, I fail to see why he should pay for the kitchen-range in which their food is cooked and not for the services of the cook who uses the range.

"The defender seeks to justify his position by referring to the case of Hay v. Melville, 20 D. 480. But it is necessary to examine precisely how far that judgment went. It arose out of a case of out-door relief, and had nothing to do with relief afforded in a poorhouse or asylum. A system had sprung up under which inspectors of poor repudiated all responsibility for paupers belonging to other parishes, and failed to visit or take charge of them. The Board of Supervision had condemned this system, and had insisted that it was the duty of inspectors to treat paupers from outside parishes exactly as they treated their own. The City Parish of Edinburgh, being dissatisfied with the board's decision, raised an action to have it found either that they were not bound to visit and inspect such paupers, or that, if they were so bound, they were entitled to charge a commission for doing so. There was also a question about the right of removal, which need not here be noticed; but apart from that the only two propositions established by the judgment were (1) that the relieving parish was bound to take entire charge of the pauper, and perform all the duties of inspection; and (2) that it was not entitled to make any charge for inspection against the parish of settlement.

"Had the second point not been raised in the rather invidious connection of the relieving parish first refusing to do what it was clearly bound to do and alternatively proposing to make a charge 'in name of commission and agency' for performing its statutory duty, I confess I think there would have been a great deal to be said for the view that the parish of settlement, whose paupers were to be dealt with exactly as if they belonged to the relieving parish, should reimburse that parish in a rateable share of the cost of inspection and management. But the judgment is authoritative, and has long been acted on, and the pursuer of this action acknowledges its authority by not proposing to make any charge applicable to the cost of the inspector's office and staff.

"It by no means follows that the parish of settlement is to be exempt from bearing its fair share of the general cost of a poorhouse or asylum, including the and wages forming the "management" charge. On this point he argued that the case of *Hay v. Melville*¹ settled that the whole expenses of the salaries and wages of officials and servants attached to the establishment. These charges correspond to items which in the case of out-door relief are admittedly due, and in Hay v. Melville were not disputed. They seem to me to form as truly part of 'the money expended in behalf of' the pauper as the food which he consumes, or the clothing which he wears.

Jan. 29, 1892.
Beattie v.
Muir.

"It remains for me to deal with some of the subsidiary questions raised by the parties.

"Under the head of 'medicines' supplied in the asylum, the defender objects to being charged with a proportion of the item for tobacco and snuff, on the ground that these are luxuries. I have not been informed under what circumstances, or to what extent, they are supplied to inmates of the asylum, and I think I must assume that the charge for them is lawfully made, that is to say, is such that no ratepayer of the Barony Parish could successfully challenge it. If so, I think the defender must bear his proportion of it.

"The same observation applies to the charge for farm expenses. It happens that no charge can properly be made under this head for the two years in question, because there was a profit on the working of the farm. But if it were otherwise, I should assume that the outlay was lawful as for a curative agent, and I am informed not only that the Board of Lunacy requires, as a condition of granting its annual license to an asylum, that a considerable extent of arable land should be attached to it, but that the particular farm connected with the Woodilee Asylum is regarded by the board as not more than sufficient for its requirements.

"There are three methods of ascertaining the annual cost of house accommodation, whether in the case of asylums or poorhouses, and I have felt some difficulty as to which of these ought to be adopted. The first method, being that claimed by the pursuer, is to take the total cost on capital account incurred by his board from the beginning in acquiring and building the asylum or poorhouse, and to charge 3 per cent thereon. The second method is, to take the same percentage on the actual indebtedness outstanding on capital account, in the two years over which the claim extends, after allowing for the repayments of capital which have been made from time to time out of the yearly rates. The third method (being that favoured by the defender in the case of the asylum, for as regards the poorhouse he denies liability altogether), is to take the assessed value as entered in the Valuation-roll. I have come to the conclusion that the second method is the right one, on the ground that it represents the actual cost of the buildings at the date of contribution. It may be said that the repayments of capital have been made mainly at the expense of the relieving parish, and that the parish of settlement ought to bear its share of them. But sec. 72 of the Act of 1845 provides that, where a lunatic, from sickness or infirmity, is incapable of being removed, the relieving parish shall be entitled to recover a sum not exceeding the rate expended for relief of its own poor, which means, I think, the rate expended in the year of charge. It would be absurd to hold that the rate was different in the case of detention through sickness or infirmity from that recoverable down to the time when liability was established, and if so, sec. 72 affords a reason for taking the cost of house accommodation as it stands at the date when the liability to contribute arises. The first method would result in the relieving parish making a profit out of the transaction, and the third seems to me to be purely arbitrary. In the case of the poorhouse, as it happens, the sum in the Valuation-roll is higher than 3 per cent on the total cost, and a great deal higher than 3 per cent on the actual indebtedness.

"The defender appeals to the form of annual return issued by the Board of Supervision (No 22 of process), in which a distinction is drawn between 'management' and 'maintenance,' and under the former head are included, in the case staff by which a pauper was relieved must be borne by the parish itself, and could not be charged against the parish of settlement.

The pursuer argued ;—No expense for inspection had been included in the charge which the pursuer made. Hay v. Melville went no further than to disallow that expense. But it did not follow that the expense of caring for the pauper and nursing him should not be borne by his own parish.

The pursuer took advantage of the reclaiming note to contend further that the proper basis for the claim for house accommodation was not, as the Lord Ordinary had held, a percentage on the actual indebtedness on capital account of the pursuer's parish, but a percentage on the capital expended. The pursuer's parish had paid off part of that from assessment. But the whole expense, not the balance left unpaid, was what his parish had had to spend in order to be in a position to relieve the paupers.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that the Lord Ordinary has come to a right result. The only difficulty is with reference to the case of Hay v. Melville. I am clearly of opinion that it does not so bear upon the present question as to lead us to think that the Lord Ordinary has fallen into error. Every parish must have its inspector, and that whether there are any persons on the roll of paupers in the parish at any particular time or not. The inspector's salary must be paid whether there is any pauper to be maintained or not. The case of Hay v. Melville settled that the duties of inspection must be carried out by the parish, and that that duty includes the looking after a casual pauper belonging to another parish, and that the relieving parish makes no charge for that in settling with the pauper's own parish. As to the question whether the maintenance of a pauper is to include charges necessarily going to maintenance, such as the wages and salaries of the necessary officials who fulfil the duty of maintenance, I think that these charges are part of the expense of maintenance. They are necessarily incurred in performing the duty of maintaining the paupers.

The only other question is whether the parish which gives relief is entitled to charge for the building in which the pauper is maintained. When a parochial board is required in the discharge of its statutory duty to erect a new building for its paupers, they are required to recover from the ratepayers, first, of a poorhouse or parochial asylum, the salaries of officials and other 'establishment charges.' But this return is made for statistical purposes, and not for the ascertainment of the contribution due to a relieving parish by a parish of settlement, the amount of which must, I think, be determined, in the first place, by the actual outlay (as here set forth in the states appended to the joint minute of admissions), and in the second place, by the terms of the statute.

"The result of my opinion on the disputed items is as follows:—

"1. As regards the asylum.—From the item of 'medicines,' 2/13ths of a penny per week must admittedly come off, as being covered by the medical grant. The rest remains. From the item of 'salaries and wages,' 2½d. per week admittedly comes off for the same reason, and the balance remains. The charge for 'farm' must be struck out, in respect that there was a profit in each of the two years in question; otherwise I should have allowed it. The item of 'interest on indebtedness' must be limited to interest at 3 per cent on the actual indebtedness in each of the two years.

"2. As regards the poorhouse.—The 'land charges' and 'funeral charges' admittedly come off, for the reasons stated in the joint minute. The 'salaries of officials' stand. The 'property account' must be limited to 3 per cent on the actual indebtedness, as in the case of the asylum."

sum which may be represented as equivalent to the expense of rent; and second, a sum which is applied to form a sinking fund, whereby the expense of building is paid off and the building eventually freed from debt. That just means that when the whole of the sinking fund has been raised, and the debt has been paid off, then in future that board is not put to expense for maintenance under that head. But the parish must deal with the pauper belonging to another parish in this matter exactly as it deals with the paupers belonging to its own district. If the expense of buildings has ceased to be a part of the annual cost of dealing with pauperism, and no longer constitutes a proportion of the estimated charges on which assessment is levied, then it has ceased to be in any sense part of the expense of maintenance, and no charge can be properly made against another parish in respect of the cost of such buildings.

I concur in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD YOUNG and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree entirely with the Lord Ordinary. I think that there is a fair question, looking to the expressions of opinion in Hay v. Melville, whether the expenses known as the expenses of management ought to be taken into account in settling with the relieving parish. It is a question of some consequence in the adjustment of future accounts between parishes. I think that the case of Hay v. Melville does not decide that question as the parish of Bothwell contends.

Nelson v.
Scott, Croall,

Reparation—Master and Servant—Responsibility of auctioneer selling in the premises of another to his own servant.—Held (per Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner) that an auctioneer selling goods in the premises of another is not responsible for the sufficiency of these premises or of appliances connected with them, so as to be liable in damages for injuries caused to his own servant by their insufficiency.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Sale by auction—Liability of customers to auctioneer's servant.—At a sale by auction of the bankrupt stock of a coach-builder within his premises, an accident occurred to a person engaged in lowering by a hoist a lot of goods which had been sold. In an action of damages raised by him against A, the auctioneer, and against B, the purchaser of the lot, the pursuer averred that at the time of the accident he was in A's employment, that the accident would not have happened had the hoist been provided with a proper brake; that the goods had been loaded on the hoist under the superintendence of B, who grossly overweighted it, or permitted it to be overweighted; that B had been an apprentice with the coachbuilder and knew, or ought to have known, that the hoist was overweighted. The pursuer pleaded that the auctioneer was responsible to him for the hoist being defective in not having a proper brake, and that B was liable for the hoist being overweighted.

Held (1) that the pursuer had not stated a relevant case against A, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner, holding that an auctioneer is not responsible to his servants for the sufficiency of appliances in the premises of an employer, Lord Rutherford Clark holding that the pursuer's statement that the hoist was overweighted exonerated the auctioneer, as it was not alleged that he was responsible for this ; and (2) (dub. Lord Rutherford Clark) that there was no relevant ground of action stated against B.

THIS action was raised in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh by William Nelson, coachman, residing there, to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him while assisting at a sale by auction conducted by Messrs Scott, Croall, & Sons, of the Royal Horse Bazaar, Edinburgh, within the premises of the late firm of Drew & Burnett, coachbuilders, Edinburgh. The action was directed against Scott, Croall, & Sons, and H. & D. Cleland, purchasers at said sale.

The pursuer averred,—(Cond. 2) “The pursuer was employed by the defenders Scott, Croall, & Sons, in the beginning of April last, to prepare the bankrupt stock, carriages, and other material, belonging to the late firm of Drew & Burnett, coachbuilders, which was to be sold by them by public auction, on 23d April 1891. The said stock was conveyed by means of a hoist from the ground floor to the upper storey of Drew & Burnett’s premises in Fountainbridge, Edinburgh. The hoist is an ordinary carriage hoist, and is worked by a chain and passing over an overhead pulley, and round a drum on the ground floor. A carriage pole was the only brake appliance for said hoist, a bolt was driven through it to prevent its being pushed out by the drum while in motion.” (Cond. 3) “On 23d April 1891, the day of the sale, the pursuer was engaged as the servant of the defenders Scott, Croall, & Sons, in lowering the several lots to the ground floor after the sale, and while letting down the second lot (which had been bought by the defenders Messrs Cleland),” the pole which was used as a brake broke, in consequence of which the pursuer was seriously injured. “The goods had been loaded on the hoist under the superintendence of Mr Cleland, who is a partner of the defenders H. & D. Cleland, who (the pursuer afterwards ascertained) grossly overweighted it, or permitted it to be overweighted.” (Cond. 4) “There was no means of lowering the goods to the ground floor excepting the said hoist, which the defenders Scott, Croall, and Sons are responsible for, both at common law and under subsection 1 of section 1 of the Employers Liability Act, 1880. The hoist in question was for carriages only, and was not suitable for the work the defenders put it to. It was on 23d April 1891 being used by the defenders Scott, Croall, & Sons and by no one else, and had it not been for its faulty construction in not being supplied with a brake, the accident to the pursuer would not have happened. Further, the accident to the pursuer would not have happened had the hoist not been overweighted. It is usual for such machines to have brakes. The said Cleland who superintended the loading of the hoist was well aware of the way in which it was worked, as he served his apprenticeship with the said Drew & Burnett. It was he who ordered the pursuer to lower the hoist, and he saw that the pursuer was to brake it with the pole used for the purpose. He knew, or ought to have known, that the weight was far too heavy to allow it to be lowered in safety by the pole, but though he was aware that the pursuer did not know the weight of the load he permitted him to proceed to lower it in the way he did.”

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The hoist in question having been in use by the defenders Scott, Croall, & Sons at the time of the accident, they were responsible to their servants for its sufficiency, and are liable at common law to the pursuer in reparation. (2) If not liable at common law, they are under the Employers Liability Act, 1880. (3) In respect of the fault of their said servant, as condescended on, the defenders Messrs Cleland are also liable to the pursuer in reparation and damages.

Both defenders pleaded that the pursuer's record was irrelevant. On 23d December the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford) assoilzied the Clelands, and allowed the pursuer a proof of his averments against Scott, Croall, & Sons. No. 89.
Jan. 80, 1892.
Nelson v.
Scott, Croall,
& Sons.

The pursuer appealed.

Scott, Croall, & Sons argued;—There was no relevancy in the action as directed against them. The pursuer himself said that the hoist was an ordinary hoist, and it did not require to be of the very most recent construction. But it was not the property of Scott, Croall, & Sons, and they had nothing to do with it. Would an auctioneer be liable if, at a roup in a private house, the floor of a room collapsed (as it had once done in Picardy Place, at Lord Eldin's roup), and injured a number of customers? Plainly not.¹ But that was in law the same case as this. If the accident was due to overweighting there was no averment that Scott, Croall, & Company were parties to the overweighting.

Argued for Clelands;—There was no relevant case against them either. The hoist was not theirs, nor under their management, nor was the pursuer their servant. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—But he says you took possession of the hoist, loaded it, and told him to lower it, when you knew it was overloaded.] The averment of overloading would require to be much more specific.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The auctioneer was liable under section 1 of the Employers Liability Act for the sufficiency of the hoist, for it was being used in his business. (2) As regarded Cleland, there was a case of personal fault analogous to the fault of a person who drives over another in the street. It was a case of delict as against them.

LORD YOUNG.—This is an action of damages directed against two sets of defenders, Messrs Cleland, who are coachbuilders at Belford Bridge, and Scott, Croall, & Sons, auctioneers. The Sheriff-substitute has assoilzied the former set, but has sustained the action as against the others.

I shall begin with the case against Scott, Croall, & Sons. Their connection with the matter is of a simple and most intelligible kind. They were employed as auctioneers to sell off a bankrupt's stock on these premises. The trustee on the bankrupt estate required the services of a man to superintend the raising of the goods from the place beneath to the place above, where the auctioneer was to sell them, and the lowering of them again after the sale. Scott, Croall, & Sons employed the pursuer, who was a coachman out of place and altogether a proper and competent person for the job, and paid him. While he was lowering the second lot the hoist gave way. It is stated that part of Scott, Croall, & Sons' plant, for the sufficiency of which they were responsible, was, and proved to be, insufficient for its purpose, and that Scott, Croall, & Sons, whose plant it was, should be responsible for that insufficiency. That is the only ground of action against them.

That then puts us to consider what is the responsibility of an auctioneer who is employed to sell off goods on the premises of his employer. Is he responsible for the sufficiency of the premises, or for the sufficiency of the appliances for bringing forward and removing the goods that are to be sold? I am speaking, of course, of the common law, apart from all special contracts, and I am of opinion that an auctioneer, employed to sell goods in the premises of a customer, is under no such responsibility whatever. There might be specialties,—I am not put to imagine them,—which would impose such a liability, but there is no such specialty here. It is just the same case as that of an auctioneer selling pictures and furniture in a private house, where one of his men meets with an accident from the faulty condition of the stairs, which give way while he is carrying some of the furniture down them. The case is entirely distinguishable, and must be distinguished from the case of an auctioneer selling on his own premises, when he shall be responsible for the state of the premises and appliances both to customers and to his own servants.

I am of opinion, therefore, that there is no relevant case against Scott, Croall, & Sons. They had no duty or liability to see to the sufficiency of the hoist, or to see that it was properly loaded.

Then with respect to the Clelands, they were customers, who had bought goods. It is alleged that one of them had been an apprentice in these very premises, and knew about the hoist, and knew that it was insufficient. I do not think that that can be taken as a fact which will found an action against him. I think it was for the pursuer, who was sent to superintend this hoist, to see that it was not overloaded. If it is overloaded, and an accident results, he will have no action against the purchaser because he had been an apprentice in these premises. That is no ground of action. This was a case of mistaken judgment as to what the hoist would carry. There was no actionable wrong which can be founded on. The customer was not in any contract relation or other relation to the pursuer which will render him responsible to him.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that there is no relevant ground of action stated against either defender.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think that Scott, Croall, & Sons should be assolizied. But I do not proceed on any general ground. I prefer to proceed on the averment that the hoist broke because it was overweighted. Scott, Croall, & Sons were not responsible for that, and therefore the action against them is irrelevant.

I have had considerable difficulty as regards the Clelands, but, on the whole, I think that there is no relevant case against them either.

LORD TRAYNER and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK agreed with LORD YOUNG.

THE COURT recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and assolizied both defenders.

ROBERT SMITH, Appellant.—W. C. Smith—A. S. D. Thomson.
JOHN WILSON, Respondent.—Gunn.

Bankruptcy—Election of Trustee—Appeal—Competency—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 71.—At the election of a trustee in a sequestration, it was objected to an affidavit and claim that a bill by which it was vouched was prescribed, and that an acknowledgment of indebtedness endorsed on the bill, being holograph, did not prove its own date.

The Sheriff disallowed the vote on the ground that the acknowledgment did not bear to be holograph. In an appeal on the ground that the Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction in giving effect to an objection which had not been stated, held that the Sheriff had not exceeded his jurisdiction, and that the appeal was incompetent under the 71st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.

Farquharson v. Sutherland, 15 R. 759, distinguished.

THE estates of Robert Neilson, draper, Lauder, were sequestrated by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills on 16th November 1891, and the creditors met to elect a trustee on 27th November following. Five creditors to the amount of £525, 13s. 8d. voted for Mr John Wilson, and Robert Smith, a creditor to the amount of £342, 0s. 5d., for himself. No. 90. Feb. 4, 1892. Smith v. Wilson.

Objections were taken to the votes on both sides. Wilson lodged a note of objections to Smith's affidavit and claim. One of the items objected to was an alleged debt of £200, with £41, 0s. 2d. of interest which was vouched by a prescribed bill dated 10th October 1885, accepted by the bankrupt, and bearing this indorsation:—"I acknowledge that I am still due the amount of this bill, and interest from 10th October 1887. . . . 7th November 1891. ROBERT NEILSON." (Obj. 1). "The sum of £200 and interest thereon, £41, 0s. 2d., amounting together to the sum of £241, 0s. 2d., is sought to be vouched by a bill which has suffered the sexennial prescription, but which prescription is sought to be elided by a holograph acknowledgment endorsed thereon, bearing date 7th November 1891. The said bill having prescribed is not a sufficient voucher, and the said acknowledgment, which bears date shortly prior to sequestration, being holograph, does not prove its own date." 1st Division. Sheriff of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Selkirk.

The Sheriff-substitute (Dundas), on 5th January 1892, pronounced this interlocutor: ". . . For the reasons mentioned in the subjoined note, hereby declares the said John Wilson to have been duly elected trustee . . ."

Smith appealed.

Argued for him;—The appeal was competent, notwithstanding the exclusion of review by the 71st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, because the Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction. The objection which he had sustained had not been stated, but had emanated from the Sheriff himself.¹ His interlocutor must therefore be recalled, as he had no jurisdiction to deal with any objections other than those stated by the parties, which must be specific, and formed the record upon which he must proceed.² On the merits the Sheriff had gone wrong, because an acknowledgment of indebtedness did not require to be either holograph or tested. At all events, the language of the objection stated that it was holograph. There was prima facie proof of the debt upon the bill and acknowledgment taken together, which was enough for the purposes of a trustee's election.³ The case should, therefore, be remitted to the Sheriff with instructions, as provided by the 170th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.

Argued for Wilson;—The appeal was incompetent, as the Sheriff's interlocutor was final under the 71st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.⁴ The affidavit and claim had been objected to here, although the

I can only say that the writing does not bear to be holograph, and I do not think it necessary to express any opinion as to what would be the effect of it if it were so."

Smith v.

specific objection given effect to by the Sheriff-substitute might not have been stated in terms.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an appeal against the judgment of a Sheriff-substitute declaring the election of a certain person as trustee in a sequestration. The 71st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, enacts that “the judgment of the Sheriff declaring the person or persons elected to be trustee or trustees in succession shall be given with the least possible delay ; and such judgment shall be final, and in no case subject to review in any Court or in any manner whatever.” It is, therefore, incumbent on the appellant to make out that the Sheriff’s judgment discloses an excess of jurisdiction so as to oust it from the privileged position assigned to such judgment by the statute. If we have regard to the note appended to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, it appears that the scrutiny upon which the judgment proceeded was an examination of the votes tendered and of the vouchers by which they were supported. In one instance the Sheriff-substitute has sustained an objection to a claim on the ground that, the debt being instructed by a prescribed bill with an alleged holograph acknowledgment on the back, he could not give effect to such a voucher, because the acknowledgment did not bear to be holograph. When this is seen to be the nature of the judgment, I think it comes to be one of the most ordinary adjudications upon the merits of a vote, the very question which the Legislature by the 71st section of the statute has declared shall not be appealable.

But it has been argued that the Sheriff-substitute was not entitled to consider any legal point or plea which was not set forth in the written note of objections which was lodged. That, as it appears to me, is just an invitation to us to review the judgment of the Sheriff upon each vote, and the objection on the ground of excess of jurisdiction comes to this, that while the vote in question was objected to on grounds which were stated, the ground to which the Sheriff-substitute gave effect was not specifically set forth, although it arose ex facie of the voucher produced. I think the Sheriff was within his jurisdiction in so proceeding, and that we ought, therefore, to refuse this appeal as incompetent.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. I only wish to say that I do not think the present case at all resembles that of Farquharson. If the Sheriff had sustained an objection to a vote to which no objection had been lodged, the case would have been different. But that is not so, and the vote which has been rejected here is one which was formally and properly objected to.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think the case of Farquharson is not in point. In that case the Sheriff refused to exercise the jurisdiction given him by the statute, because he declined, on a ground that had not been pleaded, to examine a number of votes and the vouchers tendered in their support, and therefore the Court called upon him to perform his statutory functions and examine these votes and vouchers. In the present case the Sheriff seems to me to have done exactly what he was bound to do, for he has considered the objections raised and has decided upon them. It is suggested that he has gone beyond his jurisdiction, because he has disposed of an objection on a ground not stated to him. The objection is to the amount of a creditor’s claim, and is rested on the ground that part of the claim is sought to be vouched by a bill which has suffered the sexennial prescription. It was answered that prescription had been elided by a holograph acknowledgment endorsed on the bill. To that it was replied that the acknowledgment did not set up the bill, because it did not prove its own date; and the Sheriff decided that it did not set up the bill, because it did not prove itself to be holograph. Whether that was right or wrong, it was certainly a decision of the question submitted to him for his judgment, viz., whether the bill, together with the acknowledgment, was or was not a good voucher, and it appears to me of no consequence whether in so deciding he proceeded on grounds that were stated in argument or on grounds that occurred to himself.

But then it is said that the ground of the Sheriff's decision is contradicted by an admission made by the objector. It is unnecessary to consider whether the judgment could have been set aside if it had proceeded on a ground of fact which was contrary to what was stated by one party and admitted by the other, because in this case the supposed admission does not appear to me to be an admission in fact at all. What the objector says is, that the acknowledgment "being holograph" does not prove its own date. Now, it is not the fact of its being holograph which prevents the document from proving its own date, but the fact that it is not tested, and the objection seems to me to mean no more than this—that assuming the document to be holograph, it is ineffectual for the reasons stated. Whether the objection is well founded or not, it is not for us to consider, because I do not think it doubtful that the Sheriff has decided the question on grounds which were competently before him.

THE appeal was refused as incompetent.

Low's Trustees v. Whitworth.

Succession—"Family"—Conditio si sine liberis.—A bequest to the "family" of A held not to include the grandchildren of A.

A testator directed one-half of the residue of his estate to be paid to "the families of my two sisters." Both sisters left children who survived the testator, but one of the children of the elder sister had predeceased the date at which the testament was made, leaving a family. Held that this family did not take any part of the residue.

Succession—Division per stirpes or per capita.—A testator gave the interest on the residue of his estate equally among his two sisters and a sister-in-law, "the families of the annuitants to get the interest of their mother until the death of the last annuitant," when the residue was to be divided into two parts, one part going to the Free Church, the other to "the families of my two sisters." All three annuitants had families, and the children of the sister-in-law and one of the sisters enjoyed their mothers' interest during the survivance of the longest liver of the sisters. On the death of the last annuitant held that the half of the residue should be divided between the families of the two sisters per stirpes.

JOHN LOW died at Aberdeen on 26th July 1872 leaving one holograph 2D DIVISION. testamentary writing dated 22d May 1869, and another dated 22d April Sheriff of Aberdeen-shire. 1872. After his death doubts were raised as to whether the second of these writings was a testamentary writing or a mere memorandum. To solve these doubts a special case was presented to the Second Division of the Court, and, on 21st June 1873 (11 Macph. 744, 45 Scot. Jur. 452), the Court held that it was also a testamentary writing, and must receive effect.

By the former of these deeds Mr Low provided,—“ I desire the interest on the residue of my estate to be divided into three equal parts (after deducting an allowance to the party who may be appointed as factor for the trust), and given to my two sisters, Margaret Lawrie and Mary Brebner, and my sister-in-law, Mrs Low, in half-yearly payments. The families of the annuitants to get the interest of their mothers until the death of the last annuitant, when at the ensuing money term the residue of my estate is to be divided into two parts—the one half for the families of my two sisters (excluding the jus mariti of their husbands), and the other half to the Treasurer of the Free Church for the Sustentation and College Funds equally.”

By the second deed he provided,—“ I desire to bequeath as follows:—

to my sister Margaret,	.	.	.	£200 p. ann.

&c., &c., &c.

Mr Low was survived by his sister-in-law and both his sisters. The longer lived of them, Mrs Brebner, died on 15th February 1891. During her survivance Mrs Low's and Mrs Lawrie's children enjoyed the income their respective mothers had enjoyed.

Mrs Lawrie, his elder sister, had eight children. The eldest of them Mrs Brown, had predeceased the execution of the first settlement, leaving a family. The seven other children of Mrs Lawrie, one of whom was Mrs Whitworth, survived the testator.

Mrs Brebner, who had first been married to Mr Lundie, left two children by her marriage with him, and one by her marriage with Brebner.

The estate having become divisible by the death of Mrs Brebner, multiplepointing was raised in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire to determine who were entitled to the half of the residue destined to the “families” of the testator's sisters, the questions being, 1st, whether Mrs Lawrie's grandchildren, i.e., Mrs Brown's children, were entitled to a share of the residue so destined? and, 2d, whether the division among the “families” should be per stirpes or per capita?

The pursuers and real raisers were the trustees of Mr Low. The defenders who lodged defences were, first, Mrs Whitworth and the other surviving children of Mrs Lawrie, who pleaded that on a sound construction of the testamentary writings the fund in medio was divisible equal per capita among the children of Mrs Lawrie and Mrs Brebner who survived the testator—Mrs Brown and her children being excluded from participation in respect that she predeceased the testator, and, separately, that her children were provided for by the testator in his said testamentary writings with a special legacy of £1000, in such a manner as to shew that the testator did not intend them to participate in the residue of his estate. The other claimants were, second, James Henry Brown and others, children of Mrs Brown and grandchildren of Mrs Lawrie; and, third, William H. Lundie and others, the children of Mrs Brebner. They maintained that on a sound construction of the testamentary writings the fund was divisible between the families of Mrs Lawrie and Mrs Brebner per stirpes.

The Sheriff-substitute (Brown), on 29th September 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds on a sound construction of the testamentary writings of the deceased John Low that the residue of his estate, forming the fund in medio, falls to be divided among the families of his two sisters, Margaret Lawrie and Mary Brebner, excepting the family of the deceased Eliza Lawrie or Brown, the eldest daughter of the said Margaret Lawrie, per stirpes: Finds that the said Eliza Lawrie or Brown having predeceased the date of the deed of settlement was not instituted under it, and therefore that the claimants who derive through her take no benefit under the deed: Finds further, that the family of the said Eliza Lawrie or Brown are excluded from participating in the residue of the deceased John Low by the special bequest of £1000 made for them under the deceased's second testamentary writing." The Sheriff-substitute then ranked and preferred the claimants in terms of these findings.*

Low's Trustees v. Whitworth.

* "NOTE.—The two questions involved in this case are concisely and clearly stated in the summons of multipointing by which the several claimants have been brought into Court, and the facts out of which they arise are of quite simple character. One of these, taking the order in which they were presented in argument, is, whether the Brown family, being the children of Eliza Lawrie or Brown, a niece of the testator, have any interest in the residue of the estate forming the fund in medio? I am of opinion they have not, and that they are excluded on two grounds. The first of these is, that the parent of the claimants having predeceased the date of settlement, she was never instituted under it; and, therefore, there is no room for the operation of the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit. This doctrine was fully recognised in the two leading cases, Sturrock v. Binny, Nov. 20, 1843, 6 D. 117, 16 Scot. Jur. 100, and Rhind's Trustees v. Leith and Others, Dec. 5, 1866, 5 Macph. 104, 39 Scot. Jur. 120, and was referred to and adopted in Blair's Executor v. T aylor, Jan. 18, 1876, 3 R. 362, and in the very recent special case Hall v. Hall, March 17, 1891, 18 R. 690. I assume that all the circumstances concur that would otherwise admit the condition, viz., that the testator stood in loco parentis, and was making a family settlement, and that the legatees were not nominatim instituted, but it seems not doubtful on the authorities above quoted that the family of Eliza Lawrie or Brown have no claim to the residue as deriving right through her. The second ground on which I reject the claim of the Brown family is, that a special provision was made for Eliza Lawrie or Brown's family in view, undoubtedly, of the fact that they did not otherwise take under the settlement. An argument, indeed, was maintained in favour of the claimants on the terms of this special provision, it being urged that Eliza is dealt with by the testament precisely as her sisters Sophia and Mary are—a further indication of the intention of the testator that her family should also share in the residue being that a legacy is left to the Rev. John Brown as nameson. I am unable to adopt this view, because, on the contrary, I think it is clear that, in view of the predecease many years before of Eliza Lawrie or Brown, the codicil of 22d April 1872 left the legacy of £1000 to her family, the testator simply emphasising by the terms of his bequest that he had not forgotten his dead niece. In the view I thus take of the case, it is not necessary to consider the doctrine laid down in Irvine v. Irvine, July 9, 1873, 11 Macph. 892, 45 Scot. Jur. 546.

"The second question is, whether the division of the residue destined to the families of the testator's two sisters is to be per capita or per stirpes? This is

Low's Trustees v. Whitworth.

Mrs Whitworth and James Henry Brown both appealed, the former on the question of the division per stirpes, the latter on the question of the exclusion of the grandchildren from the benefits given to the "families" of the testator's sisters.

Argued for Mrs Whitworth;—(1) The Sheriff was right in excluding the grandchildren for the reasons stated by him, and further because "families," although an elastic word, meant, prima facie, children only.¹ The case of Williams cited on the other side² was rightly explained by Jarman³ as an exceptional case depending on the particular context. In Scotland the point was said to have been directly decided in the case of a point undoubtedly of more difficulty, but after the best consideration I have been able to give it, I have come to be of opinion that the latter is the true rule of distribution. By the first writing the testator directed that the interest on the residue of his estate should be divided into three equal parts and given to the two sisters already mentioned and to his sister-in-law. By the second codicil these interests are converted into fixed annuities, but I apprehend that does not in any way affect the rule of division that now falls to be applied. What is important to note is how the testator, in the first place, deals with the interest of the residue. He gives that in three equal parts, and provides that the families of the annuitants are to get the interest of their mothers until the death of the last annuitant. The rule of construction is undoubted, that when a share of residue, whether original or lapsed, is given in liferent and fee to a person named and the children respectively, the division is per stirpes. There are here two liferents, and the question practically is, whether that is ousted by throwing into the fee the liferent of a third person? But for the increment the division of the fee would certainly be per stirpes, and looking to the whole conception of the settlement, and the manner in which the families of the testator's two sisters are dealt with in the first part of the deed, I think it would require words of a particularly distributive character to justify the division per capita, for which the other claimants contend. The very contrary is the case, for the testator continues to use the word 'families,' providing that the enlarged fee is to go to them equally. Both parties relied on the case of Richardson v. Macdougall, March 26, 1868, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 18, 40 Scot. Jur. 466, reported in the Court of Session in this branch of it Feb. 6, 1866, 4 Macph. 373, 38 Scot. Jur. 187.

"I cannot see, however, how the supporters of a per capita division make out that they take any advantage from this case, because the doctrine expounded by the Lord Justice-Clerk as to the division of the fee was undoubtedly upset in the House of Lords. The judgment is distinctly so rubricked, and the point is specially dealt with in the opinions of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Westbury. But the Lord Justice-Clerk, as Lord President in the case of Home's Trustees v. Ramsay and Others, Dec. 11, 1884, 12 R. 314, makes it quite clear how he understood the judgment of the House of Lords when he says that under a destination of residue in liferent and fee to a person named, and to children respectively, the distribution as per stirpes is settled by the case of Richardson v. Macdougall. I quite recognise the specialty in Home's Trustees v. Ramsay and Others, quoted as an authority by the claimants who have been preferred, that the share of a daughter dying without issue was given in liferent to her surviving sisters, and that it is necessary in the present case to go beyond the general principle which has been referred to to the deed itself to gather the testator's intention; but it seems to me, for the reason already assigned, that there is a clear indication of what that is, and that the general rule of law and the intention blend together. Reference was further made by the successful claimants to Laing's Trustees, 18th Nov. 1879, 7 R. 244, and to the case of Cumming, 13th Jan. 1891, 18 R. 380."

Irvine,¹ but that case proceeded on the conditio which was not applicable here, for the reasons stated by the Sheriff-substitute. Again, the word "families" clearly meant children only in the earlier clause providing for the interest, for it was there correlative with "mothers." (2) The division should be per capita, not per stirpes. There was no bequest of life-rent and fee to a parent and her children respectively, as the Sheriff-substitute seemed to think. There were three annuities in the first place, and these three annuities falling out, the capital went one-half to the Free Church the other half to the families of two of the annuitants, leaving out the family of the third. There was thus a direct bequest of the fee to the families, and that being so, a different principle, recognised both in England² and Scotland,³ applied by which the bequest was divided per capita among the individuals composing the favoured class. Keeping this fact in view, the authorities cited by the Sheriff-substitute were really authorities in the appellant's favour. In England this distinction between cases in which there was a gift to a family of the fee of a sum which had been previously liferented by the head of that family and cases where there was a direct gift to the family was clearly kept in view, and the result was different in the two classes.

The appellants James Henry Brown and others argued;—Families included descendants, however remote. That was settled by Irvine's case. The grandchildren came in, according to that case, as representing their parents. In England the term was elastic, and this idea of representation was by no means excluded.⁴ That provision was made in the codicil for Mrs Brown's children to some extent might have been important had it not been that similar provision was made for children of others who were clearly to share in the residue. On the question of division per stirpes or capita these appellants offered no argument.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) As regarded the exclusion of Mrs Brown's family, they adopted the argument of the appellant Mrs Whitworth; (2) as regarded the principle of division, that must be as the Sheriff-substitute had held. The important point was the gift of income to the parents, and then the gift of the fee to representatives of these parents, by means of the word "families," which had been described as "an aggregate word."⁵

LORD TRAYNER.—The claims now made on the fund in medio give rise to two questions,—(First) who are to be held as in the "families" of the two sisters, and (second) is the division of the fund among those entitled to share therein to be per capita or per stirpes?

The former of these questions arises thus:—Mrs Lawrie, one of the testator's sisters, had a daughter Eliza Lawrie or Brown, who died in 1859, that is ten years before the date of the settlement now under consideration, leaving children and grandchildren. These children and grandchildren claim the share in the fund in medio, as being of the "family" of Mrs Lawrie, the testator's sister, maintaining that the word "family" means not children only, but descendants generally. I think these claimants cannot succeed in their claim upon this ground. The word "family" when used as a term of designation is synonymous with children, a character which these claimants do not possess. It is quite true that in the case of Irvine, it was said that the "family," in the circumstances of that case, would include all descendants. But in that case the destination which was being construed was one in favour of nephews and nieces, "and the families of such as may have predeceased," and the question was whether under such a destination the grandchildren of a predeceasing nephew took equally with the child of that nephew. It was held that they did, not because they were included in the destination as of the nephew's family, but because they were entitled to their deceased parent's share on the principle of implied conditional institution. In cases in which that principle is applicable it was said that the word "family" had a wider signification than "children."

Here the destination is to the family of each sister of the testator without any provision for the succession of the issue of any member of such family to the predeceasing parent's share, and it seems to me that the destination here is in favour of the family,—that is, the children of the two sisters who were alive at the date of vesting. Whether under that destination the children of any member of the family predeceasing would be entitled to succeed on the conditio si sine liberis need not here be considered, for in this case there is no room for the application of that principle. Mrs Brown, through whom the claimants claim, was never herself instituted, for she died ten years before the testator's settlement was executed.

The Sheriff-substitute has rejected the claims of these claimants on another ground, viz., that they are the direct beneficiaries under the testator's codicil of a special legacy. I should rather regard that fact as shewing that the testator made a special provision in favour of his grandnephews and niece, because they did not under his will take any share in the division of the residue. If I had read the provision as to the division of the residue otherwise than I have done, I should not have been disposed to hold that a special legacy in itself militated against the view that they were also to participate in the residue. But this question need not enter into the decision of the case. It is enough to say that these claimants who claim through Mrs Brown neither take directly under the destination of the settlement, nor on the ground of implied conditional institution.

The remaining question is, Is the division of the residue to be a division per capita or per stirpes? On that question I agree with the Sheriff-substitute, and with the reasons assigned by him for his judgment.

THE LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the third finding in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, quoad ultra adhered to the interlocutor and dismissed the appeal, and of consent of parties ranked and preferred the claimants accordingly.

Company—General meeting—Voting—Special resolution—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 51.—By the 51st section of the Companies Act, 1862, a majority of “not less than three-fourths” of such members, “for the time being entitled to vote, as may be present in person or by proxy,” is required to pass a special resolution of a company; and it is provided that “a declaration by the chairman that the resolution has been carried shall be conclusive evidence of the fact without proof of the number or proportion of the votes.”

Where an amendment was put against a special resolution for the voluntary winding-up of a company, the minute, which was signed by the chairman, bore that, “a shew of hands being taken, there voted for the former four and for the latter eight. The resolution therefore became the decision of the meeting, and the chairman declared it carried.” Held that as the minute shewed that the resolution had not been passed by the requisite statutory majority, the resolution could not receive effect.

Company—Judicial winding-up—Inability to pay debt—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 79.—In a petition for the judicial winding-up of a limited company which was admittedly deemed solvent, the petitioners founded upon a judgment debt for £58 awarded to them under a decree-arbitral, the inducere of a charge upon the extract decree having expired without payment. The company admitted that £43 of the £58 was due, and in order to make good their objection to the remaining portion, it would have been necessary to suspend the decree and reduce the decree-arbitral. Held that no sufficient ground had been shewn why the prayer of the petition should not be granted.

THE SCOTTISH PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, was incorporated under 1ST DIVISION. the Companies Acts in 1885, and thereafter carried on its business of owning and publishing a magazine or magazines and other literature in Edinburgh. It had a capital of £5000 in £1 shares. 2245 of these were issued, on each of which 12s. had been paid up.

On 23d December 1891 Samuel Cowan and Cowan & Company, printers, Perth, presented a petition to the First Division craving that the Publishing Company should be wound up by the Court under the 79th and 80th sections of the Act of 1862.* The petitioners stated that they were creditors of the respondents in the sums (1) of £58, 12s. 2d., with interest from 1st February 1889; and (2) of £10, 10s., both found due under a decree-arbitral in a submission between the parties, dated 24th November 1891. The petitioners had charged the respondents upon the warrant contained in the decree, and the inducere had expired without payment.

The Scottish Publishing Company lodged answers, in which they stated that the company was perfectly solvent, and had no liabilities beyond the petitioners' alleged debt. They further alleged that the proceedings in the arbitration were illegal, but that they had not taken steps to challenge them, in view of the fact that, at an extraordinary general meeting of the company on 29th December 1891, a resolution had been passed to wind up the company voluntarily.†

* The Companies Act, 1862, sec. 79, provided that “a company under this Act may be wound up by the Court . . . under the following circumstances,—that is to say . . . (4) whenever the company is unable to pay its debts.”

Section 80 provided that “a company under this Act shall be deemed to be unable to pay its debts . . . (3) whenever in Scotland the inducere of a charge for payment in an extract decree, or an extract registered bond, or an extract registered protest have expired without payment being made.”

† The resolution proposed was,—“That the company be wound up voluntarily

They maintained that the application was presented with no other object than to concuss the respondents into paying a disputed debt, and that, as a matter of justice and expediency, there were no grounds for interfering with the voluntary liquidation.

Mr Denham, a shareholder of the company, was allowed to compare, and lodged answers, in which he stated that he concurred in the prayer of the petition.

At the hearing, it was stated that the respondents admitted liability for £43 of the alleged debt.

Argued for the petitioners;—1. Wherever as here the induciae upon a charge on a decree of Court had expired without payment, a company was deemed to be unable to pay its debts, irrespective of its actual solvency or insolvency,¹ and the debt being established, it was the duty of the Court to order a winding-up. The validity of this decree was never questioned until the answers were lodged. It differed from the debt in Bowes' case, as the decree here proceeded upon an award pronounced under a reference to an arbiter. The company was really quite solvent, and no indulgence should be shewn to it. The Walkinshaw Oil Company case² was not in point, as in answer to the petition for winding-up in that case it was stated that the company was desirous of going on with its business, and consigned the amount of the debt in bank. 2. The company's resolution for a voluntary winding-up was clearly incompetent, as the minute stated that it had not been passed by the requisite majority of three-fourths, and was thus not in compliance with the 51st section of the statute.*³

Argued for the respondents;—1. It had never been held ex debito justitiae that a creditor might come forward in any case where his debt was not paid and get a compulsory winding-up. The matter was one for the discretion of the Court, and the Court would discourage a practice of compelling payment of a debt by the threat of a winding-up.⁴ The reason why the respondents had not suspended the charge was because they thought the voluntary winding-up would proceed, and they had no reason to doubt its validity. They now offered to consign the amount of the alleged debt, and to bring a suspension of the charge. 2. The minute of meeting to which exception was taken ought to be treated as if it had under the provisions of the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, and that Mr Robert A. Marr . . . be and is hereby appointed liquidator for the purposes of such winding-up." And the minute of meeting bore,—“Mr Forbes' amendment being then put against the proposed resolution, and a shew of hands being taken, there voted for the former four, and for the latter eight. The resolution therefore became the decision of the meeting, and the chairman declared it carried. No poll was demanded in either case.” The minute was signed by the chairman.

Scottish Publishing Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Upon the first question in this case, viz., whether there is here a voluntary liquidation or not, I cannot say that I have any doubt. We have to judge of it upon the minute of meeting of 29th December last, and having regard to the fact that, by the 51st section of the Companies Act of 1862, a majority of three-fourths is necessary to carry a special resolution, the question is whether there is such a majority here. I think the contrary is shewn, because the minute bears that the figures for the resolution and amendment are eight and four respectively. These figures do not shew a majority of three-fourths; but upon the footing that these are the media, as I think they purport to be, by which the conclusion is reached, the minute goes on to state,—"The resolution therefore became the decision of the meeting, and the chairman declared it carried." It is true that the section I have referred to bears that "a declaration of the chairman that the resolution has been carried shall be deemed conclusive evidence of the fact, without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against the same." But in the present case we find a minute under the hand of the chairman which is evidence not corroborative but contradictory of the validity of the resolution. Now, the section merely dispenses with the need of proving the numbers, but it does not suggest that, when they are proved, under the hand of the chairman and in the very minute founded on, the chairman's declaration is to overrule and nullify them. Accordingly, without entering upon a consideration of the questions which have been argued in regard to the manner of voting or the construction of the provisions relating to voting by proxy, I think the case must be treated as one where there is no voluntary liquidation.

The other question which follows is whether the Court is to grant or refuse a compulsory winding-up. The petitioners hold a decree for £58, 12s. 2d., and the respondents' case was opened upon the footing that that entire sum was still in dispute. But it now appears that the question, as we have to decide it, relates only to a balance of that sum amounting to £15. Further, when the nature of the debt and of the objections to it are examined, it appears that there is a decree-arbitral under which the petitioners were awarded the sum of £58, 12s. 2d., and that the objections are of a somewhat shadowy character. Applying the kind of consideration which the Court is in the habit of giving, where they are scrutinising the answer to a judgment debt, I cannot say that the objections pleaded are either very sharply stated or are such as are instantly refutable. They were not stated at the outset, because the correspondence shews that £58 was for some time treated as an extant debt of the company. It now appears that the debt is not admitted, but that the position is that, if anything is to be made of the objection, there must be a suspension of the decree and then a reduction of the decree-arbitral. I cannot see that it is at all demonstrated that decree of reduction would be matter of high or immediate probability.

Accordingly, we have now to decide whether we are to refuse liquidation upon the footing that the objections stated to the debt in question involve a suspension and a reduction of a decree-arbitral, the sum in dispute being now only £15 of the original £58. If we were to give effect to these objections, I think we should create a very dangerous precedent, for we should encourage all sorts of cavils against judgment debts every time an order for liquidation is sought. I am not prepared to accept that responsibility, and accordingly I am for granting the prayer of the petition.

LORD ADAM.—The first question for consideration is whether there is a good voluntary liquidation or not. By the 51st section of the Companies Act of 1862, a majority of not less than three-fourths of the members of the company voting either in person or by proxy is required to pass such a special resolution as we have here, and the question is whether it is the fact that the resolution was carried in conformity with the requirements of that section. I do not mean to pronounce any opinion as to what view I should have taken if there had been no statement as to the numbers voting, and if the minute had merely stated that the resolution was declared by the chairman to be carried. Even although it had not been so carried in point of fact, I am not sure that we should have been entitled to make any inquiry into that, or that any proof in contradiction of its terms would have been admissible.

But in the present case we have it under the hand of the chairman, and upon the face of the minute, that the resolution was carried by a majority of two to one, and accordingly we see that, in point of fact, the resolution was not carried by the requisite majority of three-fourths. Accordingly, I agree that there is no voluntary liquidation.

That being so, the next question is whether we ought to grant a judicial winding-up. I do not think it is necessary to decide what amount of debt in dispute would justify the Court in ordering a winding-up. But where we have a decree for £58 in favour of the petitioning creditor, which is admittedly well founded to the extent of £43, and where we find that, in order to set it aside, there must be a suspension and a reduction of a decree-arbitral, I think it is very clear that the dispute is not such as we ought to recognise. I therefore think we ought to allow the winding-up.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

COUNSEL for the company tendered payment of the debt and the petitioners' expenses, and the Lord President stated that on a minute being put in to the effect that payment had been made, the petition would be dismissed.

JAMES M'DUFF, Pursuer (Respondent).—Shaw—A. S. D. Thomson.
JOHN BALFOUR, Defender (Reclaiming).—Comrie Thomson—C. N. Johnston.

Lease—Management—Consumption and application of straw and dung—Rights of landlord and tenant at expiry.—An agricultural tenant under a lease for a term of years, with entry at Martinmas, was bound by the lease to leave to the proprietor or incoming tenant at its expiry at Martinmas the dung that might be made after the 15th June immediately before the expiry, "at a price to be fixed by arbitration," the lease requiring that all dung made previously should be applied to the lands. It was also stipulated that the tenant "shall not sell or remove from said farm any . . . straw . . . or dung of any kind that may be grown or made on the lands hereby let, but shall annually consume the same on said farm for manure, and shall apply such manure to the lands yearly."

In the district in which the farm was situated the green crop was the only crop to which manure was applied. According to the custom which prevailed when the lease was entered into, the straw crop, with the exception of a small portion reserved for the minor uses of the farm, was consumed in winter by cattle kept in courts (few cattle being kept in summer, and those on pasture), and the manure so made was applied to the next year's crop. No. 93.

Feb. 5, 1892.
M'Duff v.
Balfour.

The tenant afterwards fed cattle in courts in summer, and to provide litter reserved half of the straw crop of the previous year, so that when he left the farm at Martinmas 1890 there was upon it a large amount of manure made after the immediately preceding 15th of June.

In an action by the tenant for payment of the value of this manure under the first clause of the lease, the landlord pleaded that, in terms of the clause providing for the annual consumption and application of the straw, the tenant ought to have applied before 15th June 1890 the portion of the straw crop of 1889 which he had reserved for litter, that he had accumulated it in violation of the lease, and was therefore not entitled to be paid for the manure made therefrom.

Held (1) that on a reasonable construction of the lease the tenant had a period of twelve months for the consumption of the straw and a separate period for the application to the lands of the manure therefrom; (2) that the period of consumption of straw ran from harvest to harvest, and that though the tenant was bound to apply to the land by 15th June all the manure then available, he was not precluded by the lease from retaining a large part of the straw for consumption by stall-fed cattle during the summer and autumn months, the manure produced being applicable to the land in the following spring; (3) that in this view he had not accumulated the straw in violation of the lease, and was entitled to receive payment for the manure made from it. Diss. Lord Adam, who held that the tenant was bound under the lease to consume the whole straw crop of a year during the succeeding winter and to apply the manure to the green crop of the next year; and that the clause binding the tenant to leave to the proprietor or incoming tenant at the end of the lease the dung made after the 15th June in the last year of the lease was intended to apply to dung made from the straw of the last crop under the lease consumed by cattle in courts between harvest and Martinmas.

FROM 1866 to 1885 James M'Duff was tenant of the farm of Kingsdale on the estate of Balbirnie in Fife. At the expiry of the nineteen years lease he obtained a new one from the proprietor, Mr John Balfour, for other nineteen years from Martinmas 1885, with an option to either party to terminate the lease at the expiry of five years. The farm extended to 349 acres, and the rent fixed was £460. 1st Division.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

The lease contained, inter alia, the following stipulations:—"And further" (the tenant) "to manage, cultivate, and improve the lands hereby let, according to the rules of good husbandry, adopting a rotation of not less than five years, whereof two years at least shall be pasture, and shall not hurt or run out the same by taking scourging crops or otherwise, and particular, without prejudice to the foresaid generality, the following stipulations are specially agreed to, namely, . . ." that "the tenant shall leave to the proprietor or incoming tenant at the expiry of the lease the dung that may be made after the 15th day of June immediately before the expiry; that all dung made previously must be applied to the lands hereby let for the benefit thereof, said dung so to be left to be paid for by the proprietor or incoming tenant at a price to be fixed by two arbiters to be mutually chosen, it being understood that where compensation is claimed for feeding stuffs consumed on the holding, the value of the dung must be estimated as if it had been made by the consumption of the natural produce of the farm only . . ."; that "the tenant shall be entitled to sell turnips and hay, provided he shall produce evidence to the satisfaction of the proprietor that he has brought and applied to the lands hereby let vegetable matter, bones, or dung to at least the same manurial value during previous years; that, with the exceptions above-mentioned, the tenant shall not sell or remove from said farm any turnips or green crop (except potatoes), hay, grass, straw, fodder, chaff, or dung of any kind that may be grown or made on the lands hereby let, but shall annually consume the same on said farm for manure, and shall apply such manure to the lands yearly."

M'Duff availed himself of the option to break the lease at the end of the first five years, and the lease accordingly came to an end at Martinmas 1890. At that date there was upon the farm 1372 cubic yards of manure, which M'Duff averred had been made since 15th June 1890, and the value of which he claimed from his landlord at a price to be fixed by arbiters in terms of his lease.

The landlord denied that he was bound to take over so large a quantity of manure, and accordingly M'Duff, upon 9th December 1890, raised an action to enforce payment.

In his statement of facts the defender, inter alia, averred,—(Stat. 2. "During the last three years of the lease the pursuer, instead of annually consuming the straw upon the farm, has kept it up, and used instead purchased material, such as mill dust. Accordingly, at 15th June last, the pursuer had on the farm a quantity of straw amounting to about a whole year's crop, and out of all proportion in excess of the quantity which would have been on the farm at that date in the ordinary course of prudent management, or if he had complied with the provisions of the lease. About that time he brought upon the farm a large stock of cattle, which consumed the straw, and converted it into manure between 15th June and Martinmas. Under the lease as aforesaid, the tenant's claim for payment for manure is limited to the manure made subsequent to 15th June in the last year of the lease. The object of the pursuer in adopting the course of management detailed was to make an abnormal quantity of manure within the foresaid period, and claim payment for it."

The defender pleaded ;—(3) The defender is not bound to pay for more manure than would have been made in the ordinary course of prudent management and in accordance with the system of cultivation prescribed by the lease within the period specified in the lease, and the pursuer is bound to leave the remainder free of charge to the defender.

The value of the manure at Martinmas 1890 was ascertained to be £291, 11s.

A proof having been allowed, the following were the material facts:—

The amount of manure left on the farm at the close of the lease was exceptionally large compared with previous experience in the matter in other farms of the size in the neighbourhood. Intending offerers for the farm were deterred by the fact from coming forward, and in the end the landlord was compelled to accept from the incoming tenant a sum much less than its value. It was, however, proved that the manure had all been made after 15th June 1890, and it was not disputed that it was made from the straw of the crop which was reaped in September 1889. The exceptional amount of the manure was accounted for by the fact that during his second lease the pursuer had introduced a different system of management from that practised generally in the district, with the result of making a greater quantity of manure during the summer months. The general custom in the neighbourhood had been followed by the pursuer during the whole of the previous lease. Under it the bulk of the year's crop of straw was made into manure in the course of the following winter and applied to the next season's green crop, only a small proportion of the straw, a fourth to a sixth, being kept after the month of June for litter during the summer, for happing the potatoes, and for thatching the stacks of the next crop. During the winter a large stock of cattle were kept and fattened in courts. In summer comparatively few cattle were kept, and these were pastured in the fields, so that little manure was thus made in summer. The district was not a wheat-growing one, no wheat was grown on Kingsdale farm, and the green crop was the only crop to which the manure was applied.

No. 93.

Feb. 5, 1892.
M'Duff v.
Balfour.

Under his new system of management the pursuer kept as many cattle in summer as in winter, and he fattened them in courts, buying such feeding stuff as the dregs and draff from a neighbouring distillery. For the purpose of providing litter he bought pob or dust from flax mills. In 1890 he found it necessary for this purpose to reserve one-half of the straw of 1889, and it was proved that it was from this straw only that the manure left on the farm after June 1890 had been made. It was proved that the straw crops of 1888 and 1889 were unusually bulky, and further, that the green crop of 1890 was liberally manured. Reference is further made to the opinion of the Lord Ordinary for the import of the proof.

On 18th August 1891, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds . . . (2) that the lease current at Martinmas 1890 provides that the tenant shall annually consume the straw made on the farm for manure, and shall apply such manure to the lands yearly, and that all dung made prior to the 15th June immediately preceding the termination of the lease shall be applied to the lands for the benefit thereof, and that all dung made after the said 15th June shall be left to the proprietor or incoming tenant at a price to be fixed by arbiters; (3) that at the expiry of the lease at Martinmas 1890 there was on the farm dung to the extent of 1372 cubic yards, which had all been made after the 15th June 1890; (4) that it has not been proved that the pursuer's course of management by which the said manure was produced was unfair or in contravention of his lease or of the rules of good husbandry; (5) that the value of the said manure at Martinmas 1890 was £291, 11s.: Therefore finds the pursuer entitled to be paid the value of the said manure, and decerns against the defender for payment to the pursuer of the said sum of £291, 11s., with interest," &c. *

* "OPINION.— . . . The pursuer's claim is founded on a clause in his lease to the effect that he should leave to the proprietor or incoming tenant the dung made on the farm after the 15th day of June immediately before the expiry of the lease, at a price to be fixed by arbiters; but should apply to the land all the dung made before that date. Provision is thus made for disposal of all the dung on the farm at the end of the lease—that made before 15th June is allotted to the land, that made after is to be sold to the landlord.

"It is clear that 15th June was fixed on as a date at or before which the mowing of the green crop might be assumed to be completed; and what the clause really provides is, that all the manure on the farm when the green crop was sown in the last year of the lease should be applied to that crop.

"It has been amply proved that all the dung left was made after 15th June 1890.

"The pursuer is, therefore, prima facie within the clause on which he founds, and prima facie is, in virtue of that clause, entitled to be paid for the manure he has left.

"The amount of manure left, however, is very exceptionally large, so much so that it is in evidence that intending offerers for the farm were deterred by it, and that the landlord found himself obliged in the end to accept from his new tenant a sum much less than its value, and the landlord now maintains that it could not have been made, and in fact was not made by a course of management in compliance with the lease, with the custom of the district, or with the rules of good husbandry. His plea is that,—The defender is not bound to pay for more manure than would have been made in the ordinary course of prudent management, and in accordance with the system of cultivation

No. 93.

Feb. 5, 1892.
M'Duff v.
Balfour.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuer had violated the provisions of his lease, and the large quantity of manure, which was ad-prescribed by the lease within the period specified in the lease, and the pursuer is bound to leave the remainder free of charge to the defender or incoming tenant.

"I think that plea sound in law, and consider that when the lease provides that the tenant must apply all the manure made on the farm before June, what is meant is, all the manure that ought to have been made in a fair course of management; and when it provides that the landlord shall pay for all the manure made after 15th June, what is meant is, that he shall pay for all the manure which should have been made in a fair course of management after the sowing of the green crop.

"The defender founds on a provision in the lease to the effect, so far as it bears on this question, that the tenant shall not sell the straw, but shall annually consume it on the farm for manure, and shall annually apply such manure to the lands.

"These are the only provisions of the lease to which it is necessary to refer.

"There is no wheat grown on Kingsdale farm, and it has been the pursuer's practice to apply his farm-yard manure to the turnip break at seed time, that is in April, May, or June, and to no other crop, and at no other time. That has also been the custom on most of the farms in the district on which wheat is not grown.

"This may or may not be enlightened farming, but there is no doubt that the clauses of the lease have reference to that custom.

"It has apparently been the general custom in the neighbourhood to apply much the larger part of the straw of one year to the green crop of the following year, and to reserve only a fraction, from a fourth to a sixth, of the straw of the year for use during summer and autumn. It has also apparently been the custom to keep comparatively few cattle in summer, and to keep them in pasture, and thus to make very little manure after June.

"In June 1890 the pursuer did not follow this ordinary course pursued by his neighbours, but he had a large quantity of the straw of the crop of 1889 converted into manure, after the green crop was sown and manured. I do not think the exact amount is stated in the proof, but, as it was the straw out of which the 1372 cubic yards of manure were made, it must have been more than 100 tons.

"Now, the lease contains no restriction whatever as to the amount of manure which the tenant might make after 15th June, and therefore the tenant committed no breach of the express provisions of the lease in converting all the straw into manure; and it is hard to see how the conversion of it into manure could possibly be against the rules of good husbandry, and no witness says that it was. Therefore it would seem to follow that no exception can be taken to the conversion of the straw which was on the farm on 15th June 1890 when it was converted into manure, and that the pursuer's management after 15th June 1890 cannot be successfully challenged.

"The true question must therefore regard the straw which was left after turnip sowing, rather than the manure made from it, and the question is, has it been shewn that that straw was accumulated by a course of management in variance with the provisions of the lease and of good husbandry?

"The question whether the straw has been fairly accumulated is the question to which the proof has been directed, and I have found it very difficult, all the more difficult I must take leave to say, on account of the very unsatisfactory character of the proof, which is desultory, loose, and speculative, and much of it little to the point. Long as it is, it is remarkable how little of definite and tangible fact can be extracted from it.

"The first question is, whether it has been proved that the straw remaining on the farm at June 1890 was accumulated by a violation of the provisions of the lease. It falls on the defender to establish that it was, and I have come, though without hesitation, to think that he has not done so.

"The precise meaning of the provision that the straw shall be consumed mittedly made after June 1890, and for which he claimed payment, was the result of his violation. The obvious meaning of the clauses of the annually for manure, and that the manure shall be applied to the land annually, is not obvious. The time of the year when it is to be applied is not mentioned. But there is no time when it could be applied, according to the custom of the district and the pursuer's system of cultivation, except the potato and turnip seed time. But it cannot be meant that all the straw of one harvest shall be applied to the next green crop. That would be impossible, because it is admitted that it is necessary to hold some part of it over for use during summer and autumn. It is said, indeed, to be the custom to apply a very large proportion of the crop of one year to the green crop of the next, but there is no provision in the lease to that effect. The mode in which, according to the defender, the requirement of the lease ought to be complied with is by the application of five-sixths of the crop to the next green crop and one-sixth to the green crop following. But the words of the lease would be equally complied with by the application of the manure to the two green crops in any other proportion, as for example, if half of the crop were to be applied at the first turnip sowing and the other half at the next turnip sowing. In either case the manure would be applied annually—that is, between June and June.

"Now, is it proved that the pursuer failed to comply with this requirement? . . .

"The defender maintains that the pursuer must needs have withheld some part of his straw, in violation of the lease, otherwise his manure heap could not have so much exceeded the manure which he purchased when he came to the farm. I am not satisfied on this point, having in view the pursuer's evidence that he was in the habit of purchasing manure, and also mill dust and dreg and draff from the Methil Distillery, which is in the neighbourhood of his farm, but, at all events, I have no means of knowing at what period of the pursuer's occupation it occurred, if it happened at all.

"I therefore do not think it proved that the pursuer has violated the express conditions of his lease in relation to the annual consumption of the straw and application of the manure.

"But the defender further maintains that the pursuer's accumulation of straw was the result of a violation of the rules of good husbandry.

"If it were proved that the straw remaining in June 1890 was unduly withheld from the turnip break of June, I should have held the defence established, and should not have allowed the pursuer the value of manure made from straw which should, in fair management, have been converted and applied to the green crop. But I do not think this proved—(His Lordship here referred to the evidence on the point).

"250 tons of straw was the pursuer's estimate of the crop of 1889.

"According to the pursuer, this result was attained mainly in consequence of the bulky crops of 1888 and 1889, and also because of the somewhat increased acreage under white crop in 1889, and because of the hay, aftermath, and feeding stuffs with which he supplied his cattle. He also regards his proximity to the Methil Distillery, where he could be cheaply supplied with draff and dreg, as a circumstance which enabled him to produce more manure than his neighbours. The pursuer has adduced a number of witnesses of great experience, who are of opinion that these circumstances adequately account for the amount of the pursuer's straw. . . .

"The defender argued that it was the pursuer's duty to give the green crop the benefit of a crop of extra bulk. Of course, the larger the straw crop the more will be the manure, but whether it be the tenant's obligation to make more manure by the immediately following June must depend on his system of management otherwise.

"The defender maintains that the pursuer's system was wrong and unfair altogether, because he says he understocked his farm in winter and overstocked it in summer, at least during the last year of his lease, and this for the unfair purpose of accumulating a large stock of manure at the landlord's expense. But lease was that he was bound to consume the straw and apply it to the lands in the form of manure between the reaping of the crop and the sowing of the green crop of the next year. He was only entitled to retain a small portion of the straw for purposes of litter, thatching the next year's stacks, and happing the potatoes. That was really the only way in which he could consume the straw crop of one year and apply it to the land before the time for using the crop of the succeeding year arrived. In the present

I prefer the evidence of the pursuer's witnesses on this point to those for the defender, who took but an occasional glance at the farm; whereas the pursuer has adduced his neighbour (Fische), a cattle-dealer to whom he was accustomed to sell his cattle (Birrell), and his farm-servants, and the purport of their evidence is that throughout the year, and generally during the course of his lease, the pursuer had a large stock of cattle on his farm, which he sold from time to time to cattle-dealers and butchers.

"Further, the defender maintained that the pursuer had changed his system of management at the end of his lease. The only witness for that is the factor Neil Ballingal, and his evidence is certainly very indefinite. The pursuer denied it, and while it may fairly be said that more satisfactory evidence on the point might have been expected from him, I cannot hold it proved.

"It is true that the system pursued by the pursuer was different from that pursued by most of his neighbours, in this, that it was his custom and a part of his system of management to fatten cattle in courts in summer. I understand the pursuer to say that he began to pursue this system, or at least extended it, when he got additional accommodation for cattle at the beginning of his second lease. If that be so, and there is nothing in the evidence which leads me to discredit it, it is obvious that this system of farming made it necessary to reserve a considerable amount of straw at June. And I am unable to see that it can be stigmatised as bad or unfair farming, merely because it was not in accordance with the custom of the district. It has received the approval of farmers of well-known skill and experience—his witnesses no doubt, and not farmers from Fife—but not, I think, the less qualified on that account to form an opinion on such a point. It is besides in evidence that, although cattle-feeding in the courts in summer may not have been practised generally, there were others in the district, the witnesses Fische and Birrell for example, who followed the course.

"There is a body of important evidence to the effect that the pursuer's cultivation of his farm was considerably above the average.

"The landlord complains that he suffered great disadvantage and loss by the accumulation of unapplied manure. He did so suffer, if he can shew that the tenant was under obligation to apply it to the green crop of 1890, but not, I think, otherwise. If the green crop was fairly treated, I do not see any disadvantage to which the landlord has been illegally subjected. He or the incoming tenant required at least part of the manure if not the whole of it, and if he had not found it on the farm, would have required to purchase it elsewhere: but it is sufficient to say that it was manure actually made, and not unfairly made after 15th June 1890, and after the green crop was adequately manured.

"On the whole, I have, after repeated perusal of the proof, come to the conclusion that the defender's defence, although good in law, has not been made out in point of fact, and that the pursuer is entitled to be paid for the manure left on the farm.

"The view which I have taken of the case depends on the provisions of the lease and the evidence, and not on any question of common law. I may, however, quote the following cases which bear on the point, most of which were referred to:—Berry v. Allan, 1827, 5 S. 212, aff. 10th June 1829, 3 W. and A. 429; Greig v. Mackay, 20th July 1869, 7 Macph. 1109; Murray's Trustees v. Murray, 19th July 1889, 26 S. L. R. 762; Reid's Executors v. Reid, 28th February 1890, 17 R. 519; Penman's Executors v. Jamieson, 20th January 1891, per Lord Fraser; and Easson v. Morrison, 21st January 1891, Second Division. Neither of the last two cases is reported."

case the straw ought to have been made into dung, and applied to the farm between September 1889 and June 1890. It was said that the lease meant that part of the straw was to be applied on or before June 1890, as for the crop of the year, and part left to be applied in the spring of 1891. But that would not be a "yearly" application of dung to the lands. Again, it was said that the defender's construction of the lease was inconsistent with the clause as to the pursuer's getting payment for dung left on the farm after 15th June 1890. But that clause was adapted to the system universally practised in the district; according to which a small portion of the straw was reserved for litter and the minor uses of the farm. But, further, assuming that the defender had not contravened the stipulations in the lease, and that he was entitled to alter his system of management, he was not entitled, after making this change, to take advantage of a clause in the lease framed with special reference to the previous system, with the result of throwing a new burden upon his landlord.¹

M'Duff v.
Balfour.

The respondent's argument sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The claim of the pursuer of this action is that the defender, whose tenant he was in the farm of Kingsdale, in Fife, shall pay him the value of 1321 cubic yards of dung left on the farm at his removal at Martinmas 1890. This claim is rested on the following stipulation,—“The tenant shall leave to the proprietor or incoming tenant, at the expiry of this lease, all dung that may be made after the 15th of June immediately before the expiry; all dung made previously must be applied to the lands hereby let for the benefit thereof, said dung so to be left to be paid for by the proprietor or incoming tenant at a price to be fixed by two arbiters.”

This stipulation, however, is only one part of a clause dealing with the mode of cultivation, and including the subject of manure, and its scope and application must be ascertained with reference to certain other stipulations which form parts of the same clause. These are, that (with certain exceptions which do not directly bear on the question) “the tenant shall not sell or remove any . . . straw . . . or dung of any kind that may be grown or made on the lands hereby let, but shall annually consume the straw on the farm for manure, and shall apply such manure to the lands yearly.” Now, the defender says that the amount of dung which he is asked to pay for is enormously in excess of what the pursuer would have had extant at Martinmas if he had fulfilled the obligations which I have last mentioned, and he says that the excess has been produced with straw which ought to have been already applied to the land in manure prior to 15th June 1890. The defender maintains that he is not bound to pay for more manure than would have been left if the mode of dealing with the straw prescribed by the lease had been followed. The pursuer does not dispute that if this last proposition be applicable to the facts of the case it affords a good legal defence to the action, but he denies that he has contravened the lease.

The question therefore between the parties is, whether the pursuer has contravened the lease in the matter of straw or dung? Other controversies as to the general effect of the pursuer's management have added complexity to the case, but it really turns on the more limited question which I have stated. If the pursuer has not contravened the lease, then it is nothing to the purpose that his methods are unusual, or that they land the defender with an exceptional and inconvenient amount of manure. If, on the other hand, the pursuer, instead of giving the land the benefit of the straw which he had undertaken to put into it, has held it back, with the effect, if not the intention, of making the landlord pay for what he was entitled to get as part of the return for the use of the land, then the defender is perfectly justified in resisting a claim that the same thing should be counted twice.

For greater clearness it may be well here to say that I take the controversy to relate to the straw of the crop 1889. It is true that there is some evidence that the pursuer had on the farm in May 1890 some straw of crop 1888, but the pursuer denies this, and I do not think it is proved.

Now, the defender's theory of the lease is that the clause requiring the tenant annually to consume the straw for manure, and to apply such manure to the lands yearly, means in terms that the straw of crop 1889 must all be put into the ground in manure before the reaping of crop 1890. In other words, it means that the two processes of turning the straw into manure and applying the manure so made to the land are both to be completed within the same year, viz., between Martinmas 1889 and Martinmas 1890.

This theory is exposed to one grave difficulty. To whatever period or periods the clause immediately in question relates, it is expressed absolutely, and does not purport to recognise any exception (for the words "with the exceptions above mentioned" relate to turnips and hay only). But the clause founded on by the tenant, and providing for the landlord taking over at Martinmas of the last year dung made after 15th June, proceeds on the assumption that there will be dung extant unapplied to the land at the end of the period, which, on the theory I am now discussing, ought to see it all applied to the land.

It has been suggested, indeed, that this clause may be accounted for by supposing it to apply to straw or dung bought outside, and brought on the land, but I cannot think this a fair explanation, for (1) the clause speaks of the dung in question as if it were distinguished only by date and not by origin from that which by express provision must be put into the land, and this can only be home-made manure; and (2) the purchase and importation of manure or straw on to a farm in the last year of the lease is not so customary an event as to form a natural subject of stipulation.

It has also been suggested that the clause may be accounted for by holding it to apply to dung made with straw of crop 1890, thrashed and made into dung between harvest and Martinmas. I cannot think this a natural construction and it had not occurred to the defender. No one reading the clause would be apt to suppose that when the lease speaks of "the dung that may be made after the 15th day of June immediately before the expiry," and promises the tenant payment for "said dung," it really meant dung made after harvest, and that the tenant was not to get paid for any more.

The defender did not submit any such contention; he admits that the clause providing for payment of dung made after 15th June applies to dung made with straw of crop 1889, and his argument is that the two clauses are to be reconciled by treating the one as applying to an unexpressed but implied exception from the other; or, in other words, that while the tenant is in words told that he must have all his straw underground in manure by 15th June, this really means all except what he requires for what are described in argument as his and the minor uses of the farm. This, however, gives rise to a very awkward difficulty. Not only does it assume an unexpressed exception to what purports to be an absolute rule, but it turns out that there are no media for determining the extent of the exception. Take the present case—this pursuer, for better or worse, took to keeping a large head of cattle in summer and stall-feeding them. For this he required a much larger amount of litter than his neighbours or predecessors. Now, there is admittedly nothing in the lease to prevent his doing all this, and yet in the case before us he avows that he kept and required to keep the half of his straw of 1889 to litter these cattle, and it is of the result of this that the defender complains. It turns out therefore that the defender's theory of the case requires us to read into the absolute obligation about the straw an exception of straw required for litter and the minor uses of the farm during summer, but that this exception is again to be limited to one only of the modes of stock farming permissible under the other clauses of the lease.

No. 93.

M'Duff v.
Balfour.

I confess my inability to keep up with such elaborate interpolation in a contract if any other construction is available which can live with the words of the contract without addition or subtraction.

Now, I think there is such a construction. The whole difficulty of the theory from which I have turned arises from its assuming that one and the same year is running for the making the straw into manure and also for the putting that manure in the ground.

Is this necessary, either from the structure of the clause or from the relation of the two operations? I think it is not. As regards the phraseology of the clause, my own experience is that the attention of the reader is arrested by the fact that, looking to the description of the one process and the description of the other, each has a separate word to express the time prescribed, "annually" and "yearly," and the fact that the words may be or are synonymous makes it not the less noteworthy. Without making too much of this, I think it rather favours, and it certainly permits, the idea of a separate period being assigned to each. When we turn to the reason of the thing, the matter stands thus: The process of turning the straw into dung necessarily goes on all the year round, to a greater or less extent, and it necessarily has its beginning from the harvest when the crop of straw is ingathered. Towards the middle of this period comes what de facto is the time for applying the manure to the land at or before seed time. No one, suppose he were ever so anxious to comply with a lease, can either have put into the land by seed time 1890 manure made the summer and autumn after it is over, or can, except unwisely, put it into the ground in harvest or by Martinmas. The meaning of applying manure to the lands annually is, according to plain good sense, applying each season the manure then available. Thus, if we take each of the two clauses describing the two operations separately, it is complete in itself; we effect a separation which the good sense of the subject-matter justifies, and the two work harmoniously.

That the lease contemplates a yearly season for the putting manure into the land is, I think, shewn by the date named in the clause founded on by the tenant. All dung made to 15th June in the last year of the lease must be put into the land, this date representing the close of the time for sowing turnips, and therefore for manuring; what is made after 15th June is held to be legitimately waiting for next season, and therefore is to be taken over and paid for.

Accordingly, I think that the "yearly" application of manure contemplated

M'Duff v.
Balfour.

in the lease is an application at and before seed time, that being necessarily the period when the manure is applied to the land, and that period of the year being recognised by the lease. I may add that I am not at all surprised that this last point is not made more definite in expression, because the landlord's interests are completely protected whatever latitude this particular clause may permit to the tenant for the second of the two stages of the process, even if the word "yearly" were held to imply a period of a whole year.

The joint operation of the clauses which (1) compel the tenant annually to turn his straw into dung, (2) forbid him to sell or remove any dung, and (3) only pay him for dung made after 15th June in the year he leaves, makes it a matter of indifference to the landlord whether the tenant does or does not act like a man of sense as to the time of year when he manures the land, and makes it correspondingly indifferent to him whether the tenant have or have not a whole year from any given time to put the dung on the land. In other words, the key of the situation is the clause about the straw—so soon as the tenant is forced each year to turn the straw crop into dung, and knows he can make nothing of that dung except by putting it into the farm, he is sure to do so, and sooner rather than later, in order to reap the results.

In my opinion, therefore, this theory, that there is one period allowed for making the dung and another for using it, holds water; while the competing theory, that the periods are concurrent, does not. The result is that, in my judgment, the pursuer has not contravened the lease, and is entitled to the decree which he has obtained. It may quite well be that the number of cattle kept in summer during the latter years of the lease was greater than either he himself or the defender thought of when the lease was executed. But if the pursuer has not contravened the rules prescribed by the lease, the legal condition indicated in the defender's third plea has not arisen.

My judgment rests upon the terms of the lease, while the Lord Ordinary seems to have proceeded upon a more elaborate and comprehensive view of all the material submitted to his Lordship; but I have only one alteration to suggest in the interlocutor before us—I think we ought to affirm the interlocutor with this variance, that there be omitted from the fourth finding the following words, "unfair or," and "or of the rules of good husbandry."

LORD ADAM.—The Lord Ordinary has given the pursuer, who is the waygoing tenant of the farm of Kingsdale, decree for the sum of £291, 11s, being the value of the dung left by him on that farm at the expiry of his lease at Matinmas 1890.

The lease, which is dated in February 1885, contains a clause to the effect that the tenant shall leave to the proprietor or incoming tenant at the expiry of the lease the dung that may be made after the 15th of June immediately before the expiry, said dung so to be left to be paid for at a price to be fixed as the specified. It is upon this clause that the pursuer founds his claim.

It is not disputed that the dung in question was made after the 15th June immediately before the expiry of the lease—that is, after 15th June 1890—and it is not disputed that the sum decreed for is its value.

The answer of the defender, the proprietor, is that the tenant was bound by the terms of a clause in his lease to have converted the straw from which this dung was made into dung and to have applied it to the lands yearly—that is, practically in this case before the 15th June 1890—that the tenant is prohibited from selling dung made from the straw in question, and that consequently he is not entitled to payment for this dung. No. 93.

The tenant in this case entered to the lands at Martinmas 1885. His first crop would therefore be reaped in September 1886, and according to my construction of the lease, the straw ought to have been made into dung and applied to the lands between that date and June 1887, and so on as regards each succeeding year's crop. The fourth crop, with reference to the straw of which the present question has arisen, would be reaped in September 1889, and in my view ought to have been made into dung and applied to the lands on or before June 1890. In this way the straw is annually consumed, and the dung applied yearly to the lands, as provided for by the lease. Feb. 5, 1892.
Balfour.

It is suggested, however, that part of the straw or dung of one year's crop may be applied as the manure of the succeeding year's crop, and part carried forward so as to manure the next succeeding crop—that is (to take, for example, the first year's crop under the lease), that the dung made from the straw of the crop reaped in September 1886 might have been in part applied on or before June 1887 as manure for that year's crop, and in part applied on or before June 1888 as manure for that year's crop. The answer is that that would not be applying such manure to the lands yearly in terms of the lease, but in two separate years. And so, to come to the crop in question—that reaped in September 1889—it is contended that part of the dung made from it might be applied to the lands on or before June 1890 as manure for the crop of that year, and part left to be carried forward and applied on or before June 1891 as manure for the crop of that year. But I say as before that that would not be applying the dung to the lands yearly, but partly in one year and partly in another. Moreover, I fail to see how the tenant, on whom the obligation lies to apply the dung to the lands, could be in a position so to apply it on or before June 1891, because he has ceased to be tenant of the farm at the preceding Martinmas, and has nothing to do with the lands thereafter. The tenant accordingly does not propose to apply the dung to the farm. He claims and has got decree for the price of the dung so carried forward in direct contravention, as it appears to me, of the provision in the lease that he shall not remove or sell any straw or dung grown or made on the lands let.

It is said, however, that this construction of the lease is inconsistent with the clause founded on by the tenant, which provides that the tenant shall leave to the proprietor or incoming tenant at the expiry of the lease the dung that may be made after the 15th day of June immediately before the expiry, the dung so to be left to be paid for by the proprietor or incoming tenant at a price to be fixed by arbiters.

The facts which raise this plea are not in dispute. It is not disputed that the dung was made from the straw of the second last crop, which was reaped in September 1889, and it is not disputed that the clause in question, whatever its proper construction may be, applies to the straw of that crop.

The clause in the lease founded on by the landlord provides that the tenant shall not sell or remove any turnips, . . . straw, . . . or dung grown or made on the lands, but shall annually consume the same on the farm for manure, and shall apply such manure to the lands yearly.

It is to be observed that this clause does not apply to the waygoing crop—that of 1890—which the tenant is entitled to sell or remove, but that it does apply to all previous crops.

No. 93.

Feb. 5, 1892.
M'Duff v.
Balfour.

It appears to me that the clause clearly provides for three things: one which the tenant is prohibited from doing, viz., selling or removing any straw grown or dung made on the lands; and two things which he comes under an obligation to do, (1) annually to consume the straw on the ground for manure, and (2) to apply such manure to the lands yearly.

I agree that the time which the tenant practically has to do this is between the reaping of the crop, presumably in September, and the June following, because between the latter date and Martinmas no manure is ever applied to the lands.

I think that the object and effect of the provision in question is to secure that the straw and dung of one year's crop shall be applied to the lands as the manure of the succeeding year's crop. The lease says that the tenant is annually to consume the straw for manure, and to apply such manure to the lands yearly.

In my view there is no inconsistency between the two clauses, because this clause assumes—and I think rightly assumes—that the straw of the previous crop shall have been made into dung and applied to the lands previous to the 15th June. But the inconsistency is said to lie in this, that if all the straw of the crop of 1889 had been made into dung before the 15th June 1890 there would be no straw left to make into dung to which this clause could apply. But I think that is a fallacy. The clause is adapted to a system of farming by which the stock is pastured in the fields in summer, but brought into the courts after harvest and fed there—a system which prevailed on the farm till the tenant changed it in the last year of the lease.

Obviously under this system very little straw would be required in summer when the stock was in the fields, but a good deal would be required for litter and food after the stock was brought into the courts until the succeeding Martinmas. For this the tenant had recourse to the straw of the new crop, and it is to the dung made from this straw that the clause in the lease founded on by the tenant applies, and the clause founded on by the landlord does not apply. And rightly so, because as the tenant on entry had paid for the straw and dung which produced the first crop, so it was right and proper that no part of the straw or dung of the last crop should be applied at his cost to produce a crop from which he was to derive no benefit. The clause in truth is not a clause introduced for the benefit of the tenant, but for the benefit of the landlord. It is a restriction of the tenant's right to remove the whole of the waygoing crop.

I demur therefore to the conclusion that, in order to reconcile the two clauses in question, it is necessary to imply any exception to the universality of the landlord's right to have the whole of the straw consumed on or before June in each year.

It is said, however, and quite truly, that straw is needed in summer for certain minor purposes about the farm, such as thatching, &c., and that if the tenant were bound to consume the whole straw of his crop before the 15th June, he would have none left for such purposes, but would have to buy. No doubt that would be so, and it is said that no tenant would become a party to a lease containing such a stipulation, and that a construction of the lease which leads to such a result would not be a reasonable construction. Probably, however, the tenant would be well aware that the landlord, except during the last year of the lease, had no interest to insist on the strict fulfilment of the stipulation, seeing that all dung made from straw reserved for such purposes would ultimately be applied to the lands, and if the landlord chose to insist on it during the last year of the lease, and the tenant had to buy straw, he would suffer little prejudice, because he would get the value back in the shape of the dung into which it had been converted. But however that may be, I am of opinion that the tenant has bound himself to apply the straw grown and dung made of each year's crop as the manure of the succeeding year's crop, and that the dung for which he seeks payment has been made in contravention of his lease.

No. 93.

Feb. 5, 1892.

M'Duff v. Balfour.

If the tenant in this case had been content to carry on the farm on the system on which it had been previously carried on, and reserved as usual only a small portion of the straw for the minor purposes about the farm, probably nothing would have been heard about the landlord's right to have had the dung made from that straw applied to the lands, and he would no doubt have paid for all the dung left by the tenant without objection, although a small part of it might have been the produce of that straw.

But when the tenant for his own benefit introduced during the last year of the lease a new system of management, and reserved, in order to carry out his system, at least one-half of the straw of the previous year's crop, with the result of producing from that straw a most unusual quantity of dung, which, as the evidence shews, no incoming tenant would buy, then I am not surprised that the landlord should insist on what he considers his rights under the lease, and should decline to pay for such dung.

In my view the landlord is right in his contention, and I cannot find the tenant entitled to payment of dung which by the lease he is, in my opinion, prohibited from selling, and was bound to have applied to the lands as manure for the previous year's crop.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have had an opportunity of considering your Lordship's opinion and also that of Lord Adam, and I concur in the opinion of your Lordship, and have very little to add. I should just like to say that in construing the obligation in the lease it must be kept in view that all leases deal with a number of annual operations, but as the operations of agriculture are dependent on the seasons, it would be difficult, and indeed impossible, to hold that all obligations have the same period of commencement and termination. The period from and to which annual operations run must be affected by the nature of the annual operations. Especially is this the case where one operation is dependent on the other.

In the present case the lease deals with two distinct operations in the same clause, namely, the consumption of the straw grown on the farm, and the application of the manure to the ground. The consumption of the straw, as I understand, includes both what is consumed as food and what is consumed as bedding, both contributing to the manurial product, and the two operations, according to the lease, are to be performed annually. There is a slight variation of phrase in the case of the two obligations, but nothing is said as to the commencement of the annual period in either case. I think, consequently, that the sound construction in the case of the obligation to consume the straw is, that the term of the commencement is the earliest period in each year at which it is possible for the straw to be consumed. That being assigned as the term of commencement, I think the period for the consumption of the straw continues during the whole following year, and the tenant has a period of twelve months—say from October to October—within which to complete the operation, because the feeding of cattle is not like the operations of ploughing or manuring, which can only be done at one time of the year; but as the animals must be fed every day, and there is no obligation in the lease to turn them to grass at any particular time of the year, the consumption of the straw may be spread over the whole year.

There is also an annual period for the fulfilment of the obligation to apply the manure made on the farm to the ground, but it cannot well begin at the same time as the obligation to consume the straw, because in the proper course of husbandry the preparation of the ground for the green crop commences in March and is completed in June. According to my reading of the obligation in the lease relating to the consumption of the straw, it is a physical impossibility that the whole manure derived from the straw of the crop of one year can be put into the ground between March and June of the next, and I will not suppose that two sensible persons entered into a contract binding one to perform an impossibility. Accordingly it seems to me that if the tenant has a year to perform each of the stipulated obligations, the annual periods must be different in each case, and the tenant has from spring to spring to fulfil the obligation to apply the manure to the land. This view is confirmed by the fact that there is a provision in the lease for the taking over by the landlord of the manure remaining unapplied at the term of Martinmas in the last year of the lease. If the true construction of this lease is that the whole manure must be put into the ground before Martinmas, there would be nothing left to be taken over, and it would be quite unnecessary to provide for any manure being taken over at a valuation.

Once the above construction of the obligation in the lease is reached, it becomes very difficult for the landlord to maintain that the tenant is in breach of it on the ground that a larger quantity of manure has been left than was anticipated. I quite admit that it was possible for the tenant, by violating some of the other provisions of the lease, to have had an excessive quantity of manure remaining over at the end of the lease, but no such violation is established to have been committed here. The whole quantity of land which the tenant was bound to put into green crop was so used, and it is clearly proved that the land was adequately manured. Accordingly we must hold the quantity left over to be nothing more than the result of the application of the conditions of the lease to a somewhat different course of management than was contemplated by the parties at the date the contract was entered into, but still a course of management quite within the tenant's power to adopt.

LORD KINNEAR.—The question is one of considerable difficulty, and I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the difficulty is not diminished by the proof. The real difficulty arises in the construction of the contract, from the necessity for applying its conditions to a state of facts which was not contemplated at the date of the bargain. But whether it was contemplated or not we must inquire whether it falls within the scope of the contract, and if it does, the contract must receive effect.

There can be no question that the amount of manure which the pursuer requires his landlord to pay for is not only exceptionally large, but that it exceeds the normal amount to so great an extent that the landlord could not hope to obtain any benefit from the purchase at all corresponding to the price that he has to pay. But that is not a consideration which we can take into account, if the contract obliges him to purchase and pay for it. Now, in order to determine whether it does so or not, I agree, as I understand, with all your Lordships, in thinking that we are not called upon to consider any question of good or bad husbandry, or to compare the tenant's management with any system of cultivation generally adopted in that part of the country. The only question is, whether the manure which the pursuer requires the landlord to take over at a price ought, under the conditions prescribed by the lease, to have been put into the land before the 15th of June 1890, because I think the one ground of defence which requires consideration is that the tenant is proved to have had on his hands on the 15th of June 1890 a large quantity of unconsumed straw which the lease required him to convert into manure and apply to the land before the 15th of June; and therefore that when he proceeded to convert it into manure after the 15th of June he was already in breach of contract, so that he came to demand payment as at the end of the year, when he was leaving the farm, for what must have been put into the land in spring, if the conditions of the lease had been performed.

Now, it is clear enough that the clause on which the pursuer relies does not in itself impose expressly or by implication any restriction whatever upon the quantity of straw which the tenant may convert into manure after the 15th of June, because the clause is that "the tenant shall leave to the proprietor or incoming tenant, at the expiry of his lease, the dung that may be made after the 15th day of June immediately before the expiry; all dung made previously must be applied to the lands hereby let for the benefit thereof, said dung so to be left to be paid for by the proprietor or incoming tenant at a price to be fixed by two arbiters. . . ." So far as that goes the tenant might begin making dung on the 16th of June, and go on making it till the expiry of the lease, and the proprietor or incoming tenant would be bound to take it all. But then it is said that there are other conditions which impose a restriction not found in the clause itself, and that, when all the clauses applicable to this matter are read together, they not only require the tenant to put into the land all the dung which he has actually made before the 15th of June, but further require him to convert into manure for that purpose all the straw, or at least the great bulk of straw of the last year's crop, so that it may be ready to be applied before the 15th of June. I am unable to find any such condition in the lease.

I agree that if the tenant had unduly withheld the straw which remained unconverted in June 1890 from the turnip-break of that year, so as to leave the green crop unmanured, there might have been very good ground for maintaining that he was acting in fraud of the contract, and endeavouring to get money for manure which he was bound to put into the land without payment. There is some evidence for the defender to shew that this is what he did, but I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the defender's case on this point is not proved. Taking it, therefore, that the manure made before June was all put into the land, and that the land was thereby well manured, the question is whether the lease still prohibited the tenant from having any considerable quantity of unconverted straw after the 15th of June. Now, the clause founded on by the defender seems to me to contain two distinct and separate stipulations, and I agree that if the tenant has failed to perform either of them he is in breach of the contract, and cannot recover. The first is that the tenant who is prohibited, except under certain specified circumstances, from selling any . . . straw, . . . or dung of any kind that may be grown or made on the lands, shall annually consume the same on said farm for manure"; and the second is, that the tenant "shall apply such manure to the lands yearly." There are thus two entirely distinct operations enjoined on the tenant—first, the consumption on the farm of the straw, &c., grown there, and second, the application of the resulting manure to the lands. Now, I cannot see any ground for alleging that the tenant has failed to perform the first of these operations. Straw may be consumed in various ways, but it is not questioned that straw which has been used for litter during the year, and so converted into manure, has been consumed in terms of the lease. If the tenant had failed to consume the whole straw produced on the farm between the reaping of one crop and the reaping of the next, and so had left unconsumed straw on the farm, he would have been in breach of the lease, but there is no evidence that he has not fully performed the obligation to consume the straw. It is for straw converted into manure in terms of the lease that he now demands payment. I agree with your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary that there is no evidence that any material quantity of the straw of crop 1888 was used in making that manure.

But then it is said that the dung is also to be applied yearly, and that if the tenant has unconverted straw in June he cannot comply with that condition, because manure made from that part of the straw cannot be put into the land in the same year as that made from the other portion of the straw crop, which has been already consumed. To this there are two answers. If the condition that the manure shall be applied yearly means that the tenant is to have twelve months within which he is to complete his application of the manure made from any particular crop, it is obvious that that period cannot begin to run from exactly the same date as the twelve months during which the crop is to be consumed. The two operations cannot be simultaneous, because the manure must be made in the first place, and then applied after it is made. The defender's own case is that at least five-sixths of the whole is properly applied at the potato and turnip seed time, and if that be so, it seems to follow that the other process must have begun at a considerably earlier period. But if the tenant begins to apply in June, puts in all he has already made, and then goes on to make more and puts that into the land at the next turnip and potato seed time, he will have satisfied the condition that the manure shall be applied yearly by putting it in between June and June.

But then, in the second place, the lease does not prescribe the time of year at which the manure is to be applied. It is true that according to the evidence the usual time for tenants on this estate to manure their land seems to have been immediately before the sowing of the green crop, but that is not required by the lease. All that is required is the annual consumption of the straw crop on the farm. The lease prohibits the tenant from selling that crop, and requires him to convert it into dung and apply it to the land yearly; but that may be satisfied by his putting it into the land at the most convenient time for himself. I think, therefore, that the second answer to the defender's contention is, that the lease does not prescribe any particular time for the application of the manure to the land, but only requires that it shall be applied yearly. It seems from the evidence that, having regard to the system of agriculture practised in the district, the most advantageous time for applying the manure to the land was at or about the sowing of the green crop, and that no doubt was the time at which the parties, when they entered into the lease, contemplated that it would be applied, not because the lease prescribed it, but because they assumed that the tenant in the exercise of his judgment would put the manure into the ground at this useful and convenient time. That result was not provided for by any regulations in the lease, but was left to be attained by the operation of the ordinary motives which guide a man in carrying on his business. If, however, the tenant changes the system of management and adopts a new one, which disturbs the ordinary recurrence of the convenient times for making manure, the motives which were previously supposed to operate, so as to lead the tenant to apply the manure to his land in June, cease to operate, and the question arises whether there is in the lease anything to prevent the tenant making such a change and applying the manure to the land at a different time. Some agriculturists think it better to put in manure in autumn or winter. Others think it better to put it in at seed time. Which is the better course in any particular case may depend upon circumstances peculiar to the farm or to the district. There is nothing in the lease to bind the tenant to take the one course rather than the other. It is said that the lease must be read with reference to the system and management in practice at its date, and that according to that system the manure must all be applied before the 15th of June. But the tenant was not bound to follow that system throughout the lease, but was quite entitled to depart from it, provided he did not violate the rules of good husbandry. And if, during the currency of the lease, he had changed his system of management, and begun feeding cattle in stalls in summer to a great extent, and if, as some of the witnesses say, the only useful time for manuring the land were in June, the practical question would then have arisen, whether the disadvantage of making a great quantity of manure after the 15th of June was a sufficient reason for abiding by the old system. The tenant would have had to choose between alternative courses, and I think he would have been entitled to take that which seemed to him to be the most advantageous, irrespective of the opinion of his landlord. It seems to me that if such a question had occurred during the course of the lease it would have been quite out of the power of the landlord to interfere and say that the tenant was not to apply the manure except in the manner contemplated when the lease was entered into. If the tenant had a great quantity of manure in hand after the middle of June, the landlord might prohibit him from selling it, and it would be a question for the tenant whether he would make manure which he could not sell nor dispose of in any way except by putting it into the ground in winter.

In the case which has happened, the tenant made a great quantity of manure after the month of June in the last year of his lease, and so threw on his landlord the result of his change of system. The question is, whether there is anything in the contract to prevent him doing so? and I think there is nothing. We are all agreed that there is nothing in the lease to prevent the tenant changing his system of management; is there anything to enable the landlord to take the manure which the tenant has in hand in consequence of the change without paying for it? I think there is not, because the clause in the lease treats of manure made after June in the last year of the tenant's occupancy, and provides that the tenant shall leave it on the farm, and that he shall be entitled to payment for it from the proprietor or incoming tenant. There is nothing to limit the proportion of manure to be left in this position. It is said that the lease contemplates that only a small proportion of the straw crop should be left over after the land has been manured, and it is accordingly suggested that the tenant's possession of such straw is really accounted for by a relaxation of the conditions of the lease which it was understood between the parties would be made. I can find no ground for such a conclusion, but the tenant is—it seems to me in accordance with his contract—in possession of manure at the end of his occupancy, and is entitled to payment for it. No doubt the extent of his claim presses somewhat hardly upon the landlord, because the operation of the lease is to throw on the landlord a burden which neither party contemplated at the time when the contract was entered into, and to confer on the tenant a corresponding advantage. The result may not be altogether equitable. But when people make a contract of this kind, containing very specific and stringent stipulations for the regulation of their future rights and interests in circumstances which they do not very clearly foresee, the consequences are very apt to be prejudicial to one or other of the parties. Where this happens, as it frequently does, it is impossible for the Court to make a new contract for them different from that which they have made for themselves, or to readjust their interests as they might have done if they had not been already bound. We must construe the contract they have made according to its terms.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Vary said interlocutor by omitting from lines 14-15 thereof the words 'unfair or,' and the words 'or the rules of good husbandry': Quoad ultra adhere to said interlocutor, and decern."

Writ—Assignment of lease—Docquet—Holograph of Justice of Peace—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), sec. 41.—Held that the necessity for a notarial docquet being holograph was not removed by the provisions of the 41st section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, and that a deed bearing to be signed for the granter by a Justice of the Peace was invalid in respect that the docquet signed by the latter was not holograph.*

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Banffshire.

CHARLES M'INTOSH was tenant of certain subjects in the village of Tomintoul, Banffshire, under long lease from the Duke of Richmond.

On 19th March 1891 he granted an assignment of his lease to George M'Hardy, who afterwards occupied the subjects in question.

George Irvine, assignee of the lease under a subsequent assignment by M'Intosh, dated 14th April 1891, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Banffshire against M'Intosh and M'Hardy, praying that they should be ejected from the subjects and interdicted from interfering with the pursuer's occupation of them.

* The Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 41, provided,—“Without prejudice to the present law and practice, any deed, instrument, or writing, whether relating to land or not, may, after having been read over to the granter, be validly executed on behalf of such granter who . . . is unable to write, by one notary-public or Justice of the Peace subscribing the same for him in his presence and by his authority, without the ceremony of touching the pen, all before two witnesses, and the docquet thereto shall set forth that the granter of the deed authorised the execution thereof, and that the same had been read over to him in presence of the witnesses. . . .”

He averred that M'Hardy's "pretended assignation does not convey the said lease or anything thereunder; besides the said pretended assignation is not executed in terms of law, is not signed or executed by the pretended granter thereof, and, in particular, the pretended docquet by the Justice of the Peace is not in the handwriting of the said Justice of Peace therein named, but is in the handwriting of John Macdonald, auctioneer, Tomintoul" * No. 94.

M'Hardy.

The defender M'Hardy, who alone appeared, admitted that the docquet was not holograph of the Justice of the Peace who subscribed the deed.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer being in the right of said lease is entitled to the declaration prayed for. (2) The defender George M'Hardy having groundlessly and unwarrantably claimed right to enter upon the said subjects, and the defender Charles M'Intosh having refused to quit the same, the pursuer is entitled to decree of ejection and interdict as craved. (6) The said pretended assignation not being probative, and not having been signed or executed by the pretended granter thereof, the same can receive no force or effect in law, and the said objections being pleadable by way of exception, the defences ought to be repelled, and the prayer of the petition granted.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The assignation in favour of the defender George M'Hardy, though informally executed, may be set up in terms of section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 37 and 38 Vict. c. 94, and the defender George M'Hardy is entitled to have it set up accordingly.†

The Sheriff-substitute (Grant), on 23d July 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact that the docquet appended to" the assignation dated 19th March 1891 "is not holograph of John Grant, the Justice of the Peace executing the same, and in law that the said writ is not executed in terms of law, and of no force or effect: Therefore repels the third plea in law for the said defender, and sustains the first and second pleas in law for the pursuer, and therefore finds and declares, decerns ejection against the defenders as prayed for, and declares the interim interdict already granted perpetual, and decerns," &c.‡

* The docquet was in these terms:—"By authority of the within named and designed Charles M'Intosh, who declares that he cannot write on account of bodily weakness, I, John Grant, Justice of Peace for the county of Banff, subscribe these presents for him, he having authorised me for that purpose, and the same having been previously read over to him, all in presence of the witnesses before named and designed, who subscribe this docquet in testimony of their having heard authority given to me as aforesaid, and heard these presents read over to the said Charles M'Intosh." Charles M'Intosh appended his mark, and the two witnesses attested the signature.

† The Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 39, enacted,—“No deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect according to its legal import because of any informality of execution, but the burden of proving that such deed, instrument, or writing so attested was subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and by the witnesses by whom such deed, instrument, or writing bears to be attested, shall be upon the party using or upholding the same”

‡ “NOTE.— After full consideration, I give effect to the pursuer's objection for these reasons. The point settled in Henry's case, where all the authorities are reviewed, is clear, and the ground on which that judgment, following on these authorities, proceeds is also clear. It is the exceptional position of a notary's docquet in these cases, as is fully set forth in the opinions of the learned Judges, and, as far as I can see, that ground is as cogent now as it was then. The docquet is a solemn record by a public officer (now he may be a Justice of the Peace, formerly he could only be a notary, but that does not affect

Irvine v.
M'Hardy.

M'Hardy appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The 41st section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, set forth in detail what was required in such a docquet as the present, and for the first time allowed a Justice of the Peace to subscribe where the granter was unable to do so. If it had been intended that the docquet should be holograph of the Justice, that would have been stated there. The case of Henry,¹ relied upon by the Sheriff-substitute, was decided prior to 1874 when the change in the law took place. 2. In any view, the docquet could be set up by proof under the 39th section of the Act of 1874. The omission as to its not being holograph was an "informality of execution" such as that section was designed to meet.² What it was desired to prove was that the Justice signed the docquet in the presence of the witnesses.

Argued for the respondent;—The Sheriffs had decided the case upon the terms of the 39th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874. But the 41st section was also very important. The requirements to the validity of a docquet prior to the Act of 1874 were still necessary, except in so far as they had been expressly dispensed with.³ Accordingly, the docquet must be holograph of the Justice.⁴ Further, section 39 did not apply to notarial documents. In terms it only applied to such writings as were "subscribed by the granter or maker thereof," and the notary was not the granter of the deed here.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the Sheriffs are right in this case. The first question is, what was the law prior to 1874, and as to that the case of Henry leaves no doubt. The law required the docquet to be holograph, otherwise the deed was not well executed. The reasons which lead to that result are so fully discussed in the Sheriff-substitute's note that it is unnecessary for me to enter into the grounds of the highly authoritative judgment in the case to which I have referred.

In the second place, we have to consider whether the Act of 1874 has made any change, and two sections of that Act have been founded on by the appellant in his argument. As regards the 41st section, it is said to do away with the necessity of the docquet being holograph. It introduced two changes—in the first place, it enabled one notary-public or Justice of the Peace to take the place of two notaries, and, in the second place, it also altered to some extent the form the argument) of certain concurring facts and circumstances; and the witnesses to the docquet are not merely witnesses to that officer's signature, but also to the truth of his record. Then, what is it that the defender asks to be allowed to prove in this case? I can only take it that he wants to prove what is necessary to make the docquet a good docquet—the truth of what it bears record of; but the 39th section of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, on which he founds, contemplates no more than the proof that the writing in question was subscribed by the maker and witnesses, which, if proved in this case, would still leave him short of what is necessary to maintain his position. There are strong considerations of public policy against weakening any of the safeguards provided against an abuse of the power of notarial subscription on behalf of another party. I cannot find warrant for the course the defender proposes to take, which tends in this direction, under the section of the statute on which he founds; for from its language I do not take it to be applicable to the present case. . . ."

of the docquet itself. The question is, whether there is implied in the section the further change that the docquet is not to be holograph. In the opinions in the case of Henry to which I have referred the Judges point out the high importance of the docquet, and that it is itself really a part of the instrument. As the late Lord President said in the case of Henry (9 Macph. 507),—"The legal equivalent for the subscription of a person physically incapable of signing his own name is not merely the notary's signature, which would be a very imperfect security for compliance with the requirements of the law, but the notary's docquet signed by him and the witnesses, in attestation of the special mandate conferred by the granter of the deed." I put the question thus: Do these words apply to a docquet under the Act of 1874? I think they do; and I think further that the whole reasons remain for the docquet being holograph of the official who signs it. No further relaxation of the law in this respect is implied in the two sections to which I have referred—indeed, it appears to me to be quite the other way, and Mr Morison, for the respondent, said with some plausibility that the opening words of the 41st section favoured his contention.

Turning to the 39th section, I think it puts the appellant into somewhat of a dilemma. If he says that the deed, instrument, or writing which he seeks shall be held to have been subscribed is the docquet, a decerniture to that effect would not advance his case. The Court would pronounce a finding to the effect that although the docquet was not holograph it had nevertheless been proved to have been subscribed by the maker. But that would not do him any good. If, again, he says that it is the assignation itself which he asks the Court to hold has been subscribed, he will thereby put himself out of Court, for it has not been subscribed by the maker of the deed, but by the Justice of the Peace himself.

It seems to me to be unnecessary to discuss whether there has been an informality of execution in the terms of the 39th section. I think the case stands higher than mere formality; but because of the other reasons on which the Sheriffs' judgment may be supported it is, in my view, needless to enter into that question.

Revenue—Legacy-duty—Moveable estate directed to be invested in purchase of land—Entail—Act 36 Geo. III. c. 52, secs. 12 and 19.—Section 19 of the Act 36 Geo. III. c. 52, enacts,—“That any sum of money or personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate shall be charged with and pay duty as personal estate, unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled thereto in succession shall pay duty,” the duty being payable under sec. 12, “as if the annual produce thereof had been given by way of annuity.”

Then follows this proviso,—“Provided, nevertheless, that in case before the same, or some part thereof, shall be actually so applied, any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith, or with so much thereof as shall not have been applied in the purchase of real estate, the same duty which ought to be paid by such person or persons, if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate by virtue of any bequest thereof as such, shall be charged on such person or persons, and raised and paid out of the fund remaining to be applied in such purchase."

Testamentary trustees were directed, during the period of six years next after the testator's death, to realise the residue of the trust-estate, consisting of moveables to the extent of about £350,000, and therewith to purchase land to be entailed on A and a series of heirs. The trustees expended £21,000 on the purchase of land. At the end of the six years A presented a petition for disentail, and having by private arrangement obtained the consents of the next three heirs on payment of compensation for their respective interests, as ascertained by an extrajudicial valuation, he obtained a decree ordaining the trustees to convey to him in fee-simple the lands and the moneys held by them for investment in land.

The Crown thereupon claimed from the trustees legacy-duty upon the capital of the whole residue of the moveable estate, under the 19th section of the Act 36 Geo. III. c. 52, on the ground that A had right to the whole thereof, and had, in the sense of that section, "become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith." The trustees maintained (1) that the duty fell to be charged only on the succession which had opened to A under the will, and that as he was merely the first of a series of beneficiaries in succession, the duty should be charged on his interest as an annuity, the proceedings by which he had acquired a right in fee-simple being transactions inter vivos which did not affect his succession; and (2) alternatively, that he was entitled to deduct from the amount of residue to which he had right the compensation paid by him to the three next substitute heirs for their consents to the disentail.

The Court sustained the claim of the Crown without deduction, holding (1) (following the interpretation of the English Judges in De Lancey, L. R. 4 Exch. 345, 5 Exch. 102, 6 Exch. 286, 7 Exch. 140) that the words in the proviso in section 19 of the Act 36 Geo. III. c. 52, "shall become entitled to an inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith," mean shall become entitled to an absolute interest in the money bequeathed to be laid out in the purchase of land; and (2) that the fact that A had not "become entitled" to such an absolute interest by the will, but by the voluntary arrangement in the disentail proceedings, did not prevent the proviso applying to his case; and (3) that the sums paid to the next heirs of entail for their consent did not fall to be deducted from the amount liable to duty.

1ST DIVISION. ALEXANDER DUNLOP, of Carnduff and Doonside, died on 30th September 1883, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 28th July 1875, and two holograph testamentary writings.

By the fifth purpose of the trust-disposition the trustees were directed to retain and accumulate for six years after the truster's decease the whole rents, interests, profits, and proceeds of the residue of the estate, and to apply them in the way therein specified.

The sixth purpose was as follows:—"During the said period of six years my said trustees shall sell and realise the whole of the residue and reversion of my moveable estate of every kind, and of the whole of my heritable bonds, feu-duties, and ground-annuals, and my house and other heritable property in Glasgow and out of the United Kingdom," [with certain specified exceptions]; "and my said trustees shall look out for and purchase with the proceeds of said residue and reversion, such lands or landed estate or estates in Scotland as they may consider proper, and shall entail the same and my other landed estates as after mentioned: . . . Declaring, however, that although it is my wish and desire that my said trustees should realise the residue and reversion of my said estates, and purchase the said lands or estates during the said period of six years, I hereby declare that they shall be entitled to use their own discretion as to this, and if they consider it necessary, they shall be entitled, and are hereby empowered to delay the said realisation, and also the said purchase or purchases till such time or times as may seem to them most convenient and suitable for such realisation and purchases: Declaring, however, that after the said period of six years have expired, the institute or the heir of entail in possession or entitled at the time to possess the lands and estates to be purchased as aforesaid, under the destination hereinafter written, shall be entitled to demand and receive the interest and proceeds of the entire residue and reversion of my said estates, heritable and moveable, hereby conveyed, but under deduction always of such expenses and charges as may be incurred by my said trustees in the management and execution of the trust, until the said lands or estates are purchased and entailed, and the whole purposes of the trust fulfilled."

Lord Advocate v. Dunlop's Trustees.

By the seventh purpose the trustees were directed, as soon as convenient after the said period, to execute a deed or deeds of strict entail of the lands and estates to be purchased in terms of the sixth purpose, and also of certain lands and estates which were named, and of any other properties which might belong to the truster at his death, to and in favour of William Hamilton Dunlop, solicitor, Ayr, and the heirs-male of his body, according to their seniority, and the heirs-male of their bodies, according to their seniority, whom failing, to other substitutes in succession.

At the truster's death he was possessed of heritable property in Scotland and abroad, and also of personal property of the value of about £350,000.

The trustees accepted office, and out of the residue vested in them they purchased certain lands in Ayrshire at the price of £21,000, but made no further purchases.

The period of six years expired on 30th September 1889.

On 11th January 1890 William Hamilton Dunlop, who would have been the heir of entail in possession had the truster's directions as to the investment of the residue been carried into effect, presented a petition to the Court under the Entail Acts, 1848 to 1882, for authority to acquire in fee-simple the whole heritable and personal property vested in the trustees, with the exception of a sum of £20,000, which was set apart to meet annuities, and the sums required for Government duties, expenses, and other liabilities of the trust.

In order to obtain the authority craved, the consents of the three next heirs, who were three of Mr Dunlop's sons, all in pupillarity, were required. A curator ad litem was appointed to each, and by extrajudicial arrangement, as set forth in the defender's answers, quoted below, the values of their expectancies were fixed to be respectively £89,145, £10,000, and £1350. On 22d November 1890 the Lord Ordinary interposed his authority to the proposed transaction, and authorised and decreed the trustees to pay and convey to William Hamilton Dunlop in fee-simple the lands and estates mentioned in the petition and the whole of the personal property and estate therein also specified, and any other property and estate vested in the trustees, with the exception of (1) a sum of £20,000 to meet annuities; and (2) a further sum of £20,000 to pay or provide for the duties payable to Government, and the expenses of executing the trust.

The Lord Advocate, as representing the Crown, now brought an action against the trustees for payment of legacy-duty upon the sum of £350,000, being the capital of the personal estate held by the trustees, and falling to be paid over by them to Mr Dunlop. Mr Dunlop being a descendant of a brother of the trustor's father, the duty calculated at 5 per cent amounted to £17,500, the sum sued for, with interest chargeable at 4 per cent from 22d November 1890.

The pursuer founded upon the Act 55 Geo. III. c. 184, schedule part iii., under which provision is made for the payment of duty on legacies, and on the residue of the personal estate of a deceased, and in particular upon the terms of the 19th section of the Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 52.*

The defenders stated :—"At the time the petition for disentail was presented the amount of personal property held by the trustees was in value about £340,000, of which sum the trustees were directed by said interlocutor to retain £20,000 for the payment and security of certain annuities, and £20,000 to meet Government duties, the expenses of the trust, and any other liabilities payable out of the trust-estate. Before the said William Hamilton Dunlop could obtain the authority of the Court contained in said interlocutor, it was necessary for him to obtain the consents of the three next heirs, his three eldest sons, and to pay or secure the value of their interests or expectancies in the trust-estate to be acquired by him in fee-simple. The three next heirs above named were in pupilarity, and a separate curator ad litem was appointed by the Court to each of them. The values of the expectancies or interests of the three heirs in the whole trust property to be acquired in fee-simple, including the heritable properties, were ascertained and fixed to be respectively £89,145, £10,000, and £1350. The proportions of these sums, representing the value of the expectancies and interests of the three heirs in the personal property alone, were £72,700, £8160, and £1100 or thereby. A special arrangement was come to with the curator ad litem to Alexander Hamilton Dunlop, the first heir, whereby, instead of making payment of the said sum of £89,145, William Hamilton Dunlop vested a sum of £153,073 in trustees, part of which sum is to be paid to Alexander Hamilton Dunlop at certain dates, and the remainder is to be liferented by William Hamilton Dunlop, the father, and on his death is to be paid over to Alexander Hamilton Dunlop. The sums of £10,000 and £1350, representing the compensation to the second and third heirs, were vested in trustees for their behoof, to be held until they respectively attain majority, when said sums are to be paid over to them." They further stated that, taking the value of the personal estate to be acquired in fee-simple at £300,000, the legacy-duty upon which, calculated by way of annuity in terms of section 12 of the

* The Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 52, sec. 19, enacts "that any sum of money or personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate shall be charged with and pay duty as personal estate, unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled thereto in succession shall pay duty for the same in the same manner as if the same had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate: unless the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate before such duty accrued; but no duty shall accrue in respect thereof after the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate, for so much thereof as shall have been so applied: Provided, nevertheless, that in case before the same, or some part thereof, shall be actually so applied, any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith, or with so much thereof as shall not have been applied in the purchase of real estate, the same duty which ought to be paid by such person or persons, if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate by virtue of any bequest thereof as such, shall be charged on such person or persons and raised and paid out of the fund remaining to be applied in such purchase."

Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 52,* for which they admitted liability, would amount to about £8700. "The said proceedings and arrangement come to between William Hamilton Dunlop and the three next heirs in no way alter the position of the personal estate which was vested in the defenders as trustees foresaid as regards liability in legacy-duty. These proceedings and arrangements formed purely inter vivos transactions, in terms of which William Hamilton Dunlop purchased the consents of the three next heirs in exercise of a power competent to him in virtue of the Entail Acts, which were passed subsequent to said Act 36 George III., cap. 52, and none of which impose any legacy or succession-duties upon heirs of entail taking advantage of them, or enlarge the rights of the Crown. In any event, in ascertaining the amount of the so-called 'estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate' to which the said William Hamilton Dunlop is said to have become entitled, the sums paid to the three next heirs as the value of their contingent and defeasible expectancies or interests, so far as applicable to said personal estate, must be deducted. The transactions whereby the said William Hamilton Dunlop became entitled to the said personal estate in fee-simple are outside the province of the defenders as administrators of the trust-funds, and in no way affect the succession or bequests under the trust-disposition and deed of settlement of the late Alexander Dunlop; and as the present action depends upon the interpretation put upon the said transactions, the said William Hamilton Dunlop ought to be sisted as a defender along with the present defenders."

Lord Advocate v. Dunlop's Trustees.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The clear residue of the testator's personal estate administered by the defenders as trustees, and held by them for the said William Hamilton Dunlop, or paid by them to him, is liable to duty under the Legacy-Duty Acts. (2) The said William Hamilton Dunlop having acquired in fee-simple a right to the said residue, and thus become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession, legacy-duty is chargeable on the capital of the residue under section 19 of the Act 36 Geo. III., cap. 52.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) All parties not called. (3) Upon a just construction of section 19 of the Act 36 Geo. III., cap. 52, and the Legacy and Succession-Duty Statutes, duty is only chargeable calculated by way of annuity. (4) In any event, and if duty is chargeable upon the capital, the sums paid as compensation by the said William Hamilton Dunlop to the three next heirs fall to be deducted, so that the duty payable by him may be charged upon the beneficial interest actually acquired by him by the transactions before mentioned. (5) The three next heirs never having had, and never having "become entitled to, an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate" in question, the sums paid to them for their consents to the disentail are not liable in legacy-duty.

The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 4th December 1891, pronounced

* The 12th section enacts, "that the duty payable on a legacy or residue or part of residue of any personal estate given to . . . different persons in succession, who shall be chargeable with the duties hereby imposed at one and the same rate, shall be charged upon and paid out of the legacy or residue or part of residue so given, as in the case of a legacy to one person, and where any legacy or residue, or part of residue, shall be given to . . . different persons in succession, some or one of whom shall be chargeable with different rates of duty, so that one rate of duty cannot be immediately charged thereon, all persons who under or in consequence of any such bequest shall be entitled for life only, or any other temporary interest, shall be chargeable with the duty in respect of such bequest in the same manner as if the annual produce thereof had been given by way of annuity."

this interlocutor:—"Finds that Mr William Hamilton Dunlop having become entitled absolutely to the clear residue of the personal estate of the deceased Alexander Dunlop, duty is chargeable on the capital thereof at the rate of five per cent; therefore repels the defences, and appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that the balance due to the pursuer on that footing may be adjusted, reserving all question of expenses, and grants leave to reclaim." *

* "OPINION.— . . . The question which I have to decide is on what footing is legacy-duty to be paid on the estate so far as personal thus acquired in fee-simple by Mr William Hamilton Dunlop? The defenders maintain that legacy-duty is only chargeable calculated by way of annuity; and alternatively that a deduction falls to be made in respect of sums paid or secured by Mr William Hamilton Dunlop in order to obtain consents to disentail the money. The Crown maintains that duty is chargeable on the capital of the whole clear residue. The solution of this question depends upon section 19 of the Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 52.

"The case is a novel one so far as regards legal decision. Counsel for the Crown stated that such a claim had been more than once made and admitted, and that it had never been made and refused. The only weight which I attach to this statement is that it is an answer to the statement on the other side that the claim is unprecedented.

"Section 19 of 36 Geo. III. cap. 52, is somewhat ambiguously expressed, and in language more intelligible to English than to Scottish lawyers; but the following is, I think, the true construction. The leading provision is that personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate shall pay duty on personal estate, that is out of capital. This is the keynote to the section, and but for one exceptional case no more need have been said.

"The clause then proceeds to say that if the bequest is given to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, each person entitled in succession shall pay duty 'in the same manner as if the same had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate.' To ascertain the meaning and effect of these words, it is necessary to examine section 12 of the Act. From that section appears (1) that if the persons entitled in succession to the enjoyment of a legacy fall to be charged at the same rate, legacy-duty shall be paid out of the capital of the legacy as in the case of a legacy to one person. So far there is no exception to the leading direction of section 19; but then (2) section 12 provides—and this is the only real exception—that if the persons entitled in succession fall to be charged with different rates of duty in respect of their respective life or other temporary interests, each person so entitled shall be charged by way of annuity. The only reason for making this distinction will be seen, the impossibility of charging one rate of duty at the outset in such a case.

"I now come to the part of the clause 19 on which the present question specially depends. It runs as follows:—'Provided nevertheless, that in case before the same, or some part thereof, shall be actually so applied, any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith, or with so much thereof as shall not have been applied in the purchase of real estate, the same duty which ought to be paid by such person or persons, if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate by virtue of any bequest thereof as such, shall be charged on such person or persons, and raised and paid out of the fund remaining to be applied in such purchase.'

"This paragraph applies, I think, to a case in which one of several persons entitled to enjoy a limited interest in the bequest in succession (different rates being applicable) has, before the money has been applied in the purchase of real estate, become entitled through some change of circumstances to 'an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith.' The words which I have just quoted require construction. 'An estate of inheritance in possession' is not a term familiar to Scottish lawyers; but occurring does in a statute of the United Kingdom, it must be interpreted by this Court. The term is satisfied, I think, by interpreting it as an absolute interest, or an estate in fee-simple in possession with absolute power of disposal, which would descend to the heirs of the person in possession for the time in the event of his dying intestate.

“Another matter to be explained in this passage is, what is the meaning of the statute when it speaks of a person becoming entitled to ‘an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased’ when in the case provided for the money has not been applied to that purpose? There is no real difficulty, because, though it is elliptically expressed, the meaning of the passage evidently is that if the person who would have been entitled to possession of the real estate if it had been purchased becomes entitled absolutely to the corpus of the bequest before land is purchased (which is just the case provided for in section 27 of the Rutherfurd Entail Act of 1848) duty shall be paid on the money directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate just as if it had been personal estate not so destined.

“This being in my view the interpretation of section 19, the question which I have to decide is whether Mr William Hamilton Dunlop has become ‘entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession’ within the meaning of the statute.

“There is no doubt that he has acquired under the authority of the Court the fee-simple of the whole free residue of the trust-estate. But it is maintained that the absolute right so acquired was purchased by him, and that he did not become entitled to it by operation of the will, but by his own act. The statute does not say that the legatee must become entitled under the will in order to bring the fund within the provision. It is not necessary, however, to consider whether, in order to bring a case within the statute, it must be shewn that the party became entitled under the will to ‘an estate of inheritance in possession,’ because in a legal sense Mr W. H. Dunlop did become entitled to it under the will. His right under the will was on the expiry of six years to take the real estate if purchased as institute heir of entail, and, until the purchase of real estate, to receive payment of the interest of the fund. As institute he had a potentiality of acquiring the estate in fee-simple if real estate were purchased; or if land were not purchased to acquire the money in fee-simple on taking the steps and obtaining the consents, if any, required by the Entail Acts. That power was an inherent part of his interest under the will; and therefore, when he exercised that power and acquired the money in fee-simple he may fairly be said to have become entitled to that absolute right under the will. I may refer to the cases of De Virte v. Wilson, 5 R. 328; MacDonald v. MacDonald, 6 R. 521, and 7 R. (H. L.) 41; The Attorney-General v. Lord Lilford, L. R., 2 Eng. and Ir. App. 63. The following passage in Lord Colonsay’s opinion in the case last named, though spoken with reference to the provisions of another statute, describes this inherent right so aptly that I venture to quote it:—‘It appears to me that the interest which Lord Lilford took was an interest, though only of a tenant in tail, which had in it a certain potentiality which ripened into a power to dispose of the estate. . . . It was part of the quality of the succession; and he having exercised that power, or being competent to exercise that power, it must be considered that he was in the predicament which the statute contemplates.’

“This being the nature of the institute’s right, I do not think that the Crown is concerned with the arrangements by which Mr Dunlop became entitled to the money in fee-simple. Suppose that Mr W. H. Dunlop had been, as he might have been, the only heir of entail in existence. In that case the entail being dated after 1848 he would have been entitled to disentail without any consents at all. Again, assuming that consents were required, they might be given without any money down, or, as in the present case, they might be given without the Court being called upon to decide as to the adequacy of the compensation given. I am unable to hold that in each case the Crown is bound to

Geo. III. cap. 52, the exception contained in section 19 being applicable to the fund in question which was so given "as to be enjoyed by different inquire what the arrangement was, and whether it was justified by actuarial calculations and other considerations. The Crown is entitled in one way or another to legacy-duty on the whole of the free residue of the personal estate of Alexander Dunlop if it is not invested in the purchase of land, and if the money is acquired absolutely before it is so laid out. Now, in the present case if it is held that Mr Dunlop has himself acquired the whole free residue absolutely, it is clear that duty must be paid out of capital. If, again, he has had to pay part of it to the next heirs for their consents, the result is practically the same, because unless the whole duty is satisfied out of the £20,000 reserved by the trustees, the portion of the fund paid as compensation and taken free from the restrictions of the will would escape legacy-duty altogether. In one way or another Mr W. H. Dunlop by himself, or he and the next heirs who would have been entitled in succession to the real estate to be purchased, have become entitled absolutely to the whole personal estate directed to be laid out on the purchase of land and entailed. In my opinion the fund so acquired is chargeable with duty as if there had been no direction to purchase real estate with it. The direction of the statute as to the duties payable by different persons in succession where the rate is not the same are no longer applicable; and the event, I think, has occurred which is contemplated by the last clause of section 19. It would perhaps be hard, assuming that the institute was compelled to pay away a large part of the estate in order to obtain consents, the burden of the whole of the legacy-duty were to fall upon him. But this was a matter for arrangement, and should have formed a part of any agreement come to between Mr W. H. Dunlop and the next heirs and their curators.

"I omitted to mention the defender's argument that Mr W. H. Dunlop's right having been originally limited, duty must be charged on that footing. There is no warrant for this contention either in the statute or the decisions.

"It may be questioned whether Mr W. H. Dunlop ever was in the position of having other than an absolute right to the corpus of the bequest; because practically as soon as the succession opened to him, and before the trustees had purchased, or indeed were bound to purchase, lands to be entailed (because they had a wide discretion as to this), he had taken steps to acquire the fund in fee simple. But apart from this, and apart from the unqualified terms of section 19, the whole spirit of the Act is to exact the full duty as on a legacy to one person, whenever on the expiry or failure of life interest or other temporary interest the personal estate bequeathed becomes the absolute property of one or more of the beneficiaries. If sections 12 to 18 are attentively read this becomes apparent. For instance, section 12, to which I have already alluded, after dealing with temporary interests enjoyed in succession, provides,—'And all such every person and persons who shall become absolutely entitled to any such legacy or residue, or part of residue, so to be enjoyed in succession, shall, whether and as such person or persons respectively shall receive the same, or begin to enjoy the benefit thereof, be chargeable with and pay the duty for the same, such part thereof as shall be so received, or of which the benefit shall be enjoyed, in the same manner as if the same had come to such person or persons immediately on the death of the person by whom such property shall have been given to be enjoyed, or in such manner that the same shall be enjoyed in succession.' A similar provision is to be found in section 14 in regard to plate and furniture; in section 16 in regard to legacies in joint tenancy where one of the joint tenants by survivorship becomes entitled to a larger interest; in section 17 as to legacies subject to contingencies; and in section 18 in regard to legacies of a limited interest subject to a general power of appointment.

"As to the defender's plea of all parties not called, section 6 of the statute affords a complete answer. I may add that the defenders have vigorously maintained all defences open to Mr W. H. Dunlop.

"I am therefore of opinion that duty must be paid on the capital of the free residue under deduction of any instalments which may have already been paid.

persons in succession." The Lord Ordinary's interpretation of the term "an estate of inheritance in possession" was not questioned. But it was disputed that Mr Dunlop had become entitled to such an estate within the meaning of the statute, so as to make him liable to pay duty upon the capital. The circumstances to which the term was intended to apply were such as (1) where the destination took the form of a series of liferents followed by a fee,—the full estate being in such a case in one person by operation of the truster's will,—or (2) where all the substitutes had died and the institute alone survived, in which case he would then be the only heir of entail in existence, and would thus under the will become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession. Many other such illustrations might be figured, where extrinsic events might have the effect of making a person who had originally only a limited interest a full fiar, and where therefore he would under the Act be bound to pay duty upon the capital sum. But the present case was very different. Here at the expiration of the six years Mr Dunlop took as institute under the entail with a number of substitutes behind. It could not be said that before he disentailed he was in the position contemplated by the statute, and was in possession of an estate in inheritance. A change of circumstances under the will might operate that, but nothing else. That this was the contemplation of the statute was clear from the use of the words "shall become entitled," which could not apply to the present case where it was a supervening Act of Parliament which gave the disentailer his right. In the case of a private Act of disentail prior to 1848, it could not be said that a disentailer would have been in the sense of the Act of 53 Geo. III. a person who had "become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession." Again, in the case of a disentail prior to 1875, when consents were voluntary, the same argument applied. It was not different where as now consents could be forced and an actuarial valuation was necessary. The present case therefore of a disentail under the Entail Acts could not have been in contemplation of the Legislature in 1796 when the Act, which was the subject of construction, was passed. Lord Lilford's case¹ did not apply, because in barring an English entail no consents were needed, and it was not necessary to apply to the Court. The quality which created the estate of inheritance in possession under the Act must be inherent from the first, and could not be superadded afterwards by statutory enactment. De Lancey's case² did not help the present. The heir in that case took the estate as heir in heritage, because that character was impressed upon it under the will, but it might have been sold or willed away absolutely before it reached him. 2. Assuming Mr Dunlop, the institute, to be a legatee, he was not a legatee of the beneficial interests paid to the substitute heirs. That would be to treat the price paid for their consents as a benefit to him. Taxing Acts must be strictly construed, and there was no warrant for such a view in this Act.³

Argued for the Crown;—1. Duty fell to be paid upon the capital of the whole residue of the personal estate falling to the disentailer. In form the whole residue was paid over to him, in substance it might not strictly be so, in view of the transaction which had been carried through between him and the next three heirs. But that transaction did not take the case outside of the terms of the proviso of the 19th section of the Act. The disentailer held a decree of Court which put him in the position contemplated by the statutory language, "entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased." It was said that the operation of the Entail Statutes must be left out of view in the consideration of the present question. But the will of the truster must be subject to the laws in existence, and so far as promulgated at the date of his death.¹ In the case of De Lancey the heir who took the estate on the capital of which it was ultimately held he had to pay duty under this Act, did not so take it in virtue of the will which directed that the money should be invested in the purchase of land. 2. No deductions could be made in respect of the compensation payable to the three heirs. The decree of Court under which the disentailer was found to be in right of the whole fund could alone be looked to. Besides, the 6th section of the Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 52, provided that duties should be paid by executors and administrators on retaining or paying legacies or residues, and so the question of the heirs' liability did not arise.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—By the trust-disposition and settlement of Alexander Dunlop, of Carnduff and Doonside, his trustees were directed to lay out in the purchase of land the residue of his estate which amounted to £350,000. The Crown claim legacy-duty on this money, founding primarily upon the substantive and leading sentence of section 19 of the Act 36 Geo. III. sec. 52,—“And be it further enacted that any sum of money or personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate shall be charged with and pay duty as personal estate.” It is obvious, and is admitted, that those words, taken by themselves, in terms apply to the money in question; and, accordingly, the trustees, in resisting the claim of the Crown, seek to draw themselves within the exception which qualifies the general rule, and immediately follows it, “unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled thereto in succession shall pay duty” “as if the annual produce thereof had been given by way of annuity” (sec. 12). This exception, however, on which the defenders found as limiting the claim of the Crown to duty on the right valued as an annuity of William Hamilton Dunlop (upon whom as institute they were directed to entail the lands to be purchased) is itself qualified by the following proviso,—“Provided nevertheless that in case before the same or some part thereof shall be actually so applied any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith, or with so much thereof as shall not have been applied in the purchase of real estate, the same duty which ought to have been paid by such person or persons, if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate by virtue of any bequest thereof as such, shall be charged on such person or persons, and raised and paid out of the fund remaining to be applied in such purchase.” The argument therefore stands thus:—If William Hamilton Dunlop is in the position described in the proviso, then, whether he would otherwise have come under the exception or not, he is excluded by the proviso from the operation of the exception and legacy-duty must be paid. Although therefore the Crown rely on the leading words of the section to which I have first referred, the debate before us has mainly been on the question whether, in the sense of the statute Mr W. H. Dunlop has "become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased" with the residue of the trust-estate.

Now, Mr W. H. Dunlop has obtained and holds a decree of the Court of Session, under which the defenders (the trustees) were ordained to pay and make over to him, his heirs and assignees, in fee-simple, the whole personal property and estate vested in them (with the exception of a sum to meet annuities and another sum to meet the duties in dispute). It is said by the Crown that he is thus in the position described in the proviso.

The answer of the defenders is rested on the fact that the decree of Court gave effect to a right conferred on heirs of entail by the Entail Acts, 1848-1882, and brought into operation in the present instance through onerous transaction between Mr W. H. Dunlop and the three next heirs. Mr Dunlop was entitled to acquire the money in fee-simple upon his either producing the consents of the three next heirs, or upon the Court valuing their interests, seeing the values paid to them, and then dispensing with their consents. In the present case, Mr W. H. Dunlop obtained the requisite consents from the guardians of the three next heirs, and I assume that the "transaction," upon which that consent was obtained, and which is referred to in the decree in Mr Dunlop's favour, was of the nature described in the answer to condescendences 7, 8, and 9. It is, however, important to observe that the Court made no partition of the money, as would have been the case if the expectancies of the next heirs had been valued and their consents dispensed with.

The decree of the Court in Mr Dunlop's favour being thus explained, I recur to the question whether he has become entitled to "an estate of inheritance in possession" in the lands to be purchased. Now, the section employs English legal phraseology; but the parties were not in dispute that a right to lands in Scotland, in fee-simple, would fall within the words "an estate of inheritance in possession in real estate." There remain, however, the two questions (1) whether the words of the statute apply to a right of fee-simple in money directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate; and (2) whether Mr Dunlop has "become entitled," in the sense of the statute, to the ample right which he now enjoys.

In the former of these questions, I think we are greatly aided by the case of De Lancey; because, although the dispute there decided was not in pari materia with the present, it afforded an occasion of deliberate judicial consideration of the very question of statutory construction with which I am now dealing. Now, in that case (L. R., 6 Ex. 290), Baron Martin says,—“The proviso is not very intelligibly expressed, but the words ‘entitled to an estate of inheritance in the land to be purchased therewith’ must mean entitled ‘to an absolute interest in the money which was bequeathed to be laid out in the purchase of land.’” If that is sound, it applies in terms to the point now before us; the same view seems to have been adopted, although it is less explicitly stated, by the other Judges in the Court of Exchequer and Court of Exchequer Chamber; and, as the phraseology in question is that of English law, the construction assigned to it by eminent English Judges has a special authority. On that authority I am prepared to arrive on this point at the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary has

No. 95. come to, on apparently a more independent examination of the words themselves.

Feb. 6, 1892.
Lord Advocate v. Dunlop's Trustees.

The defenders, however, have further argued that inasmuch as Mr Dunlop's right to have the money in fee-simple arises not directly from the will of the truster, but from the combined operation of the will, the Entail Acts, and certain proceedings and transactions of his own, he cannot be held to have "become entitled" in the sense of the statute. This argument was presented by the Dean of Faculty with great force and variety of illustration, and would limit the meaning of "become entitled" to cases where through some change of circumstances, as by the occurrence of deaths, the right yielded by the operation of the will itself has become amplified into an estate of inheritance in possession. But while such instances are in their nature separated by a perceptible difference from the case before us, I do not find that any such distinction is drawn by the enactment in question, the words of which seem completely applicable to the one as well as to the other class of cases. It is of course true that the statutory rights conferred on heirs of entail by the Scotch Entail Acts, 1848-1882, cannot have been in contemplation in 1796; but that is not to the purpose if, by good fortune for the Crown, the words used at the earlier date turn out to be sufficiently comprehensive to cover these modern rights. Nor does the Act of George III. contain any warrant for the suggestion that the right of the heir who "becomes entitled" must arise by virtue of the will alone applied to external circumstances. When Mr Dunlop got his decree, giving him the money in fee simple, he did so, it is true, because he had taken steps made competent to him by statute. This, however, is only another way of saying that one of the legal qualities of the bequest in his favour was that he could take it, if he pleased, in this form, and the fact that this right does not appear on the face of the will does not seem to me to make a substantial difference in the present argument. Accordingly, my opinion is that, in the sense of the Act of 1796, Mr Dunlop has "become entitled" to the right of fee-simple expressed in the decree, and that it is, in the sense of that Act, an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased with the residue of the trust-estate.

The defenders claim, alternatively to their main argument, that, at all events Mr Dunlop's right is limited to the residue, less the amount of what he paid as the price of the consents. I do not think that this claim can be supported as a defence to the demand of the Crown against the trustees who held (and still hold in part) personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate. The defenders have paid over the whole residue (less the sums retained to meet the present claim and annuities) to Mr Dunlop alone, and in face of the decree of Court they could not have done otherwise. The fact that, in order to become entitled to the residue in fee-simple, he has had to provide for the three next heirs, whose consents he obtained, is not, I think, a matter with which the Crown is concerned. It is clear that if anyone becomes entitled to such money in fee simple, the duty is to be settled for finally; and it cannot make any difference to the Crown whether, in a private negotiation, the heirs have stood out for a large sum, or have given their consents for nothing, if the result is that the institute gets the money in fee-simple.

I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think the trustees are in the position of holding the residue of this estate for purposes which bring it within the direct operation of the first clause of the 19th section. They hold a sum of money or personal estate which is directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate, and that is to be charged with a particular duty as personal estate, unless it falls within a certain exception. Now, the trustees hold this estate absolutely for one residuary legatee. The exceptions in the clause are to take effect "when money or personal estate shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession." Now, it appears to me that what that clause contemplates is not the mere form of expression, but the effective operation of a bequest, and that money or personal estate is not so given as to be enjoyed in any particular way unless it is so given as that it shall be so enjoyed in effect. It is not brought within the exception if it is so bequeathed that it may be enjoyed either by different persons in succession, or by one person alone at the pleasure of the latter. A provision which directs that the money bequeathed shall be enjoyed by different persons in substitution to one another, does not appear to me to bring the bequest within that exception if the substitution has been effectually evacuated by the first taker, while the money is still in the hands of the trustees. And therefore when the trustees are found holding residue for the benefit of one particular person, as his absolute right, I am of opinion that they are not in a position to put forward the exception, because they cannot say that, in the sense of the clause, the money, or the estate which may be purchased by it, is to be enjoyed by different persons in succession.

But if that primary exception were, contrary to my opinion, applicable to the circumstances, I agree with your Lordship that the trustees are again brought within the primary enactment by the proviso which is equally applicable to the circumstances. I think that we must follow the construction put upon that clause by the learned Judges in England in the case to which your Lordship has referred. Taking it therefore that a person who has become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased with the money left by this testator, means or includes a person who has become absolutely entitled to the money which the testator directed to be applied in the purchase of an estate, it appears to me that the only question which remains for consideration is that to which your Lordship has adverted, and which formed the subject of the greater part of the argument before us, viz., whether an heir of entail or an institute appointed by the testamentary disposition of the deceased comes into the position of a person entitled in the sense of that clause, —absolutely entitled—to the money or to the estate to be bought with it, if he became entitled, only in consequence of an arrangement with the three next substitute heirs of entail, by which he is enabled to obtain the land or the money in fee-simple. Now, I am quite unable to see any sufficient ground for confining the meaning of the words "becomes entitled" in the manner contended for by the defenders. I am unable to draw any distinction between the operation of a will and the legal effect which the law in force at the time when it comes into operation gives to a will. It is for the law in all cases to say what is the legal effect of a disposition in a will; and the question whether a right is given in fee-simple or absolutely, or whether it is given subject to the letters of an entail, or subject to other restricting and limiting conditions, is always a question of law as well as a question of construction. I do not know that there could be a clearer illustration than that which was given by Lord McLaren in the course of the discussion, when he pointed out that a direction to convey to certain persons in succession by a simple destination would, according to the mere form of words, be a gift to persons in succession, but the law operating upon that direction declares that it shall create an absolute right in the first institute, and accordingly when we have to inquire whether an interest bequeathed by will is absolute or not we must always consider, not the mere form of expression which the will contains, but what is the legal effect and operation of dispositions conceived in that particular form. I am unable, therefore, to see any ground upon which we could exclude from consideration the operation of law upon the clauses contained in the will, when we have to determine whether a particular person has or has not become entitled under the will to a particular right.

The LORD PRESIDENT intimated that he was authorised by Lord M'Laren to say that he also concurred.

Executor—Appointment—Competition—Trustees appointed to manage estate—Curator bonis—Act of Sederunt, Feb. 13, 1730.—Under a mutual settlement by husband and wife, the survivor was appointed "sole trustee and executor of the predeceaser." By subsequent codicil executed at sea, on 14th June 1890, to which the wife was not a party, the husband directed,—“I wish my estate to be managed by the same trustees as my brother John, dead or alive, including to my wife.” The husband died on 21st June 1890.

After the husband's death competing petitions were presented (1) by the curator bonis of the wife, who had become insane, and (2) by the persons named as trustees under the settlement of the testator's brother John, dated 18th April and recorded 21st May 1891, the former claiming to be appointed executor-dative as representing his ward, and the latter claiming confirmation as executors-nominate under the codicil.

Held (1) that upon a construction of the testamentary writings the unlimited power conferred by the codicil on the persons therein designated to manage the estate along with the wife, who had previously been nominated trustee and executor, implied their nomination as executors as well as trustees, and that they had a title to be confirmed executors-nominate; (2) that the curator bonis had under the Act of Sederunt, February 13, 1730,* no title to be appointed executor-dative, other persons having a title having offered to confirm; and therefore (3) that the trustees were entitled to confirmation.

Opinions that a testamentary conveyance to certain persons as trustees or with a direction to manage does not necessarily imply their appointment as executors.

By deed of revocation and mutual settlement executed by the spouses on 17th January 1878, they recalled a nomination of trustees and executors contained in their antenuptial contract of marriage, and nominated the survivor of them "to be sole trustee and executor of the predeceaser." Feb. 16, 1892.
Martin v.
Ferguson's
Trustees.

Captain Ferguson executed a holograph codicil to the above deed on board ship, on 14th June 1890, which contained the following clause:—"I wish my estate to be managed by the same trustees as my brother John Christal Ferguson, dead or alive, including to my wife, Mrs Elizabeth J. B. Ferguson, who is to own all in liferent except legacys mentioned, and at her decease to be divided as my brother John Christal Ferguson's estate." The codicil also made provision for the management of Mrs Ferguson's property, in the event of her becoming incapable of managing her own affairs. It did not revoke the preceding mutual settlement.

Mrs Ferguson having become mentally incapable, James Martin, C.A., was appointed curator bonis to her on 12th June 1891.

Martin thereafter presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Kirkcudbright, praying to be decerned executor-dative to Captain Ferguson, qua curator bonis to Mrs Ferguson.

The petitioner founded on the deed of revocation and mutual settlement, nominating the survivor of the spouses "sole trustee and executor of the predeceaser," and stated that the codicil did not contain any valid nomination of trustees or executors, and that it did not recall the nomination of Mrs Ferguson in the mutual settlement, and that that deed was irrevocable, except by the joint act of the spouses.

The petitioner pleaded;—(1) The petitioner being curator bonis to the said Mrs Elizabeth Jane Brown Christal or Ferguson, the widow and executor-nominate of the said deceased James Christal Ferguson, is entitled to be decerned executor-dative of the said James Christal Ferguson.

Robert James Ferguson and others, the trustees under the settlement of the testator's brother, John Christal Ferguson, dated 18th April, and recorded 21st May 1891, who were appointed under the codicil, as above, to act for him along with his wife, lodged answers to Martin's petition, and pleaded that they were entitled to be confirmed to Captain Ferguson's estate.

They also presented a separate petition, claiming to be the executors-nominate of the deceased, as trustees under the settlement of John Christal Ferguson. They stated that, although they were not expressly nominated by the deceased in his codicil as his executors, yet their nomination as trustees ipso facto entitled them to the office of executors.

There were averments in this petition, and in the answers lodged by Martin, relating to the power of Captain Ferguson to alter the provisions contained in the mutual settlement by the codicil which he had executed without his wife's consent. The codicil carried his estate to the trustees, and to beneficiaries therein named, his wife having a mere liferent subject to legacies, while, by the mutual settlement, Mrs Ferguson was entitled to the whole beneficial interest in the estate.

Ferguson's trustees pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The whole estate dealt with under the mutual settlement having belonged to the husband, he was entitled to execute the codicil referred to, and that without the consent of his spouse. (4) The respondent, qua curator bonis, whose office may terminate at any moment, is not entitled to the office of executor in preference to the petitioners, who are the executors-nominate of the deceased, the possessor of the fund. (5) The petitioners being the trustees appointed by John Christal Ferguson and the persons appointed by the said James

Trustees.

The curator bonis pleaded;—(1) The deed of revocation and mutual settlement by the spouses, by which the survivor is appointed sole executor of the predeceaser, being irrevocable, the codicil by the husband without the wife's consent is inept, and the petitioners having thus no valid title, their petition ought to be dismissed. (2) As the express nomination of Mrs Ferguson, the surviving spouse, as sole executrix of her husband, under the said deed of revocation and mutual settlement, stands unrevoked, and the appointment of trustees under the codicil, even if valid, is not repugnant thereto, the petitioners are not entitled to be confirmed as executors-nominate of James Christal Ferguson. (4) The petitioners not having been named, or otherwise validly appointed trustees or executors under said codicil, the prayer of the petition to authorise them to be confirmed executors-nominate of James Christal Ferguson is incompetent, and ought to be refused. (5) The sole beneficial interest in her husband's estate being vested in Mrs Ferguson, the respondent, as her curator bonis, is entitled to be decerned executor-dative of the said James Christal Ferguson to the exclusion of the petitioners, and their petition ought to be dismissed.

On 4th September 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Lyell) pronounced this interlocutor in the conjoined petitions (after certain findings in fact):—"Finds in law (1) that the said deed of revocation and mutual settlement was not revocable by the one spouse without the consent of the other; (2) that in so far as the said codicil revokes the provisions of the said deed of revocation and mutual settlement, it is inept and invalid; (3) that the appointment of the petitioners, Robert James Ferguson," &c., "to be executors in place of Mrs Elizabeth Jane Brown Christal or Ferguson, even if implied in the said codicil, was ultra vires of the said James Christal Ferguson: Therefore refuses the prayer of the petition of the said Robert James Ferguson," &c., "decern the petitioner James Martin executor-dative of the said deceased James Christal Ferguson qua curator bonis to the said Mrs Elizabeth Jane Brown Christal or Ferguson," &c.

On appeal by the trustees the Sheriff (R. V. Campbell), on 31st December 1891, adhered.

The trustees appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The Sheriffs had entirely outstepped their duties as Commissaries in going into questions as to the patrimonial effect of the two deeds. The office of executor was purely administrative for the purpose of managing the estate.¹ The appellants here were accordingly entitled to the office of executors-nominate, as they had been named by the deceased to manage his estate. It was not indispensable that they should be specially designated as executors,² and the language of the codicil was sufficient. A curator bonis was not entitled to the position of executor-nominate in place of his ward, but this was really the position to which the Sheriff must be taken to have preferred Martin in this case as representing the ward, although nominally he termed him executor-dative in the note appended to his interlocutor, and this was also the term used in Martin's petition. But a curator bonis or a judicial factor came last in the order prescribed in the Act of Sederunt, February 13, 1730, for the appoint-

Argued for Martin, the curator bonis;—As matter of practice, it was admitted that testamentary trustees were entitled to be confirmed as executors-nominate where nothing to the contrary was said or implied in the testamentary writings.⁴ The trustees were in such a case in the position of universal legatories, and were entitled to oust all others applying for the office of executor. There was nothing incompetent in the present case in the appointment of an executor in the mutual deed being followed by the appointment of the trustees in the codicil, which did not in any way purport to revoke the preceding deed of revocation and mutual settlement.⁵ They severally had their proper duties, the executor had hers under the mutual deed, and the trustees had theirs under the codicil. The section which had been cited from the Act of Sederunt of February 13, 1730, did not touch the present case, as the respondent here claimed office as the representative of the person who had the sole beneficial interest under the mutual deed, and would thus alone have been entitled to the office of executor-nominate had she remained sane; as representing her, he had a better title than the next of kin. The opinion of the late Lord President in Whiffin's case was in point where his Lordship said that "the factor is allowed to confirm because of the title to the office in the person whom he represents."⁶ The same rule applied in the case of a minor, although a minor, and even a pupil might himself be competently confirmed executor.⁷ Indeed the ward, Mrs Ferguson, might herself have been confirmed if her curator had made such an application.⁷ The position of the curator bonis here was therefore very different from that of the judicial factor in the Act of Sederunt, and he ought to be appointed as representing his ward. Further, he would find caution for his intromissions.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Sheriffs have appointed the curator bonis to Mrs Elizabeth Jane Brown Christie or Ferguson to be executor on the estate of her late husband, and they have done so upon an examination of the relative effects of two deeds which are regarded by all parties, and necessarily so, as having come into collision. The Sheriff-substitute has confined himself entirely to the question as to which of these deeds is to prevail, and his ground of judgment is briefly stated in his fifth finding in fact, and his first and second findings in law. His fifth finding in fact is—"That the said deed of revocation and mutual settlement proceeded upon onerous considerations, and that there is reasonable proportion between the grants between the spouses therein contained"; and the first and second findings in law are "(1) that the said deed of revocation and mutual settlement was not revocable by the one spouse without the consent of the other"; and "(2) that in so far as the said codicil revokes the provisions of the said deed of revocation and mutual settlement it is inept and invalid."

I cannot say that I am surprised that the appellants should feel uneasy at the pronouncing of these findings, even apart from what was the immediate question before the Sheriff, namely, who was to hold the office of executor. The appellants come here not only seeking that those findings should be recalled, but also claiming the office of executors on the footing that they are the executors-nominate under the last codicil of the deceased. I think the Sheriffs have taken a wrong view of this question, and in any view I should not be inclined to adhere to findings such as those which I have read. The duty of the Sheriff as Commissary is to determine who is entitled to the office of executor on the face either of the deeds which are put before the Court, or of the relation to the deceased which is set out as the title of the applicant.

Now, in the present case the curator bonis stands in this position—He claims the appointment as executor-dative, and he does so upon the ground that his ward is appointed executrix-nominate in the deed of revocation and mutual settlement of 1878, but in order to make out his case he has to found upon the Act of Sederunt of 1730. But the Act of Sederunt of 1730, while giving right to officers of Court in his position to be confirmed to an estate in which their ward has a beneficial interest, is careful to say "unless some other person having a title offer to confirm," and that plainly means that, if any person or persons can satisfy the Commissary that he, she, or they have a right under one of the known heads of the law to the office, they shall be entitled to be confirmed, and the factor shall come in only failing any person having such a title offering himself.

Throwing him therefore out of account until we view the position of his competitors, what do we find? His competitors found upon what undoubtedly is the last testamentary writing of the deceased, and that contains these words,—“I wish my estate to be managed by the same trustees as my brother John Christal Ferguson, dead or alive, including to my wife Mrs Elizabeth J. B. Ferguson, who is to owe all in liferent except legacys mentioned, and at her decease to be divided as my brother John Christal Ferguson's estate.” Now, the question is, what is the meaning of these words,—“I wish my estate to be managed by the same trustees as my brother John Christal Ferguson”? In the first place, I think it can hardly be doubted that to whatever office this be a nomination, it is not invalidated by reason of its containing a reference to the settlement of another person, be he, as the testator puts it, “dead or alive.” A man may quite competently appoint trustees or executors if he designates the persons sufficiently so as to identify them, even if the criterion of identification be another man's settlement.

Therefore, I think, it can hardly be doubted that this is a valid appointment to some office, and the question is, what is the office to which they are appointed? We have been very urgently invited to observe that this codicil does not at least purport to revoke the preceding deed. I have looked at the preceding deed, and I find this—that it splits up for separate consideration the office of trustee and the office of executor, but these two offices are so conferred as to give the administration to the same person. The codicil is expressed in much curter and briefer terms, and seems to have been executed at sea in somewhat condensed language. What does the testator mean when he says—"I wish my estate to be managed"? One would naturally suppose that he used the word "manage" as the most comprehensive term available for describing all that required to be done to his estate after he was gone, and I arrive at the conclusion that the "management" included both the kind of management which is given by a trustee, and also the kind of management given by an executor. In short, I regard the word "manage," as used in this codicil, as representing generically all that required to be done with regard to the administration of the whole estate left by the testator.

If that view is sound, then this is a nomination of executors, and accordingly I think the application of the appellants to the Sheriff is in proper form. They do not ask to have the office as executors-dative, but they ask to have it as executors-nominate, and therein I think they have rightly construed the terms of the writings which I have read.

If that be a sound construction of the last writing of the deceased, the appellants occupy the first place in the competition, and the curator bonis is left out because the words of the Act of Sederunt of 1730 have been complied with, as another person having a title has offered to confirm. Upon that ground I think the appeal must be sustained, and that the appellants are entitled to the office of executors.

LORD ADAM.—There were three deeds before the Sheriff, first the marriage-contract between the deceased Mr Ferguson and his wife, who is now insane; second, the deed of revocation and mutual settlement, and third, the codicil. I understand neither party founds upon the marriage-contract. One party founds on the deed of revocation and mutual settlement, and the other founds upon the codicil. The appellants claim the office as executors-nominate of the deceased, and they found upon this clause in the codicil,—“I wish my estate to be managed by the same trustees as my brother John Christal Ferguson, dead or alive, including to my wife, Mrs Elizabeth J. B. Ferguson, who is to own all in life-rent except legacys mentioned,” &c. Now, they say, and it is the fact, that they are the trustees named by the brother John Christal Ferguson, and that being so nominated by the brother, it is the same thing as if they were nominated in the codicil. I agree upon that point with your Lordship.

I think the question depends upon the clause of nomination in the deed of revocation taken in connection with the clause which I have read from the codicil. I think there is no doubt that under the former deed the widow, Mrs Ferguson, would have been the only party entitled to the office of executor. But then comes the codicil, and what we find in it is this, that the testator wishes his estate to be managed by a set of trustees, the present claimants, including his widow. Now, under the deed the wife, in the character of trustee and executor, would have the management of the estate from the date of the death of her husband until the whole estate was distributed and applied in terms of the settlement, for in my view the management of an estate begins at the moment of the death of the deceased party. I think it is impossible to say that an executor does not “manage” the estate of a deceased party, and that a trustee does, and accordingly I do not think it is a reasonable construction of the terms of the codicil to say that so far as the duties of executor are concerned, one of the trustees is to have the sole management, and that thereafter there is to be a different management, and the widow and the other parties are to manage as trustees. I think the intention was that from first to last the management of the estate should be one and the same. The testator drew no distinction between the management of his estate at one time and at another. I think he meant that from the beginning the widow and the appellants should have the management of the estate. That being so, I agree that he meant to associate them with her in the executry. If that is so, it follows that the appellants are entitled, as executors-nominate, to the office here.

I have arrived at that conclusion from the construction of these two deeds themselves. I do not wish it to be inferred that where the management of an estate is left to A, B, and C, in the capacity of trustees, that that will imply necessarily an appointment as executors. But where the trustees are combined with a person who has been previously named as executor, that makes quite a different case. It is upon that specialty I proceed in the opinion which I have formed in this case.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think the Sheriffs have approached this case from a wrong point of view. The question which they had successively to consider was so simple as this—Who is entitled to the office of executor?—a question which is determined by rules which are now very well settled—one of the parties competing for the office claiming as executors-nominate under the codicil, while the other claims as factor, representing the interest of the deceased party's wife under the postnuptial deed of settlement. The Sheriffs seem both to have considered that in order to determine who was entitled to the office of executor they must consider who had the best right to the estate when it came to be distributed—in other words, whether the deceased gentleman was entitled to innovate upon the mutual settlement which he executed in conjunction with his wife.

Now, we have no occasion to consider how far the mutual settlement was a remuneratory deed, and how far it was open to either spouse to give legacies or make alterations on the disposal of the estate. I may observe in passing that it is a very well settled rule of construction, that although two spouses put their wills into the same deed, that by no means prevents either of them from altering his or her will in relation to individual property. It is only in so far as it contains contractual provisions that the deed is irrevocable, but so far as it is testamentary it is revocable. There is one part of a mutual settlement which must always be revocable, and that is the provision for administration—the appointment of trustees and executors. To say, for example, that if after a mutual settlement has been made, and it may be after the death of one of the parties, a trustee becomes insane or bankrupt, the surviving spouse shall not be able to recall that appointment and make another, would be really carrying the doctrine of remuneratory grants to an extravagant extent. In this case the husband, being at sea and without legal advice, and knowing that his wife's state of health and mental capacity was uncertain, made this codicil, leaving certain legacies, and, in the clause which has been read, appointing his estate to be managed by the same trustees as those appointed by his brother. I am of opinion that as regards his own estate it was quite competent to him to make a new appointment of trustees and executors, and in coming to that conclusion

I, of course, give no opinion as to the validity of this codicil in so far as it deals with the estate for testamentary purposes: No. 96.

The only question, then, is whether the appointment made in the codicil is a good appointment of executors in place of the wife, who was the sole executor under the mutual deed. Now, my understanding of the law has been that an executor could only be appointed under that name. I am not aware of any equivalent expression, and consequently when the disponees in a testamentary deed were only declared to be trustees, it was necessary that they should apply to the Commissary or Sheriff for an appointment as executors-dative qua trustees or universal disponees—an application which would always be granted of course, because in a petition for the office of executor universal disponees take precedence of all other parties except executors-nominate. The distinction is that in the one case security must be found, which would not be the case where trustees are also appointed executors. I do not pause to examine the considerations connected with the original character of the office of executor which have led to the recognition of this distinction, but it appears to me to be a distinction strongly recognised in the law.

But, then, in the series of instruments which are said to constitute the will, we have a good appointment of trustees and executors—that is, by the mutual deed; and I agree with your Lordships that in the case of a codicil—a writing which is always very favourably construed—the substitution of certain other parties to be managers of the estate, means that they are substituted for those who have been previously well appointed trustees and executors. Therefore that is a good substitution to the office of executors as well as to the office of trustees, entitling the parties there named to take up the office of executors-nominate in their own right.

It follows from these considerations that the interlocutor of the Sheriff ought to be recalled, and that it should be declared that the persons named in the codicil—the competing petitioners—are entitled to be confirmed as executors.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think, for the reasons stated by your Lordships, that the only question we have to consider is, whether this codicil contains or does not contain a nomination of executors. I agree with what I think is the opinion of all your Lordships, that the mere conveyance of an estate to persons with a direction to manage it, or a mere conveyance in trust, is not necessarily a nomination of executors. But, then, we are to read the codicil along with the mutual settlement as one testamentary deed, and taking the two together, I arrive at the same conclusion as your Lordships.

In the mutual disposition and settlement the deceased, who for the purpose of the present question is to be treated as a testator dealing with his own estate, appoints his wife to be his sole trustee and executor. Now, if in the codicil he had appointed certain other persons to be trustees along with his wife, making no mention of the office of executor, there might have been very fair ground for maintaining that he did not thereby intend to give them any active title to ingather the estate, or to conjoin them with his wife in her office of executor, but that he intended merely that after the estate had been ingathered by his executor, they should be conjoined with her in the separate office of trustees. But that is not the way in which the settlement is expressed. Its terms are,—“I appoint my wife to be my trustee and executor”; and in the codicil “I appoint A, B, and C to manage my estate along with my wife.” It appears to me that the natural construction of these words is what your Lordship has put upon them, and that the testator intended these trustees to take part, with his wife, in the management of his estate from the beginning, and did not intend to make any distinction between one act of management and another,—that is to say, he intended them to be executors as well as trustees.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and of the Sheriff, and found that the appellants Robert James Ferguson and others, trustees of the deceased Captain James Christal Ferguson, were entitled to be decerned executors-nominate of the said deceased Captain James Christal Ferguson, and decerned; and remitted to the Sheriff to decern them executors-nominate, and to refuse the petition at the instance of Mrs Ferguson's curator bonis.

Bruce v. Leisk.

J. W. BRUCE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—A. J. Young—A. S. D. Thomson.
DAVID D. LEISK, Defender (Respondent).—Comrie Thomson—Saltcen.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Malice—Statements regarding candidate for municipal election.—In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that in the course of a municipal election, in which he had been a candidate, the defender, who was an elector, had, in order to influence electors to vote against him, falsely and calumniously stated that the pursuer had been bankrupt, and that he had made a very bad failure, meaning thereby that it was dishonest and disreputable failure, and that his creditors had received only 1s. 6d. per £, and that the pursuer was, in consequence, an unsuitable person to represent the electors.

Held (1) that the words alleged to have been used by the defender might reasonably bear the innuendo put upon them, but (2) that assuming that they did so, the pursuer's statement shewed that the defender was privileged in using them, and that as malice was not averred, the action fell to be dismissed.

1st Division.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

JOHN WILSON BRUCE, accountant in Glasgow, and resident in Hillhead, brought an action of damages for slander against David D. Leisk, warehouseman in Glasgow, also residing in Hillhead.

The pursuer averred,—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer is an accountant in Glasgow, and resident in Hillhead, of which he has been a police commissioner since the year 1889. He is at present a bailie of said burgh, having been elected in November 1890. The defender is a warehouseman in Glasgow, and resides in said burgh, and has taken considerable interest in the election of police commissioners for said burgh, and in the question of annexation to the city of Glasgow. The sequestration referred to in answer was never gazetted and it was recalled. The pursuer was not insolvent, and the defender knew or had the means of knowing that the sequestration was recalled immediately after it was granted." The answer to this article referred to was,—(Ans. 1) "Denied that pursuer now a bailie. Quoad ultra admitted, subject to this explanation, that the pursuer's estates were sequestrated by warrant of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire on 14th March 1890, and in terms of the Bankruptcy Frauds and Disabilities Act, 1884, the pursuer became disqualified from holding the offices of commissioner and magistrate. Notwithstanding this, the pursuer continued to act in these capacities till the month of November 1891." (Cond. 2) "The City of Glasgow Act, 1891, provides for the annexation of the burgh of Hillhead to the city of Glasgow as at 1st November 1891. . . . At a public meeting of inhabitants of the burgh, which was held on 6th October 1891 within the Burgh Hall, H."

head, pursuer was nominated for election as a councillor for the city of Glasgow." (Cond. 3) "The defender has opposed the pursuer in the various elections of police commissioners, and at the meeting referred to in the previous article he and other ratepayers who were present opposed the nomination of the pursuer."

Bruce v. Leisk.

The pursuer stated further,—(Cond. 4) "In particular, the defender, in order to influence votes against the nomination of the pursuer, and also against his election, and to injure his credit, reputation, and feelings, has, since the date of said meeting—namely, during the month of October—stated at various places within the said burgh, to various ratepayers therein, that the pursuer had been bankrupt as a grocer, that he had made a very bad failure—meaning thereby that it was a dishonest and disreputable failure—and that his creditors had received only 1s. 6d. per £, and that the pursuer was in consequence an unsuitable person to represent the electors in the council of Glasgow, or used other words of similar meaning and effect."

Two specific occasions having been condescended upon on which the alleged statements had been made, the pursuer then averred,—(Cond. 6) "These statements are absolutely false and calumnious, and were intended to injure, and have injured, the pursuer in his reputation and feelings, both as a public and private individual, and as a professional man in the said city of Glasgow, and particularly said statements were intended to prejudice, and did prejudice, the candidature of the pursuer as a councillor for the extended city of Glasgow, and have influenced a number of electors who would otherwise have been friendly to and supported the candidature of the pursuer, and the pursuer will be put to the expense of a contest, which otherwise he avers would have been avoided, in respect that only the requisite number of representatives would have been nominated at said public meeting of ratepayers. Said statements have further grievously hurt pursuer's feelings, and have tarnished his reputation as an honest and upright citizen, and as a professional accountant in the said city of Glasgow."

The defender admitted that he was opposed to the pursuer's return, and that he had had conversations as to the fitness of the pursuer for election with the two persons specified, one of whom was, as he was himself, a member of the ward committee appointed by the ratepayers to recommend suitable candidates for election, and the other of whom was himself a candidate, and that he had asked the latter at a meeting of the ward committee, at which he was present, whether he had heard the rumour. The defender admitted that he had said to the former of these, in answer to a question by him, that he had heard rumours that the pursuer had been a grocer and had failed, and had paid 1s. 6d. per £ to his creditors. He had now ascertained that the rumour was unfounded, and he unreservedly withdrew and expressed regret for what he had said.

The defender pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (3) Separatim, The statements complained of being privileged, the defender is entitled to absolvitor.

The proposed issues were whether on a day and at a place specified the defender did falsely and calumniously state to the persons named "that the pursuer had been bankrupt as a grocer, that he had made a very bad failure—meaning, thereby, that it was a dishonest and disreputable failure—and that his creditors had received only 1s. 6d. per £, and that the pursuer was, in consequence, an unsuitable person to represent the electors in the council of Glasgow, or did use words of a like import and effect of and concerning the pursuer," to his loss, injury, and damage.

No. 97. The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling), on 12th January 1892, found that the summons did not disclose any issuable matter, disallowed the issues, and dismissed the action.*
 Feb. 20, 1892. Bruce v. Leisak.
 The pursuer reclaimed.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has considered the argument in this case as relating to two separate points. The first is whether the innuendo put upon the words said to have been used is such as the words will support, that is, whether the record as framed entitles the pursuer to say that the construction he puts upon the language in the innuendo may be reasonably ascribed to it, and that he will satisfy a jury that this is so. In my opinion the record is somewhat bald upon this point. The primary meaning of the language used I should have taken to be, not that the failure was dishonest and disreputable, but that it was bad, inasmuch as only 1s. 6d. in the £ has been paid. At the same time I am not prepared to differ from the Lord Ordinary upon that matter, and although there is an absence of circumstantial statement of the surrounding facts which are said to have invested the language used with a meaning more invidious than primarily belongs to it, yet I think it might be going too far to exclude the pursuer from his right of action if he has a case otherwise.

The second question is one of more importance. It is whether, having regard to the occasions on which the words complained of are said by the pursuer him-

* "NOTE.—The defender objected to the issues proposed by the pursuer on two grounds—(1) that the words used were not capable of bearing the innuendo sought to be put upon them; and (2) that the defender having been a voter in the municipal election for which the pursuer was a candidate, he was privileged in making the statement complained of, and the word 'maliciously' must enter the issues. I am against the defender on the first of these grounds, because I think the innuendo conveys a possible meaning of the words used, although it may not be their obvious or primary meaning. But his second objection seems to me well founded. The pursuer admits in cond. 3 that the defender was an elector in the ward for which he (the pursuer) was standing, and he does not expressly deny that the defender was a member of the ward committee appointed at a meeting of ratepayers to recommend suitable candidates. Even if he were only an elector, it seems to me that there is disclosed on record a case of privilege, and that the pursuer must prove malice. It is contrary to public policy that electors should not have considerable latitude in discussing the qualifications of those who solicit their suffrages, and, so long as they do not speak maliciously, I think they ought to be protected. In the recent case of Anderson v. Hunter, 18 R. 467, which related to a county council election, and in which an allegation of impending bankruptcy was the point of the slander, it was held that there was no privilege where the defender was not an elector in the division for which the pursuer was standing, but the opinions of the Judges, I think, clearly imply that if the defender had been an elector, the decision would have been otherwise. I gave the pursuer an opportunity of considering whether he should offer to amend the record by adding an averment of malice, but he intimated that he did not desire to do so, and I have therefore dismissed the action."

self to have been used, they can found a claim of damage, even assuming them to bear the more invidious sense which the pursuer promises to infuse into them, without an allegation of malice. When I examine the record, I think the pursuer has been very candid and anxious to possess the Court very fully with the idea that, each time the defender spoke of him, he, the defender, was taking part in an election of a candidate for a councillorship in Glasgow. What he states to that effect is consecutive, deliberative, and, in some cases, emphatic. Indeed a better record for connecting the language used with the fulfilment of a public duty could hardly have been desired by the defender. The defence is that on the face of the pursuer's record there is a privileged occasion of speaking, and that the circumstances disclosed on record are such that malice is not implied, as it would be in circumstances which were devoid of the elements of privilege. The statements were made during an election by a person legitimately interested in the election, at places within the burgh, and to persons who, like himself, were charged with the responsibility of electing a councillor; and the sum of the defender's statement is alleged to be that the pursuer was an unsuitable person to be elected. The question is whether, the defender being so placed, by the averments of the pursuer, in the discharge of a public duty, the statements which he made were or were not germane, pertinent, and relevant to the question whether the pursuer was or was not a person who should be elected to the vacant office.

The statements complained of are that the pursuer has been bankrupt as a grocer, that he has made a very bad failure—meaning, thereby, that it was a dishonest and disreputable failure—and that his creditors received only 1s. 6d. per £. Now, can it be said that those are not matters, I will not say relevant, but, at all events, which may legitimately be deemed relevant to the election of a councillor? The topics which arise upon them are, of course, obvious. It may well be said that a man who has been bankrupt once may become bankrupt again; at all events, that if a person who has not been bankrupt were standing, he was more eligible than a person who had been. It may be said, also, that the facts indicate a want of success in business not encouraging to electors asked to entrust a man with their business; and when we come to the most invidious part of the statement—that it was a dishonest and disreputable failure—that would seem to be highly relevant to the question whether, the office vacant being an office of trust and high public responsibility, the choice of the electors would fitly fall upon a person who had gone through these vicissitudes. I must answer these questions in favour of the defender. I think that when electors are considering, as the defender is asserted by the pursuer to have been, with laudable interest, who shall be elected, they are quite entitled to state to other people, similarly concerned, what they know, or believe they know, upon the delicate subjects which are then mentioned. That the statements are ~~injurious and invidious~~ is quite true; but then, unfortunately, that brings us, perhaps, the more sharply into the region of relevancy, and into the region also of the duty of an elector to give due weight to them, and to communicate them to others whom he is legitimately seeking to influence. I will add that I do not think that should your Lordships agree with me we should thereby be giving any unlimited licence to slander during an election. We do not lay it down that anybody is entitled to say anything against a candidate. Our decision is merely that the occasion of speaking being what it was, and the thing said what it was, there is no presumption in law that there was malice. If this pursuer had not declined to allege malice his action would have lain. Whether, in other cases, action would lie must depend entirely upon whether there is an occasion for the discharge of a public duty set out in the record such as there is here, and also whether the subject-matter of the alleged slander is so germane to the question of fitness for election as common-sense pronounces this to be, and as is plainly implied in the Statute of 1884; because although the Statute of 1884 (Bankruptcy Frauds and Disabilities (Scotland) Act, 1884, 47 and 48 Vict. c. 16) did not make a past condition of bankruptcy a ground of disqualification, yet at the same time it very plainly points out that the condition of bankruptcy, however that condition may have been brought about, is not one which is consistent with the proper discharge of the duties of a public representative. As I have said, I think one of the reasons why the question of a man's bankruptcy is relevant in circumstances like the present is, that once a thing of that kind happens, it, in human experience, is apt to recur; and, accordingly, an elector who discusses that subject may fairly be influenced by regard to the undesirableness of the constituency having on their hands a member whose possible relapse into bankruptcy would necessitate a fresh election.

Upon these grounds I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is sound, and ought to be affirmed.

LORD ADAM.—The Lord Ordinary has disposed of two points,—(1) whether the words used will bear the innuendo sought to be put upon them, and (2) whether, assuming that they do, the pursuer is entitled to an issue without the insertion of malice in it.

Upon the first point, it is not for us to construe the language complained of. That is a matter for the jury. But it is for us to say whether or not it will bear the innuendo proposed to be put upon it. The Lord Ordinary says that he is against the defender, because he thinks "the innuendo conveys a possible meaning of the words used." If his Lordship had said "a reasonable meaning," I think he would have employed a more correct term. I do not understand the defender to dispute that if the language used had stopped with the word that the pursuer had made a very bad failure, they might not have implied that the failure had been dishonest. But the argument is that the words bear their own glossary, and it is contended by the defender that the additional statement that the pursuer's creditors had received only 1s. 6d. in the £1, explains and discloses the meaning to be attached to the first part of the language. I do not say that if it were my duty to construe the language I would not come to agree with the defender, but I think that the question is one which might fairly be sent to a jury.

Upon the second point, as to whether the statement was in the circumstances privileged, I think the word "privilege" is a very elastic term. There are many kinds and descriptions of privilege. There is the privilege of a Member of Parliament, and of Judges and counsel in the conduct of a case, which is absolute. There are other cases of privilege which require proof, not only of malice, but also of want of probable cause. There are others again, perhaps of lesser degree which require not only that malice shall be averred, but also that special facts and circumstances inferring malice shall be set forth in the condescendence. The present case is different from all these. The pursuer, standing for an important public office, for which he had been nominated at a meeting of the inhabitants of Hillhead, where it is not disputed that the defender is a ratepayer and an elector. The question we have to consider is whether an elector has a right and privilege to state to other electors, or to another elector, what is germane to the election, and what he believes at the time to be true? If it is not already implied in the judgment in the case of Anderson ~~No. 97.~~

 that where a candidate is standing for an important public office, one of the disagreeable incidents of it which he has to face from the electors is such language as is here complained of, I have no difficulty in laying this down now. If it is alleged that the statement was made maliciously, then he will have an action, but not otherwise. I think the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. If I were construing for myself the words ascribed to the defender I might not be disposed to put the innuendo upon them alleged by the pursuer, namely, that his bankruptcy had been bad because dishonest and disreputable. But if a jury, having heard the defender examined in the witness-box, and being informed of all the circumstances in which the language was used, had found that the words had been used in that sense, I should not be prepared to hold that it was such an unreasonable verdict that we should set it aside. I therefore think the Lord Ordinary was right in allowing the pursuer to prove that the words were used with the meaning alleged if he chooses to take upon him so heavy a burden.

But then I agree with his Lordship in thinking that the occasion was privileged, and that the pursuer would not be entitled to damages unless he proved malice. The pursuer's own statement is that when the words of which he complains were uttered the defender was engaged in the exercise of a public right, with a view to the performance of a public duty. If the defender was not acting in the honest discharge of a public duty, but from some indirect motive for the purpose of injuring the pursuer, or even if, although he had no personal ill-will towards the pursuer, he had taken up some unfounded notion about the pursuer's conduct, without any reasonable ground, and spread abroad an injurious report against him, recklessly and without any concern for his neighbour's good name, the pursuer might have had a good ground of action, whether the occasion was privileged or not, because he would then have been in a position to aver malice, and the jury would have been required to say whether the defender was speaking honestly in the exercise of a public right, or whether he was maliciously slandering the pursuer. But that is just the question which the pursuer declines to put to the jury. If he had been prepared to prove malice he might have had an issue; but when he declines to aver malice, he says, in effect, that the defender's statements, although false in fact, were not malicious or false in the knowledge of the defender, but such as a man with reasonable regard for his neighbour might have made, and that he did not make them for the purpose of injuring anybody, or from any indirect motive, but only for the purpose of influencing the electors by considerations which it was proper for them to take into account; and, since that is the true import of his averment, he is not entitled to an issue.

LORD McLAREN was absent.

Feb. 23, 1892.
Lang's Trustee v. Steele.

ROBERT STEELE AND OTHERS, Respondents (Appellants).—Watt.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Meeting of creditors—Notice to trustee—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 98.—The Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 98, enacts that "any commissioner, with notice to the trustee, may at any time call a meeting of the creditors."

On 26th October one of the commissioners in a sequestration sent a notice to the Gazette calling a meeting of the creditors. The Gazette containing the notice was published on 27th October between 6 and 7 P.M. On the afternoon of the 27th October the commissioner sent a notice of the meeting to the trustee, but this notice was not delivered to the trustee till 10 A.M. on the 28th, in consequence of its being contained in a registered letter, which could not be delivered after business hours on the 27th, the trustee's office being then shut.

In an appeal by the trustee against a resolution passed at the meeting, held that due notice had not been given to the trustee, and therefore that the meeting had not been duly called.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

ON 18th November 1891 David Strathie, C.A., Glasgow, trustee on the sequestrated estates of R. S. Lang, manufacturer, Glasgow, appealed to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire against a resolution of the creditors in the sequestration removing him from office.

The ground of the appeal was that there had not been due notice to the appellant, as trustee, of the meeting of creditors at which the resolution appealed against was carried.*

The facts regarding the notice were thus stated by the Sheriff-substitute in his note,—“In the present case one of the commissioners sent to the Gazette a notice, dated 26th October, to be published in the Gazette on 27th October, calling a meeting for 4th November. The Gazette was published on the 27th between 6 and 7 P.M. On the afternoon of the 27th, the same commissioner sent, by registered letter, a notice to the trustee, addressed to his place of business. It was not delivered till 10 A.M. on the 28th, as, being registered, it could not be delivered after business hours on the 27th, the trustee's office being then shut.”

On 9th December the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) recalled the resolution complained of.

Robert Steele and certain other creditors appealed to the Court of Session.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—The 98th section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 entitles a commissioner to call a meeting of the creditors, but that power is qualified by the words, “with notice to the trustee.” I take it as quite clear that these words qualify the word “call,” so as to make it a good call if it is a call with notice, and a bad one if without notice. We have been told that the calling of the meeting in the present case was by a notice in the Gazette, and the question before us is, whether that calling took place with notice to the trustee, or without such notice. The Gazette containing the notice was published on the evening of the 27th of October, and the trustee did not de facto receive notice

* The Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 74, enacts that a majority of creditors present at any meeting duly called for the purpose may remove a trustee. Section 98 provides that,—“Any commissioner, with notice to the trustee, may at any time call a meeting of the creditors.”

notice in the Gazette, and it seems to me impossible to hold that such a notice Lang's Trust-tee v. Steele.
can have a retrospective effect so as to rehabilitate the Gazette notice. It was said however, that means were taken to give the trustee notice upon the evening of the 27th. At best that was only giving him notice at the same time as the notice appeared in the Gazette. But what were the means taken to apprise the trustee of what was going to appear in the Gazette? A registered letter was despatched upon the afternoon of the 27th, to be delivered into the hands of Mr Strathie, himself if he could be found, or into the hands of someone who had his authority to receive such letters for him, but if neither Strathie himself nor someone authorised by him could be found, delivery would necessarily be delayed until the following day. That is the meaning of registering a letter.
It does not necessarily mean delivery at the earliest date at which ordinary letters are delivered. Its object is to ensure that the delivery should be personal, which may render a postponement of delivery possible. De facto, then, the trustee did not receive notice until the 28th, and that will not suffice to validate the Gazette notice.

Mr Watt argued that we should decide the matter upon the documents before us. Well the Sheriff-substitute sets out in a distinct narrative that the letter
"could not be delivered after business hours on the 27th, the trustee's office being then shut." I take it that when the postman came to the office it was after business hours, when the trustee might reasonably be expected to be away. No offer was made to displace that fact by evidence, and indeed I doubt if any evidence would suffice to make up for the commissioner not giving notice before the appearance of the notice in the Gazette.

I am of opinion that we should dismiss the appeal.

LORD ADAM.—The question here depends upon the construction of the 98th section of the Bankruptcy Act, which provides that "any commissioner, with notice to the trustee, may at any time call a meeting of the creditors." In this case one of the commissioners on a sequestrated estate called such a meeting, and gave notice to the trustee, but the question is, whether that notice was given in time? As matter of fact the Gazette notice appeared upon the evening of the 27th of October, and it is admitted that in point of fact notice to the trustee did not reach him until the next morning. Therefore, if there is nothing to make this case exceptional, it is clear that the notice to the trustee was given after the publication of the Gazette—that is, after the calling of the meeting—and was accordingly bad. The question of whether the calling of the meeting simultaneously with giving notice to the trustee is effectual was raised in the case of M'Farlyean to which we were referred. But a trustee's receiving notice at the very moment of the publication of the Gazette is so unlikely to occur, that I think the consideration of such a possibility would be unprofitable discussion. In any case, notice to the trustee must not be after publication of the Gazette. It will be time enough to consider the question of simultaneity when it occurs. Here the notice was given after the Gazette notice appeared, and that, I think, is sufficient for the decision of this case.

But then it was said that although the actual delivery of the letter containing the notice was not until the 28th, that was owing to the trustee's own actings, and it was said that if the trustee had happened to be at his office when the

No. 98. registered letter was brought, the notice would probably have been in time. The facts however were different. The effect of registering the letter was to make it necessary that it should be delivered to him personally, and as he had left his office that was postponed. There was nothing here unusual in the actings of the trustee. Had the letter been brought at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and the office had then been found shut, it might have made a difference. There was no such case here, and I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lang's Trustee v. Steele.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam that the Act cannot mean that notice is to be given to the trustee simultaneously with notice to the world, and that was never seriously suggested in the argument or in the previous case. The only thing there suggested was that notice might have been sufficient if given at the same time as the publication of the Gazette, and that if it so happened that might be enough. I thought at the time that there was a great deal to be said in support of the stricter view expressed by Lord Young and Lord Craighill, to the effect that that would not be enough, but that notice to the trustee must precede the notice calling the meeting. It is not necessary to consider that question here, and it is enough to say that the notice to the trustee must not be later than that calling the meeting. The fact here is that the meeting was called by a notice in the Gazette upon the 27th, and the notice was not given to the trustee until the 28th, therefore the notice to the trustee was later than that calling the meeting. It was said that the failure to give timeous notice was owing to the absence of the trustee from his place of business. I think we cannot give effect to that view,—implying that it is the duty of a man of business to be at his office at all hours. Where the duty of giving notice is sufficiently discharged by sending a letter through the post, it may be enough if the letter is addressed to the office of the person receiving the notice, without the necessity of proving that the addressee was at home, or did not receive it through failure to open his letters. But here the precaution was taken of sending a registered letter, to be delivered only to the addressee personally, with the inevitable consequence that if it was after business hours delivery would be postponed until next morning. I concur in thinking the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

Bryan v. Butters

Loan—Partnership—Power of partner to borrow money—Proof—Writ.—A partner of a mercantile firm borrowed, as for his firm, a sum of £100 from his wife. She requested an acknowledgment from the firm, and, in compliance with that request, he handed her an acknowledgment which bore that the money had been received from her by the hands of her husband "on temporary loan." The acknowledgment was written by a clerk of the firm and was signed by their cashier pp. of the firm. It was proved that the cashier had so signed on the verbal instructions of the husband; that the money was paid to the cashier and put to the credit of the husband in the books of the firm. In an action by the wife against the firm for repayment of the loan, held (1) that the husband, as partner of a mercantile firm, had power to borrow money and to bind the firm for the debt; (2) that the writ having been signed by the cashier on the instruction of such a partner was writ of the firm; and (3) might be used in modum probationis, although it was neither holograph nor tested, and that therefore the loan to the firm had been established,—diss. Lord Young, who was of opinion that the document could not be received as proof of the loan, being neither holograph nor tested; and that a partner of a firm had no power to grant procuration to any person to bind the firm, and had no power to borrow money except for mercantile purposes, whereas the circumstances shewed that this money had not been applied to the mercantile purposes of the firm.

Butters
Brothers & Co.

MR J. W. F. BRYAN was a partner of the firm of Butters Brothers & Company, contractors, engineers, and machinery merchants, Glasgow. On 29th October 1886 Mr Bryan borrowed £100 from his wife. He stated that it was borrowed for the firm, and in lending it the wife stipulated that she should get a receipt from the firm. The same evening Mr Bryan brought his wife an acknowledgment in these terms, viz.:—"Received from Mrs J. W. F. Bryan, by the hands of Mr J. W. F. Bryan, the sum of one hundred pounds sterling (£100), on temporary loan, for which we are obliged. pp. BUTTERS BROS. JOHN GIBSON." The body of this receipt was in the handwriting of a clerk of the firm. Mr Gibson, who signed it, was cashier to the firm. Mrs Bryan kept this acknowledgment, and for three and a-half years she received interest on the sum by the hands of her husband.

2^D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

Mr Bryan deserted his wife, and left the country. She raised an action against the firm for payment of £100. She pleaded;—(1) The sum sued for having been advanced by the pursuer out of her own proper funds and estate, and not having been repaid to her, or to anyone authorised by her, is still due and resting owing by the defenders to her, and she is entitled to decree as concluded for, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The alleged loan can only be proved by writ or oath of the defenders. (4) The said receipt, having been ultra vires of Mr Gibson, does not bind the firm to any creditor other than the true creditor, as appears in their books.

A proof was led. Mr Butters, the leading partner of the firm deponed,—"I understand Mr Bryan handed the £100 to Mr Gibson, who applied it, I suppose, in the usual way for the firm's purposes. Mr Gibson informed me that Mr Bryan had got the money back. The firm were not exactly in difficulties at the time the money was handed to Mr Gibson, but we were verging on difficulties. . . . Mr Gibson was our cashier, and he is my cashier still. He had a power of procuration for the bank. . . . Cross.—I never authorised Mr Bryan to borrow money for the firm's purposes. I never gave Mr Gibson authority to do so either. I was not aware that either of them had ever done so until this question was raised; the letter from Mrs Bryan's agents was the first I knew about it. I never heard of any interest being paid to Mrs Bryan. I did not give any authority for interest to be paid; and we never paid interest as a firm. The books do not contain any entries of the payment of interest. I cannot tell what was done with the £100 when it was received, but I suppose Mr Gibson would put it in the bank in the usual way. That was all that I meant when I said it was used for the firm's purposes."

Mr Gibson deponed,—"Mr Bryan brought the £100 to me on the date it is entered in the cash-book—29th October 1886. He told me to put it to the credit of his private account, not to the credit of the firm. He made the clerk write out a receipt for the money, and he asked me to sign it for the firm. He said he had got the money from his wife for a short time. . . . Mr Bryan assisted his uncle, Mr Butters, in con-

No. 99. nection with the outside department of the business, and he also assisted me in the financial and commercial management. . . . All that appears on 29th October 1886 is, that £100 was put to the credit of Mr Bryan's private account with the firm. On 5th November he drew out £100, which he told me was to repay Mrs Bryan, and I debited his private account with that sum on that date."

Bryan v.
Butters
Brothers & Co.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 18th June, gave decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—The facts of this case do not present any difficulty. The pursuer is the wife of a late partner of the defenders' firm, and on 29th October 1886 she lent to her husband, out of her separate funds, as she understood for the firm's purposes, a sum of £100, stipulating that she should receive in exchange the firm's acknowledgment of the loan. I have no doubt of the pursuer's good faith, and that the account which she gives of the transaction is entirely true. Her husband took the money to the cashier of the firm, and it was paid into the firm's bank account, and applied to the firm's purposes; and, acting on the husband's instructions, the cashier, who appears to have had the charge of the firm's financial transactions, granted to the pursuer the acknowledgment which is quoted in the record. This acknowledgment was written out by a clerk, signed by the cashier, booked in the firm's private letter book, and delivered through her husband to the pursuer. The money, however, although applied to the firm's purposes was, it now appears, put to the credit of the pursuer's husband in the books of the firm; and it is said that he shortly afterwards drew it out, and that the firm is now dissolved, and that there is no sum now to his credit in the firm's books.

"In these circumstances the pursuer sues the firm and the remaining partner (her husband and she having apparently separated) for repayment of the loan; and, as I indicated at the close of the proof, I have no doubt of her right to recover, provided the loan is proved by competent evidence. That is to say, I hold it to be sufficiently clear that it was within the authority of the husband as a partner of the defenders' firm, if not also within the authority of the firm's cashier, to borrow money on the firm's credit, and that the credit of the firm was in fact pledged by both of those parties for the amount of the loan. I have delayed, however, disposing of the case, because of the averment and plea by the defender, to the effect that the acknowledgment produced is neither signed nor tested, and that, therefore, the alleged loan is not instructed by legal evidence.

"The question thus raised appeared to me to require a careful examination of the authorities—the point being sharply taken that the loan of money, according to our law, cannot be proved except by a probative writing, unless—which is not the case here—the transaction falls within the exception of res mercatorie.

"The result has been to satisfy me not only that the contract of loan, like other consensual contracts, may be constituted without writing,—in other words that writing is not required as matter of solemnity,—but also that where writing is required not as matter of solemnity but only by way of proof, the writing need not be probative, but is sufficient if it be shewn to be genuine.

"On principle, I confess I should not have much doubt that this must be the law. The question depends after all upon the construction of the old Scotch statutes regulating the authentication of deeds; and these statutes, in my opinion, relate not to writings produced in modum probationis, but only to operative writings—writings founded on as constituting a title or constituting an obligation. An improbativ obligation, at least if within the class to which the statutes apply, is no doubt inoperative,—that is to say, it cannot (except in mercatoria or where there is rei interventus) form the substantive vinculum which action may be raised. Possibly also—although the distinctions here run into subtlety—an improbativ obligation cannot be received even in evidence of an antecedent obligation lying behind it; and such antecedent obligation must require to be proved by competent evidence aliunde. But while that is the

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—A partner had no implied power to borrow, and, at all events, could only do so in matters connected with law with respect to obligatory writings, I can find nothing in the statutes or in the principles of our law of evidence to require that all writings put in evidence shall be per se probative. The constitution of obligations is one thing. Their proof is another; and where—as in the case of loan—the obligation may be constituted verbally, and may be proved either by writ or by oath, it would require, I think, some positive rule of law to make more necessary than that the writ, if writ is adduced, shall be genuine.

“An examination of the authorities leads, I think, to the same result. There are, no doubt, some dicta to be found in the books which are incautiously expressed and have given rise to misapprehension. But certain points are established by decisions which are, I think, quite conclusive of the principle. Thus, it is settled that in the proof of trust (where by statute writ or oath is necessary) any writ of the truster proved to be genuine is sufficient.—Bell’s Principles, 1995; Bathie v. Wharnclyffe, 11 Macph. 490, 45 Scot. Jur. 318; Thoms v. Thoms, 6 Macph. 174, 40 Scot. Jur. 99; Ross v. Fidler, 24th Nov. 1809, F. C.; Fraser v. Bruce, 20 D. 115, 30 Scot. Jur. 70; McLaren v. Hovie, 8 Macph. 106, 42 Scot. Jur. 32. So, in the case of leases and other contracts relative to land, where there has been rei interventus, and writing is only required by way of proof, the writ requisite may be any genuine writing, and may even be a writing which is not subscribed. So also in the case of acknowledgments of the receipt of money paid, and in the case of acknowledgments granted to rebut the presumptions arising on bills of exchange.

“These are all cases, I think, quite in pari casu with loan. But even in the case of loan itself the authorities are numerous—Ersk. iv. 2, 4. Thus entries in a debtor’s books, although in the handwriting of a clerk, have been held sufficient. So also have indorsations or signatures appended to accounts, e.g. in the books of a bank. So also, at least in some cases, have writings in the handwriting of the creditor but found in the debtor’s possession, and so dealt with as to be constructively the debtor’s writ. In all these cases loan of money has been held sufficiently instructed by improbativ writings.

“The only decision the other way which was cited, or which I have been able to discover, is that of Stewart v. Syme, 12th December 1815, F.C., which is said to derive importance from being referred to without disapproval by the present Lord President in the case of Haldane v. Speirs, 10 Macph. 539, 44 Scot. Jur. 305. I am bound to say that I think the judgment in that case does appear to require explanation, but the case was one of a rather special character, arising on a bill of exchange, and where the acknowledgment of indebtedness founded on was not only not probative, but was, as the Court held, not sufficiently connected with the bill to which it was sought to be applied. I cannot think that this case is an authority for the proposition that loan must always be proved by a probative writ; and I am satisfied that in citing the case, which he did for another purpose, the Lord President did not intend to affirm that proposition.

“Therefore, both on principle and authority, I think an acknowledgment proved to be the writ of the debtor is sufficient evidence of the loan, and it may be proper to observe that in the case of loan there is this additional consideration. It is elementary law that even where writing is required by way of solemnity, the solemnities of execution are dispensed with where the circumstances exclude locus penitentiæ. In other words, where there has been rei interventus, an improbativ obligation is as good as one that is probative. And if this be so—and it is not disputed—I confess I do not see how any question as to the statutory solemnities can arise under the contract of loan, where, from the nature of the case, there can be no locus penitentiæ, or, to put it otherwise, where there must always be rei interventus. Having borrowed money, you cannot—money having passed—resile from your contract; or if you do resile you can only do so on the footing of restoring matters, which just means repayment of the money. I do not speak of contracts to make a loan or to take a loan. There writing is probably required as a matter of solemnity, and there being no rei interventus the

No. 99. the business of the firm.¹ Still less had a partner power to grant procuration to another to sign for the firm, unless that were specially conferred on him by the firm. Delegatus non potest delegare. There was no pretence that any such special authority had been granted to Bryan here; hence Gibson had no authority to bind the firm by signing the acknowledgment in question. But, in any event, a writ to prove loan must be either holograph or tested,² unless it were in re mercatoria, which this transaction was not.³ The rule applied not merely to obligatory writs, but to any writs used for the purpose of proving loan.⁴ Entries in books had indeed been admitted as sufficient evidence, but that was as being in re mercatoria.

Argued for the pursuer;—The rule as to writ or oath was not statutory, but a rule of the common law.⁵ All that it meant was that written evidence was required. Entries in books would suffice.⁶ Receipts were not in practice either holograph or tested, but to hold that on that account they could not be admitted as writ of the granter would be monstrous.⁷ It must always be kept in view that the pursuer did not sue on this acknowledgment as on a bond; she sued on the fact of money having been advanced, and produced the acknowledgment as evidence. That distinction rendered it unnecessary to comply with the statutes as to authentication of writs as matter of solemnity.⁸ A partner in a trading firm had power to bind his firm for money borrowed;⁹ nor did it matter whether the money was applied for the purposes of the firm or not in a question with the lender, however important that might be inter socios.¹⁰ How could a lender find out what became of the money he lent to the firm? What right had he to inquire? The cashier signed as the agent of the firm on the direct instructions of a partner, who had power to borrow and to bind the firm.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case relates to a small matter, but the questions involved are of considerable importance. The pursuer demands repayment of a sum of £100, which she alleges she lent to the defenders, and in proof of this alleged advance she produces an acknowledgment in these terms, viz:—
“Received from Mrs J. W. F. Bryan, by the hands of Mr J. W. F. Bryan, the sum of one hundred pounds sterling (£100), on temporary loan, for which we are obliged. pp. BUTTERS BROS. JOHN GIBSON.”

writing probably must be probative. But in the case of an obligation granted as here in exchange for money borrowed, I do not at present see how any question of the improbateness of the document of debt can well arise.”

The Gibson who signed this receipt, bearing to be by procuration for the firm, No. 99. was the cashier of the defenders' firm. The question is whether the pursuer can by this document prove the debt to be due. For it is, of course, clear that a debt for borrowed money can only be proved by the writ or oath of the alleged debtor. The document is neither holograph nor tested, nor does it bear the signature of any member of the defenders' firm. The questions, therefore, are (1) whether such a document can be used in modum probationis to establish a loan; and (2) whether this document has been established habili modo to have been granted for the firm by the authority of the firm, and therefore to be an acknowledgment of debt on which the pursuer can sue.

Feb. 23, 1892.
Bryan v.
Butters
Brothers & Co.

I am of opinion that both of these questions must be answered in the affirmative.

The facts are within small compass. Bryan, the partner, borrowed the money from his wife for the firm, delivered it to the cashier, Gibson, and directed Gibson to make out and sign as per procuration the acknowledgment which he delivered to his wife. If, then, Bryan had an express or implied mandate to borrow for his firm, there can be no doubt that the defenders received the amount of the loan through Bryan, who borrowed for them, and Gibson, who received the money and gave the acknowledgment. For there can be no doubt that, if the money was received on loan, the partner who got it on loan ordered Gibson to acknowledge the loan as for the firm. Now, here I cannot doubt that Bryan, as a partner of a mercantile trading firm, did have an implied mandate to borrow money and to bind the firm for it. It is, I think, settled law that a partner can bind his firm in such circumstances. If Bryan himself had granted the acknowledgment it seems clear that that would have been conclusive. If a partner of a firm asks for a loan of cash for his firm, and obtains such loan, the lender is entitled to rely on his acknowledgment for the firm. It is a circumstance to be noted that this lady would not have lent the money on her husband's acknowledgment. She says in her evidence,—“I made the loan to the firm of Butters Brothers, and not to my husband. He asked it for the firm, and I expressly stipulated that he should bring the firm's acknowledgment for the money, and he did so the same evening.” But if Mr Bryan could bind his firm by his own writ, could he not equally do so by giving orders to the cashier of the firm to sign for the firm the acknowledgment which was to be handed to the lender? I hold that he could.

But then it is said that the acknowledgment of the loan is not established by the document signed by Gibson, even if signed by procuration for the firm, because it is not holograph nor tested. I do not think that this contention is sound. The document is used in proof only of the existence of the loan. It is founded on as writ to prove the truth of the pursuer's allegation of subsisting loan, and that being so, I think, if it be shewn to be the writ of the defenders, it is not a good objection to its being used as a document of debt by the pursuer producing it from her custody as proof that the debt subsists, and is undischarged, to say that it is not holograph nor tested. I agree with the observations of the Lord Ordinary upon this point.

I have purposely avoided saying anything as to the facts spoken to in evidence as occurring after the £100 reached the coffers of the defenders, which they certainly did, as they were duly entered as cash received in the firm's cash-book. What was done afterwards with the money does not appear to me to affect the question. Bryan, the partner, borrowed the money for the firm from the lender,

No. 99. directed Gibson as the servant of the firm to sign the acknowledgment for the firm, and handed the money to him as the cashier of the firm. In these circumstances, it is in my opinion sufficiently established that the firm is liable to pay the sum claimed by the pursuer, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

Feb. 23, 1892.
Bryan v.
Butters
Brothers & Co.

LORD YOUNG.—As your Lordship has observed, this case is not in itself of any magnitude or considerable interest. Mr Bryan had a wife with money, and he got at least £100 of it from her; we do not know how much more. He was a knave, and in the end he deserted her, and we do not know what has become of him. He had an uncle as well as a wife, Mr Butters, who took him into partnership, and the question is, who is to be the sufferer as regards this £100, his uncle or his wife.

Nevertheless, the case raises legal questions of some importance and interest. After all the consideration I have been able to give it, and I have considered it over and over again, I have arrived at a conclusion different from that reached by the Lord Ordinary, your Lordship, and, I understand, Lord Trayner, so that the probability is large that what I fear has been an overconsideration of the questions raised has not been fruitful. But it is my duty to state the conclusions to which I have come.

The first point in the case regards the law of Scotland as to proof of the contract of loan, and involves a consideration of our law with respect to the formalities and the authentication of writs. On these matters our law is different from the law of England. Generally speaking, this is the rule, viz., that bargains, which are usually the subject of writing, cannot be proved by parole. In illustration of that general rule Stair and Erskine take as the most prominent instance a loan of money. Further, we have the rule that writings must be holograph or tested, unless again they fall under the well-known exceptional class of writs in re mercatoria. That is an elastic term, and is extended so as to cover cases where the operation of the general rule would, looking to the exigencies of business, and the despatch required in commercial matters, be altogether inconvenient and out of place.

But it is an important enough rule, carrying with it considerable safeguards protecting the public, i.e., the parties, from all risk of misunderstanding, and securing that important writs shall be deliberately executed.

That, then, is the rule, not confined to documents affecting landed property. It will apply to all contracts of importance, the test of importance being that the subject of them is above £100 Scots, not being mercantile contracts.

This contract is a pure and simple contract of loan of money, not incidental or connected with any mercantile contract. This is the document,—“Receive from Mrs J. W. F. Bryan, by the hands of Mr J. W. F. Bryan, the sum of one hundred pounds sterling (£100), on temporary loan, for which we are obliged to pp. BUTTERS BROS. JOHN GIBSON.” It is not suggested that Mrs Bryan had any mercantile dealings with the firm connected with their business as a company. She says she lent £100 to the company, and the case would have been the same if it had been £10,000. The loan might have been made in the same terms to another lady, or to a landed proprietor, or to anyone you like, totally unconnected with business. I ask this question, to what legal category does this writ belong? If it is anything at all it is a bond for borrowed money. In what respects—as regards its legal character—is it distinguished from a bond for borrowed money? What else is it? Now, does the law of Scotland No. 99.

 require a bond for borrowed money to be tested or holograph, or does it not? Feb. 23, 1892.
 Is there any authority for saying that such writings require no formalities? I Bryan v.
 I am of opinion, therefore, that this is not a bond for borrowed money; I mean Butters we cannot receive it as such, since it is not holograph or tested. It is out of Brothers & Co.
 the question to say that the exigencies of business, the necessary rapidity of mercantile transactions, required such an informal document in this case.
 There were no such exigencies here.

If we take the other view, as your Lordship does, then I think that there is an end to the rule of law that writings, not connected with mercantile transactions, shall be in a certain form, that rule being a wholesome and useful rule for the protection of parties.

But the document, such as it is, is not signed by the alleged borrower. It is said that it is signed per procuracionem of the alleged borrower. Let me put aside for a moment the feature that this is a partnership question. You have a bond for £100, £1000, £10,000, £100,000—the amount is indifferent—signed per procuracionem, and no procuration produced. Now, I do not think that the law of Scotland permits that. It would require a carefully prepared mandate or authority to authorise one man to give a bond for borrowed money for another.

I now proceed to consider the question as to the power of a partner to grant a procuration to borrow money, or to borrow money himself so as to bind the firm. Is there any authority for saying that any partner may grant a procura-tion to anyone to sign for the firm? The firm may. Take the case of a young man just admitted as a partner of a large firm,—the most important firm in the country. Has he authority to grant procuration to anyone, a servant or a door-keeper, to sign for the firm? And he may do it verbally. May he? Is that a tenable proposition? What we have here is a cashier who had power from the firm to sign other documents, and who says,—“The partner, Mr Bryan, told me to put my name to this document, and I did it.” Is there any distinction because this Mr Gibson was the cashier? It would have been all the same if it had been anyone else you please, and it emphasises the matter that he had power to sign a different class of documents.

As regards the power of a partner to borrow money, I assent to the proposition that he has such a power, but with this important qualification that it must be in connection with the firm's business. One typical illustration is the power that a partner has of drawing bills on which money may be obtained by the everyday process of discounting. Another typical illustration is where money is obtained on the deposit of goods—not pawning, I do not mean that—but where goods are handed to an agent for sale, and he advances money on them. That is business, that is res mercatoria. I think it is stated somewhere¹ that a partner cannot borrow money to increase the capital of the firm. The money-lender there is not dealing with the company in a mercantile transaction.
 The whole company may do it, but one partner is not the authorised agent of the others to do so. The case that goes furthest in the direction of the company being liable for a loan to a partner was one about no larger a sum than £10.² There a partner of a London company, who was travelling the country

No. 99. buying goods for his company to sell in London, went to Manchester and bought goods from a producer there, which were to be sent to London, and a bill for the price was drawn on the company in London. But at the same time he said,—
Feb. 23, 1892. “I am short of money to take me back to London”—it was in the coaching days—“give me £10, and include that in your bill for the price of the goods.”
Bryan v. Lord Kenyon directed the jury that they, being commercial men, might, if they thought fit, consider this as incidental to the mercantile transaction. That goes further than any other case in the direction of making the company liable, but does it even approach this case? This is the case of a man going to his wife and saying “Lend me £100,” and I repeat it might have been £10,000, “and I shall lend it to my firm.” I think he had no authority to do that for behoof of the company.

The Lord Ordinary dwells on the fact that the money was put into the firm's bank account, and that the firm got it. But that is a fallacy. There is no evidence but that of the wife that Bryan got the money from his wife. It is proved that on that day he took £100 to the cashier, and told him to put it to his account. Mr Butters says,—“I understand Mr Bryan handed the £100 to Mr Gibson, who applied it, I suppose, in the usual way for the firm's purposes.” Mr Butters knew nothing of the matter till four years after, and then he got his information from Gibson. He adds,—“I cannot tell what was done with the £100 when it was received, but I suppose Mr Gibson would put it in the bank in the usual way. That was all that I meant when I said it was used for the firm's purposes.” The money was entered in the books of the firm as paid to the credit of Bryan's account. It is ridiculous to speak of that as applied to the company's purposes. The money was at Bryan's call, and in fact he took it out for his own purposes.

I am of opinion that the whole thing was a trick on the part of a knavish husband, and cannot make his uncle liable. He kept up the trick for three years and a-half, paying his wife interest. Then he absconded, and the truth came out.

I must again apologise for taking up so much time in stating the result of a not very fruitful consideration of the subject, that result being that the contract of loan to the company is not proved.

LORD TRAYNER.—The following facts have, in my opinion, been established in this case :—(1) That the pursuer's husband in October 1886 asked the pursuer to lend the defenders' firm (of which her husband was then a partner) the sum of £100; (2) that the pursuer, in compliance with the request addressed to her, gave her husband, out of her own private means and estate, the sum of £100 as a loan to his firm; (3) that the pursuer's husband in direct course handed the £100 so received by him to the cashier of the defenders' firm; (4) that on the express instructions of the pursuer's husband, as a partner of the defenders' firm, the acknowledgment of the loan produced by the pursuer was prepared and signed by the cashier of the defenders' firm as on behalf of the firm; and (5) that the acknowledgment was delivered to the pursuer by her husband as the acknowledgment or voucher for said loan, of the date it bears, and that it has been in the pursuer's possession ever since. If these facts are established, I should think it clear that the pursuer is entitled to the decree which the Lord Ordinary pronounced in her favour. Indeed, I do not understand the defenders to maintain anything to the contrary of this. Their defence rather is (1) that the facts have not been established habili modo, and (2) that their partner (the pursuer's husband) had no power to bind them as obligants for borrowed money. In a word, the facts themselves are not disputed, but the parties are at variance as to the legal consequences of these facts.

Bryan v.
Butters
Brothers & Co.

I think it is a proposition good in law, and one which is now long past the region of controversy, that the partner of a trading or mercantile firm (and the defenders' firm was of that class) has an implied mandate to borrow money in the name and on the credit of his firm, and to bind his firm as obligants therefor by granting an acknowledgment or voucher in his firm's name for the money so borrowed. This being so, the defenders' liability for the sum sued for (undoubtedly borrowed from the pursuer by her husband for his firm) cannot be disputed, if the alleged loan is established habili modo. Such a loan can only be proved, according to our law, by the writ or oath of the borrower.

Accordingly the real question—indeed the only question—in the case is, whether the document produced by the pursuer is the writ of the defenders proving the loan. On this question the defenders maintain first, that the document produced by the pursuer cannot be looked at as their writ, or receive any effect, because it is not probative or holograph. I think this view cannot be sustained, for the reasons which the Lord Ordinary has given.

Whatever the law may have required in regard to deeds constituting obligation or title, it does not require the same, as matter of solemnity, in documents used only in modum probationis. I add no more upon this point, because I adopt what the Lord Ordinary has said.

The defenders maintain, in the second place, that the writ (the genuineness of which is admitted) is not their writ, but the writ of their cashier, Gibson, who had no authority to borrow money for the firm, and no authority in their name to grant such a writ.

I assume that Gibson had no power to borrow money in the name and on the credit of his employers, the defenders, but I scarcely see the bearing of that fact on this case. Nobody suggests that Gibson borrowed the £100 now sued for. It was borrowed by Mr Bryan, one of the partners of the firm. It is a different matter whether Gibson had not authority to sign the document in question. Here, again, I assume that the general procuration granted by the defenders' firm in Gibson's favour enabling him to sign for the firm certain documents in connection with their banking transactions, did not authorise him to grant such a document as that now produced by the pursuer. He might have authority, however, to sign that document apart altogether from the general procuration I have referred to, and on authority derived from the same source. I take it for granted that Mr Bryan, having power to borrow money on the credit of his firm, had also the power to grant an acknowledgment in the firm's name that he had done so, and if he had adhibited the firm's signature to the document in question, it would have been the writ of the firm. But it seems to me to be quite as much the writ of the firm although signed by the cashier for the firm, because the cashier so signed it on the authority and by the direct instructions of one of the partners, who himself had power to grant such a writ. In signing that document Mr Gibson says,—“I was always acting under his,” i.e., Mr Bryan's, “instructions in connection with the firm, and did exactly what I was told.” Mr Gibson therefore signed the document in question on the direct authority of that partner, who could have validly signed it himself, and the signature of an authorised agent is equal to the signature of the principal, and binding on him.

No. 99. Mr Gibson's general procuration is not needed to validate his signature in the present case. The direct authority on which he acted was a procuration quod hoc. I come therefore to the conclusion that the writ produced is the writ of the defenders, and that it establishes the loan to them of the sum sued for.

Butters
Brothers & Co.

The plain justice of the case points also to the pursuer being entitled to decree. Her £100 was not retained by her husband. It was actually delivered by him to the cashier of the firm, and went into the firm's bank account, and should now be accounted for by them. That their cashier subsequently allowed one of the partners to deal with that money as his own, by putting it to his private account, and afterwards withdrawing it, is a matter with which the pursuer has no concern. The pursuer can scarcely be called on to suffer for what she could in no way control. But that the pursuer's money was a bona fide loan to the defenders' firm, and was so treated when the money first reached the hands of the defenders' cashier, is quite evident from the facts which have been proved, among which are these important items, namely, that the acknowledgment for the money was copied into the firm's financial letter-book, which all the partners might see, and the money itself duly entered when received in the columns of the firm's cash-book.

No. 100. HUGH HOUSTON ROSS (Judicial Factor on Mr and Mrs Fraser's Marriage Contract Trust), Petitioner.—Dudley Stuart.

Judicial Factor—Cautioner.—An unmarried woman may be cautioner for a judicial factor.

1ST DIVISION. HUGH HOUSTON ROSS, judicial factor on the trust-estate created by the antenuptial contract of marriage of Mr and Mrs Edward Fraser, presented this note, in which he prayed the Lord President to move the Court to authorise the Clerk of Court to accept Mary Charlotte Ross as cautioner for him. He stated that it was necessary that new caution should be found in consequence of the death of his mother, Mrs Ross who had formerly been accepted as cautioner in succession to her husband the original cautioner; that the proposed cautioner was his sister; that she was unmarried, forty-four years of age, and possessed of ample means looking to the amount of the trust-estate; but that the Clerk of Court had expressed doubts as to the competency of accepting her as cautioner because of her being a woman.

Argued for the judicial factor;—There was no absolute incompetency in accepting a woman as cautioner for a judicial factor. That was sufficiently shewn by the case of the present factor, the previous cautioner in which had been the factor's mother, and she had been accepted and the matter had been brought under the notice of the late Lord President. It might be that a cautionary obligation could not be enforced against a female cautioner in the event of her marriage; but the abstract competency being assumed, the question was one of circumstances in each case. There might be an objection to accepting a young woman who might marry soon after she had become cautioner, and thereby involve the estate in the expense of finding new caution; but the circumstances of the present case made that contingency improbable.

 is pretty well shewn by the proceedings in the present factory ; for the vacancy

DANIEL MONTGOMERIE, Respondent.—Strachan—Clyde.

Company—Liquidator—Removal—Voluntary liquidation—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 141.—The shareholders of a public company, whose liability was limited by shares, unanimously resolved that the company should be wound up voluntarily, on the ground of its inability to carry on business owing to its liabilities ; and appointed as liquidator one of their own number, who had formerly been a director. Subsequently a petition was presented for a supervision order, and for confirmation of the liquidator's appointment. A creditor of the company lodged answers objecting to the confirmation of the liquidator's appointment, on the ground of his connection with the company as a shareholder and a former director. It appeared that his shares were fully paid-up, and also that all the creditors of the company, except the objector, had expressed their approval of the appointment. The Court confirmed the appointment, holding that due cause in the sense of the 141st section of the Companies Act, 1862, had not been shewn for the removal of the liquidator. Feb. 27, 1892.
M'Knight & Co., Limited,
v. Montgomerie.

On 16th April 1890, John M'Knight & Company, Limited, was incorporated under the Companies Acts for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on the brickmaking and quarrying business at Binny, Uphall, belonging to the firm of M'Knight & Marshall. The capital of the company was £12,000, in shares of £1 ; of these 6650 were subscribed. The registered office was at Binny. 1ST DIVISION.

On 26th January 1892, at an extraordinary general meeting of the company, it was unanimously resolved, by extraordinary resolution, that the company should be wound up voluntarily, on the ground that it had been proved to the satisfaction of the shareholders that the company, by reason of its liabilities, could not continue its business ; and the meeting further appointed William Hardie, C.A., Greenock, to be liquidator.

On 30th January the company and Hardie presented a petition to the Court for a supervision order, and for the confirmation of Hardie's appointment as liquidator.

Daniel Montgomerie, a creditor of the company for £357, lodged answers objecting to the confirmation of Hardie's appointment as liquidator. He stated that the company was practically a private company, of which the vendors Messrs M'Knight and Marshall retained a controlling interest, the remaining capital being subscribed for by their friends ; that no communication of any kind had been made to the creditors of the company as to its affairs prior to the resolution to wind up voluntarily ; that the object of the liquidation was to enable a new company to be formed, which

No. 101. should take over the plant and machinery of the old company at a greatly depreciated price; that questions of liability relative to the shares and the calls in arrear would have to be investigated in the course of liquidation, and that it was necessary in the interests of the creditors that an independent person, not connected with the company, should be appointed liquidator, especially to attend to the interests of the company in the transfer of the assets to any new company; and that Hardie therefore was an unsuitable person for the office of liquidator, as he was a shareholder, and had been a director of the company. The respondent further complained that the liquidator had refused to give him information regarding the position and creditors of the company.

Feb. 27, 1892.
M'Knight &
Co., Limited,
v. Mont-
gomerie.

The petitioners lodged a minute in answer to these objections. They stated that Messrs M'Knight and Marshall had not a controlling power in the company, and that the shares had not been allotted to them and their friends exclusively; that the whole shares issued had been fully paid up except £570; that all the shareholders (except two who, being in arrear, could not take any part in the deliberations of the company), and all the creditors of the company, except the respondent, had expressed their concurrence in the steps taken for the liquidation of the company, the number of these creditors being thirteen, and the amount of their claims being £621; and that Hardie, who had been unacquainted either with M'Knight or Marshall before the formation of the company, held 600 shares, all of which were fully paid up, but that, although at one time a director, he had ceased to hold office some time before the liquidation.

Argued for the respondent;—By the 141st section of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), the Court was empowered "on due cause shewn" to remove a liquidator in a voluntary winding-up. Such cause had been shewn in the present case, for Mr Hardie's position as a shareholder and former director of the company made it possible that his personal interests would conflict with his duties as liquidator. That was a sufficient ground; it was not essential to prove any actual misconduct on the part of the liquidator.¹ His position was analogous to that of the trustee in a sequestration, and such a conflict of interests and duties would be fatal to the appointment of anyone as trustee.² The Court, under the Act of 1862, sec. 149, might have regard to the wishes of the creditors of the company in reference to the appointment of a liquidator, and the Court here ought to take steps for ascertaining the wishes of the creditors; for although it was said that they all concurred with the petitioners, yet the respondent had been unable to consult with them on this point, owing to the refusal of the liquidator to give him any information as to who the other creditors were.

Argued for the petitioners;—Mr Hardie was the unanimous choice of the shareholders and all the creditors, except the respondent, concurred in thinking that his appointment was a suitable one. The respondent therefore would have to make out a very clear case for removal before the Court would interfere. No such case existed here. Mr Hardie had ceased to be a director before the liquidation was resolved upon, and his interest as a shareholder, his shares being fully paid up, was obviously to get a large price for the business as possible, for it was only after the creditors had been paid in full that the shareholders would get anything. At the same time the petitioners were quite willing that the Court should order that any proposed sale should be submitted for the approval of the Court.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The respondent in this case does not oppose the granting No. 101. of the supervision order, which accordingly will be pronounced, but he asks that the liquidator appointed by the shareholders should be removed and another appointed in his place. We have therefore the question whether due cause in the sense of the statute has been shewn for the removal of Mr Hardie, the liquidator appointed by the shareholders.

Feb. 27, 1892.
M'Knight &
Co., Limited,
v. Mont-
gomerie.

Now, in the first place, it is, I think, very important to observe that Mr Hardie is the unanimous choice of the shareholders, and that all the creditors, with the exception of the respondent, have expressed an opinion in favour of the continuance of Mr Hardie's administration. That is a material fact in the case, and is one which to a large extent displaces the objection first urged against him, founded on the fact that he is a shareholder. It was further urged that Mr Hardie was a director of the company, and if that had been so, it might have raised a question of a different complexion, but the petitioners have explained that Mr Hardie was not a director at the date of the liquidation, but merely during the first year of the company's existence. Accordingly, I do not think that we are called upon to assign high importance to his past directorship, but leaving this to be decided on its merits when the question arises I confess to thinking that no adequate cause has been shewn for removing Mr Hardie from the office of liquidator. It is true that he is a shareholder, but it is not asserted that he is in arrears as regards the calls, and he has therefore a strong interest to see that other shareholders pay up the calls due by them. It has not been shewn that he has any interest adverse to a favourable realisation of the estate, and nothing has been said against him personally. He is a business man, quite able to wind up what is not a large estate. As the Dean of Faculty has stated that he has no objection to the insertion of the condition that the liquidator should consult the Court before any sale of the estate is carried through, I think that condition should be inserted in our interlocutor.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Direct and ordain that the voluntary winding-up of John M'Knight & Company, Limited, resolved upon by the members of the said company on 26th January 1892, be continued, but subject to the supervision of the Court in terms of the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886: Confirm the appointment of William Hardie, chartered accountant, Greenock, as liquidator of said company in terms of and with all the powers conferred by said Acts: Declare that any of the proceedings under the voluntary winding-up may be adopted as the Court may think fit: And declare that the creditors, contributories, and liquidator of the said company, and all other persons interested, are to be at liberty to apply to the Court as there may be just occasion: And further direct and ordain that unless and until it shall be otherwise directed and ordained by the Court the liquidator shall not dispose of the company's works except with the special leave of the Court: Direct that the expenses of this application for a supervision order be treated as expenses in the liquidation, and decern: Find the respondent, Daniel Montgomerie, liable in the expenses occasioned by his appearing and opposing the granting of the petition," &c.

Opinions that in the disentail of part of an entailed estate the part should be valued at the loss to the entailed estate by the separation, and not merely at its intrinsic value.

Entail—Disentail—Agreement—Effect of supervening legislation.—In 1878 the Duke of Sutherland, heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate under an entail dated in 1835, entered into an agreement with his son and nearest heir for the time, which proceeded upon the narrative that it was “desirable for the preservation of the dignity and honour of the earldom of Sutherland that the estate should be secured by fetters of entail, so far as legally may be done, from being alienated from the earldom of Sutherland, or wasted or charged with debt except as aftermentioned.” The parties therefore agreed that the estate should be disentailed, and that the Duke should be bound to execute “a valid deed of strict entail” on certain heirs. The Duke further agreed to bring within the entail certain estates held by him in fee-simple, and to renounce his right to charge the estate with a large sum expended by him in improvements, while his son agreed that his father should have power to charge the fee of the estate to a considerable amount. The agreement also circumscribed the limits within which the heirs of entail would have been entitled under the Aberdeen Act to grant provisions to husbands and wives.

In pursuance of this agreement, the estates were disentailed and, along with the fee-simple lands, were re-entailed. At the date of the agreement the Duke could not under the Entail Acts then in force have disentailed without the consent of his son.

In a petition for disentail of part of the entailed estate presented by the Duke in 1891, held that the petitioner was not barred by the agreement from taking advantage of the provisions of the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882, which empowers heirs of entail in possession to disentail without the consent of the nearest heir.

Appeal—Leave to appeal.—Circumstances in which the Court refused to grant leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

IN October 1891 the Duke of Sutherland, as heir of entail in possession of (1) the estate and country of Reay, and (2) the earldom and estate of Sutherland, presented a petition to the Court under the Entail Act for authority to disentail a certain part of each of these estates. The estate of Reay was held by him under and in virtue of a deed of entail dated 16th October 1861, and the estate of Sutherland under a deed of entail dated 16th July 1878.

The petitioner was born on 19th December 1828. The three nearest heirs of entail who at the date of the petition were for the time entitled to succeed in their order successively immediately after the petitioner under both entails were the petitioner's eldest son, the Marquess of Stafford, and the Marquess' two sons, Earl Gower and Lord Alistair St Clair Leveson Gower. The Marquess was of full age, but his sons were pup-

The petitioner stated that deeds of consent by the Marquess and by Earl Gower's curator to disentail both the portions of ground would be produced, failing which the expectancies and interests in the subjects of the Marquess and Earl Gower respectively, "with reference to this application, will be ascertained and provided for in terms of section 5 of the said Act 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61, and section 13 of the Act 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53."

No. 102.

Duke of
Sutherland v.
Marquess of
Stafford.

The respondent the Marquess of Stafford lodged answers, in which he stated that the portion of the Reay estate which it was proposed to disentail was situated in close proximity to the mansion-house of Tongue, and that the portion of the Sutherland estate was close to the policies of Dunrobin, and at no great distance from the Castle itself. He averred that to disentail these portions would cause such injury to the entailed estates as could not be adequately met by the statutory compensation of money.

It was further maintained that it was incompetent for the petitioner to proceed with the petition upon two grounds, (first) that the petitioner was barred from disentailing the Sutherland estates, or any part of them, in respect of an agreement entered into between him and the Marquess of Stafford in 1878, in pursuance of which the present entail of the Sutherland estates, dated July 1878, was executed; and (second) that upon a sound construction of the Entail Acts (quoted, infra, p. 508), it was incompetent for the Court to dispense with the consents of the next heirs, upon the value of their interest or expectancy being paid or secured, where the application was for authority to disentail a portion only of the entailed estates, the actual consents of the next heirs being, it was maintained, in such a case still necessary.

The facts bearing on the first of these pleas were as follows:—

In 1878 the Sutherland estates, which were then held under an entail dated in 1835, could have been disentailed by the Duke with the consent of the Marquess, but having regard to the provisions of the Entail Acts then in force he could not disentail without that consent. The parties accordingly entered into the agreement mentioned, which proceeded on the narrative "that it is desirable for the preservation of the dignity and honour of the earldom of Sutherland that the said estates should be secured by fetters of entail, so far as legally may be done, from being alienated from the earldom of Sutherland, or wasted or charged with debt except as aftermentioned." The narrative then declared that the lands of Embo had been acquired by the Duke, "and it is desirable that the said lands and others should be added to and in future form part of the entailed estate"; that since his succession the Duke had expended very large sums in improvements which he was now entitled to charge on the entailed estate,—“Therefore, and in consideration of the various prestations in favour of the said Marquess of Stafford agreed to and granted by the said Duke and Earl in connection with the re-entail of the family estates in England,” the parties agreed, first, that the estates should be disentailed; second, that the Duke should renounce his right to charge the estate for certain improvement expenditure; third, that he execute “a valid deed of strict entail of the said lands formerly entailed, and also of the fee-simple lands and others foresaid,” upon himself, whom failing, the Marquess, whom failing, the other heirs called to the succession by the deed; fourth, the Duke was to have the power of charging the fee of the estates with a sum of not more than £100,000; fifth, it was agreed that the statutory powers of the heirs of entail to grant Aberdeen provisions to the husbands and widows of heirs in possession or heirs-apparent should be restricted, so that no jointure should exceed £4000 a-year; that

No. 102. the whole jointures on the estate should never exceed £7500 a-year; and that the statutory powers of providing for younger children should be entirely excluded.

Feb. 27, 1892.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Marquess of
Stafford.

In pursuance of this agreement the estates were disentailed, and along with the fee-simple lands re-entailed, power being given under the new entail to the Duke, whom failing, the Marquess, to charge the fee of the estates to the extent of £100,000.

On 24th October 1891 the Duke of Fife and the Duke of Westminster were appointed curators ad litem to Earl Gower and Lord Alistair Leveson Gower respectively.

On 15th December 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Low) repelled the objections of the respondents to the competency of the petition, and appointed the petition to be enrolled for further procedure.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The question is whether there is anything in the contract which prevents the Duke of Sutherland taking advantage of the power which the Entail Act of 1882 gives to heirs of entail in possession of having the consent of the nearest heir for the time dispensed with in an application to disentail? In my opinion that question must be answered in the negative. The agreement has been fully implemented, and the Marquis of Stafford, having got all that he bargained for, I do not see how he can demand anything more. The Legislature has given to an heir of entail in possession certain powers, and the Duke of Sutherland is heir of entail in possession, and he is in that position, not contrary to, but in accordance with, and in pursuance of, the agreement. How then can the agreement prevent him exercising a power which has been conferred by subsequent legislation? The respondents relied greatly on the part of the narrative of the agreement in which one of the inducing causes is stated to be 'that it is desirable for the preservation of the dignity and honour of the earldom of Sutherland that the said estates should be secured by fetters of entail, so far as legally may be done, from being alienated from the earldom of Sutherland, or wasted or charged with debt except as after-mentioned.' But the counterpart of this consideration in the operative part of the agreement was the obligation of the Duke to re-entail the estates upon a certain series of heirs, and under certain conditions. The Duke came under no obligation not to exercise any powers which subsequent legislation might confer upon heirs of entail, and it seems to me to be impossible to read any such obligation into the deed. I am therefore of opinion that the present application is not barred by the agreement.

"In the next place, the respondents contend that the power of the Court to dispense with consents is confined to the case of an application to disentail the whole of an entailed estate. The power to dispense with consents was first given by the Act of 1875, and, so far as I am aware, it has never until now been suggested that the enactment did not apply to an application to disentail a part, as well as to an application to disentail the whole of an entailed estate. If, however, the construction put upon the Act by the respondents is sound, I apprehend that the fact that for many years an erroneous construction has in practice been acted upon is of no moment.

"The argument of the respondents I understand to be as follows:—

"By the 3d section of the Rutherfurd Act, power is given to an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate to acquire in fee-simple 'such estate in whole or in part' with certain consents, if he is not the only heir in existence. By the 5th section of the Act of 1875, which amends the 3d section of the Rutherfurd Act, power is given to the Court, upon certain conditions, to dispense with the consents required by the Rutherfurd Act, except the consent of the nearest heir for the time. In that section no mention is made of part of an entailed estate, the case with which the section deals being spoken of as an application for authority to disentail 'an entailed estate.' Further, in the same section, the Court is directed in the event of an heir (other than the nearest) whose consent is required under the Rutherfurd Act refusing to consent, to ascertain the value in money of the expectancy or interest of that heir 'in the entailed estate.' The respondents contended that an application to disentail only part of an entailed estate was designedly omitted from the section, the reason being the great injury which the next heirs might sustain if the heir in possession had power capriciously to disentail without their consent any part of the estate such as the mansion-house and policies. The Legislature, therefore, while recognising that it was quite reasonable that part of an entailed estate should be disentailed if everyone interested consented, and while providing that if the whole of an estate was disentailed, the precise money value should be ascertained and the next heirs compensated in proportion to their interests, had not provided any machinery for ascertaining the compensation to be paid to the next heirs in the case of a partial disentail for injury suffered by reason of the remainder of the estate being injuriously affected by severance or otherwise.

"The respondents submitted a similar argument upon the 3d section of the Act of 1882, which empowers an heir of entail in possession 'of an entailed estate,' under a new entail, 'to disentail the estate, and acquire it in fee-simple,' if he shall obtain the like consents as are required by the 3d section of the Rutherford Act. The respondents also pointed out that in section 12, subsection 5, of the Act of 1875, certain provisions are made for the case of an application to disentail an estate in whole or in part, while section 19 of the Act of 1882 provides for an application for an order of sale, of an entailed estate, or part of it. These sections, the respondents contend, shew that the Legislature did not omit to refer to part of an entailed estate in the 5th section of the Act of 1875, or the 3d section of the Act of 1882, through inadvertence, but because it was intended to exclude the case of an application to disentail part of an entailed estate.

"The respondents' argument is ingenious, but I am of opinion that it is not well founded.

"1. The 5th section of the Act of 1875 proceeds upon the narrative that it is expedient that the 3d section of the Rutherford Act should be amended, and then it proceeds to state what the amendments are, these being—(1) that the consent of any heir in any application to disentail an entailed estate may be competently given after the application has been presented; and (2) that in the event of any heir, except the nearest, refusing to consent, the Court may, upon certain conditions, dispense with his consent. The changes operated by the 5th section of the 1875 Act are thus prima facie co-extensive with the provisions of the 3d section of the Rutherford Act, and if it had been intended that the change in the law should not apply to a partial disentail, I think that the Legislature would have said so, and would not have permitted so important a limitation in the scope of the amendment to be gathered from a minute and subtle analysis of the phraseology.

"2. It seems to be clear that whatever is the scope of the amendment made by the 5th section of the Act of 1875, both parts of that section deal with the same thing, I mean that the first subsection does not deal with a larger or more extensive amendment than the second subsection. The respondents at all events cannot maintain the opposite view, because the words upon which they mainly rely, viz., 'an entailed estate' occur only in the first subsection. Now, as I have already pointed out, all that the first subsection does is to provide that the consent of any heir, whose consent is required by the Rutherford Act to a disentail, may competently be given after the application has been presented to the Court. But that is an enactment which has regard solely to convenience of procedure, and no reason was suggested, or could, I apprehend, be suggested, why it should be confined solely to the case of an application to disentail the whole estate.

"3. Upon what principle, if the respondents' view is sound, is it to be ascertained whether an application is for the disentail of 'an entailed estate,' or only 'part of it'? The difficulties which would arise in determining that question are so obvious that if it had been intended that the 5th section of the 1875 Act was onerous and could not be affected by what was not within the contemplation of the parties to it at the time it was entered into. Its object appeared very clearly from its terms, and was to prevent such an alienation as was here proposed, and which was incompatible with the "preservation and dignity and honour of the earldom of Sutherland." The clause dealing with the lands of Embo shewed that what the parties looked to was such a preservation "in future." Indeed, if the Duke had intended to reserve the right to disentail there would have been no use for each of the carefully framed clauses in the deed. What, e.g., would have been, in such a state of matters, the use of inserting a clause reserving the lesser right to charge for improvement? It was quite competent for the Duke to enter into an agreement excluding himself from exercising powers conferred by future enabling statutes upon every heir of entail.¹ The Lord Ordinary had assumed that the agreement had been duly implemented by the Duke. That was not so. It was partly carried out, no doubt, by the execution of the deed of entail, but it could only be fully implemented by the Duke's abstaining from disentailling during his life.

(2) On a sound construction of the Entail Acts, 1848 to 1882, the power of the Court to dispense with consents was confined to applications to disentail the whole and not a part of an entailed estate.

Under the 3d section* of the Rutherford Act, an heir of entail in pos-should be more limited in its scope than the 3d section of the Rutherford Act, that would have been clearly expressed, and some definition given whereby it could be ascertained whether a case did or did not fall within the enactment.

"4. The respondents contend that it is impossible under the 5th section of the Act of 1875 to compensate the next heirs in the case of a partial disentail, because what the Court is directed to ascertain is the value in money of their expectancy or interest 'in the entailed estate.' The respondents, however, leave out of view that the value of the interest or expectancy in the entailed estate is to be ascertained 'with reference to such application.' Now, the only kind of applications with which the section deals are applications for authority to disentail, and the Court must ascertain the value of the expectancy with reference to the particular application to disentail. The words in which the direction to the Court is given seem to me to be carefully chosen to cover every case whether of a partial or of a total disentail, and the powers which the Court have under their discretion are, I think, wide enough to enable the Court to do substantial justice to the next heirs in every case.

"5. As regards the Act of 1882, the respondents' contention would have the anomalous result that, by the third section, the distinction between old and new entails would be abolished only in the case of applications to disentail the whole estate, and not in the case of applications for a partial disentail. The 13th section of the Act of 1882, however, seems to me to be conclusive of the question. It is there provided that in 'any application under the Entail Acts in which the consent of the heir-apparent or other nearest heir is required,' such consent may be dispensed with by the Court. Now, an application to disentail part of an estate is an application to which the consent of the heir-apparent or other nearest heir was at the date of the Act required, and I fail to see how it is possible to limit the generality of the words, 'any application.'

"I am therefore of opinion that the argument of the respondents upon the Entail Acts cannot be sustained."

But in the subsequent statutes which were really passed to enlarge the rights of an heir of entail in possession, there was no reference to disentailing a "part" of the estate.

The power to dispense with consents was first given by the Act of 1875, and by the 5th section,* which amended the 3d section of the Rutherford Act, power was given to the Court upon certain conditions to dispense with the consents required by the Rutherford Act, except

Sutherland v.
Marquess of
Stafford.

The Act of 1882 conferred on heirs of entail in possession of an estate held under a new entail the same powers of disentailing as those holding under an old entail had. But the section * conferring this power confined the application to the case of disentailing "an estate."

All this clearly shewed that the Legislature had designedly omitted to refer to disentailing a part of an entailed estate in the amending Acts of 1875 and 1882, and the reason was quite obvious. It was reasonable that where all interested consented a part of an estate might be disentailed, but it was unreasonable that an heir of entail in possession should be invested with the dangerous power of capriciously disentailing without consents a part of an estate, the abstraction of which would, as here, seriously diminish the value of the remainder of the estate. It was also noteworthy that in section 12, subsection 5, of the Act of 1875, certain provisions were made for disentailing an estate, "in whole or in part," while in section 19, and subsequent sections, of the Act of 1882, provision was made for an application for an order of sale of an entailed estate "or part of it." The Legislature, while omitting the word "part" in these Acts with reference to disentailing without consents, had expressly used it where other purposes were considered. That implied that where the amplification was not expressed it was not intended.

Further, there was no machinery provided by the 5th section of the Act of 1875,† as in the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, for assessing the compensation to the next heirs for injury arising to the portion of the entailed estate remaining entailed by the severance therefrom of the disentailed part. The Court was directed to ascertain the value of the next heirs' expectancy in the "entailed estate." The words immediately following, "with reference to such application," were words of generality.

Counsel for the Duke of Fife and Duke of Westminster adopted the above argument.

Argued for the petitioner;—I. He had duly implemented all he undertook in the agreement, and the Marquess had got all he bargained for in it. The counterpart of the consideration contained in the clause dealing with the "preservation of the dignity and honour of the earldom of Sutherland" was the re-execution of a valid deed of entail upon a certain series of heirs and upon certain conditions. This deed had been duly implemented. The Duke certainly came under no obligation in the agreement to refrain from exercising any powers which might be conferred upon heirs of entail by future enabling statutes.

that nothing herein contained shall render it competent to dispense with the consent of the nearest heir for the time entitled to succeed to any entailed estate sought to be disentailed."

* The Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53), entitled, "An Act to Amend the Law of Entail in Scotland," enacted (section 3),—"It shall be lawful for an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate, held under an entail dated on or after the 1st day of August 1848, to disentail the estate and acquire it in fee-simple by applying to the Court in the manner provided by the Entail Acts, if he shall be the only heir of entail in existence, or if he shall obtain the like consents as are required by the third section of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, in the case of entails dated prior to the said date."

† Supra, p. 509, note.

II. The 13th section of the Act of 1882 applied in terms to this application. Section 13 * provided that "in any application under the Entail Acts to which the consent of the heir-apparent or other nearest heir is required," the Court may dispense with his consent, and ascertain the value in money of his expectancy. Now, this was unquestionably an application under the Entail Acts, to which such consents were required.

It was said, however, that under the Act what was to be valued was only an entire estate, "the entailed estate," and not a "part" of that estate, and that this limitation was also to be found in the 5th section of the Act of 1875, which was incorporated by reference into the 1882 Act.

But then this 5th section of the 1875 Act was in its turn announced in the preamble as an amendment of the 3d section of the Rutherford Act. The latter section was therefore intended to supply a gloss on the word "estate" used in the later statutes. The word must, in this view, be read in the same sense as in the Rutherford Act, as "in whole or in part." Further, the Court had ample powers for doing justice to the next heirs in valuing their expectancies with reference to partial disentails. The words "entailed estate," in the 5th section of the 1875 Act, must be read along with the words "in reference to such application." That meant that in a case of partial disentail compensation was to be given in respect not only of the portion disentailed, but of the injury to the next heirs in respect of its severance from the lands remaining under the entail.

At advising, on 23d February,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I. The first question debated before us under this reclaiming note was whether the petitioner is barred by the agreement of February 1878 from insisting in the present application, and I am of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that his Grace is not.

The contract binds the petitioner to do and to abstain from doing certain specified things, which are articulately enumerated. It announces in the narrative that what is declared to be "desirable for the preservation of the dignity and honour of the earldom of Sutherland," viz., "that the estates should be secured from being alienated from the earldom," is to be accomplished "by letters of entail, so far as legally may be done." Accordingly, this appointed way of accomplishing the object is made matter of express and definite stipulation, for the leading provision is that the petitioner is to execute a sound or valid deed of strict entail. But the agreement goes on, in the fifth article, to circumscribe the limits within which (apart from stipulation) the heirs of entail would have been entitled, under the Aberdeen Act, to grant provisions to husbands and widows. This having been done, and special clauses having been

* The Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53), enacted (section 13),—"In any application under the Entail Acts to which the consent of the heir-apparent or other nearest heir is required, and such heir, or the curator ad litem appointed to him in terms of this Act, shall refuse or fail to give his consent the Court shall ascertain the value in money of the expectancy or interest in the entailed estate of such heir, with reference to such application, and shall direct the sum so ascertained to be paid into bank in name of the said heir, or that proper security therefor shall be given over the estate, and shall thereafter dispense with the consent of the said heir, and shall proceed as if such consent had been obtained, and the provisions of sections 5 and 6 of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, shall apply to the nearest heir as well as to other heirs, and shall apply to all applications to which consents are required, and to entails dated on or after the 1st day of August 1848, as well as to entails dated prior to that date."

No. 102. authorised to be inserted in the entail under the third and fourth articles, the parties have left the attainment of their purposes to depend on the legal effects of the deed of entail so provided for.

Feb. 27, 1892. Duke of Sutherland v. Marquess of Stafford.

Now, the contention of the noble reclaimers is that there is to be read into the agreement an obligation to abstain from the exercise of one of the legal rights of an heir of entail by virtue of the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882, a statute passed subsequent to the date of the agreement. I can find no warrant for such interpolation in the contract. It has been maintained that certain passages in the agreement imply that the faith of the contract was that the lands were to remain under the entail. But I do not think that this comes to more than that the provisions of the contract all apply to the inception, execution, and continuance of the entail, and that they (quite naturally) do not deal with a legal condition which did not exist and was not in contemplation. It does not follow that the Court is to read in overt and prohibitory stipulations applicable to a state of matters which the parties never considered, and about which there is nothing in this contract to shew that they ever in fact agreed. Accordingly, there is no occasion to consider how, or how far, it was possible by agreement in 1878 to exclude the petitioner from exercising powers conferred in 1882 by an enabling statute upon every heir of entail.

II. The second question discussed was whether, under the Entail Acts, 1848-1882, the Court is authorised to dispense with the consent of the next heir of entail, where the application is for authority to sell a part, as distinguished from the whole, of an entailed estate.

The Lord Ordinary has examined the statutory enactments carefully and in detail, and I substantially concur in his Lordship's exposition and in his conclusion. I do not therefore repeat his deduction of the related sections of the successive statutes, but shall state my view of the controversy as it is thus brought to a point.

The 13th section of the Act of 1882 is that on which the petitioner is primarily to found. Now, that section is, in terms, said to apply to any application to which the consent of the heir-apparent or other nearest heir was required. Unquestionably an application to sell part of an estate was an application recognised by the Entail Statutes, and was an application to which (under the law prior to the Act of 1882) such consent was required. The section goes on to say—"The Court shall ascertain the value in money of the expectation or interest in the entailed estate." If these last words apply solely to the case of an entire estate, and do not apply to a part of an estate, then the latitude of the introductory words receives an unexpected contraction in the enactment, the scope of which they purport to define.

But this same section proceeds to apply to the case of the next heir the provisions of the 5th section of the Act of 1875, and to this enactment it is not necessary to turn. Now, that section is announced in its preamble as an amendment of the 3d section of the Act of 1848, and its contents are directly relative to the section which it amends. The term "entailed estate" is used, just as in the Act of 1882, by which it is itself amended, and no definition is given. It is, therefore, natural to ascertain the sense of the term by reference to the original enactment of 1848, of which the subsequent enactments of 1875 and 1882 are pendants. Now, the 3d section of the Act of 1848 does contain a gloss on the definition of the word "estate," for where that term is first used there is added the explanatory and parenthetical words "in whole or in part." It seems to me therefore that where in the amending sections of 1875 and 1882 the term "estate" is used, it is to be read in the same sense as in the principal enactment, and that it was quite accurate that in the later statutes the parenthetical explanation should not be repeated, it having, for all purposes of reference, ascertained the meaning of the term referred to.

No. 102.
Feb. 27, 1892.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Stafford.

Accordingly, taking the terms of the sections primarily concerned, and on which the petitioner has to found, I think that his application is sustained by their true construction. I may add that if the subject-matter of the 5th section of the Act of 1875 be regarded, and taking that part of it which is not directly in dispute as the criterion, it is extremely difficult to suggest any reason for a limitation to estates as a whole of the provision which is there contained, for it is concerned with an improvement of procedure, the reason of which is equally applicable to partial or to total disentails.

Two arguments, however, have been advanced by the reclaimers which require consideration. They point to the fact that, both in the Act of 1875 and in the Act of 1882, there are sections in which the words "in whole or in part" are expressly used, and they argue that this implies that in those sections in which the amplification is not expressed it is not intended. I am not aware, however, that such a variance can do more than supply an aid to determining the meaning of the section primarily under consideration, and the use in some passages of the more expansive of two expressions does not demonstrate an intention to abate the proper meaning of the other. Now, for the reasons which I have already stated, I think the proper meaning of the other is sufficiently clear.

The other argument was that, if the sections in question do apply to part of the estate as well as the whole, there is no provision for compensating the heir, whose consent is dispensed with, for the injury done to his interest in the remanent part of the estate by the severance of the portion disentailed. I have come to be satisfied, however, that this difficulty does not exist. When the dissenting heir is compensated, what is valued is "his expectancy or interest in the entailed estate, with reference to such application." Now, I agree that, in the case in hand, "the entailed estate," as used in the passage quoted, must consistently be held to mean the part of the estate which is to be disentailed. But, then, the interest in that part is to be valued to a man who, ex hypothesi, is to remain heir of entail of the rest of the estate. And if, as is suggested in the present instance, the abstraction of the part disentailed will seriously diminish the value of the remainder, that means that, to the owner (and future owner) of the remainder, the retention of the part to be taken away has a correspondingly high value. It seems to me therefore that the value to be ascertained is the value, not as in the market to third parties, but the value to the man who, on the assumption of the proceeding, is to be deprived of the subject of the disentail, and is to retain the estate, as an accessory to which that part has an exceptional value.

It is perhaps inconvenient that the Court should be forced incidentally to decide upon a question which will necessarily arise at a later stage in concrete form, and with the interests of the disputants reversed. But the argument of both parties has peremptorily challenged our judgment upon it. I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—The petitioner, the Duke of Sutherland, is heir of entail in possession of the estate and country of Reay and of the earldom and estate of Sutherland, under two separate deeds of entail, both dated after the 1st August 1848.

No. 102.

Feb. 27, 1892.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Marquess of
Stafford.

The object of this application is to obtain the authority of the Court to record in the Register of Tailzies an instrument or instruments of disentail of parts only of each of these entailed estates.

It appears to me that the first question which arises for consideration is whether it is competent for an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate, under an entail dated after 1st August 1848, to apply for authority to disentail a part only of the entailed estate, or whether it is competent for such heir to apply for disentail only of the whole estate. If an application, such as this, for authority to disentail a part only of the entailed estate, is incompetent, then of course no question as to the competency of dispensing with the consents of the next heirs will arise. If, however, the application be competent, then I do not think that question is attended with difficulty.

The power conferred on an heir of entail to disentail was given by the 3d section of the Rutherford Act, which authorised an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate, held under an entail dated before 1st August 1848, to apply to the Court to acquire such estate, in whole "or in part," under certain conditions, these being, generally speaking, that he should have obtained the consents of the three next heirs of entail, or of the heir-apparent, and of the heir or heirs, in number not less than two, including such heir-apparent, who in order successively would be heirs-apparent. It is not doubtful, therefore, that an application by an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate, held under an entail dated before 1st August 1848, to acquire a part only of the estate, would be perfectly competent, for the Act says so in so many words. Then by the 3d section of the Entail Act of 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 53), it is declared that it shall be lawful for an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate, held under an entail dated on or after 1st August 1848, to disentail the estate, and acquire it in fee-simple, by applying to the Court in the manner provided by the Entail Acts, if he shall be the only heir of entail in existence, or if he shall obtain the like consents as are required by the 3d section of the Rutherford Act, in the case of entails dated prior to the said date.

It is argued by the respondents that the words, "the estate," here used mean the whole estate—and not part of it only—and we were referred to the 19th and subsequent sections of the Act, by which an heir of entail is authorised to apply to the Court for an order for sale "of the estate or part of it," as shewing that when the Legislature intended to give authority to deal with part only of an estate the Act was so expressed.

But I do not think that this argument is sound. It appears to me that the object and intention of the Act of 1882 was to confer on heirs of entail in possession of estates held under entails dated on or after 1st August 1848 the same powers as regards disentailing as belonged to those who held estates under entails dated prior to that date. Accordingly, when the Act authorised such heirs of entail to disentail the estate and acquire it in fee-simple by applying to the Court in the manner provided by the Entail Acts, it refers, inter alia, to the 3d section of the Rutherford Act, which authorises an heir of entail to acquire an entailed estate either in whole or in part in fee-simple, by applying to the Court in the manner therein directed.

If the respondent's contention were sound it would lead to this very anomalous result, that an heir of entail in possession of an estate under an entail dated after 1848 could not acquire part of the estate in fee-simple, although he had obtained the consents of the three next heirs, while an heir of entail in possession of a estate under an entail dated before 1848 could do so—so also if the heir of No. 102. entail happened to be the only heir of entail in existence, he could in the one case acquire part of the estate in fee-simple, but not in the other. No plausible reason why the powers in this respect of one heir of entail should be different from those of another was suggested, and I can see none.

Feb. 27, 1892.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Marquess of
Stafford.

I am of opinion, therefore, that this application is not incompetent, because it applies for authority to disentail a part only of each of the entailed estates.

But, in the circumstances of the family, the consent of the Marquess of Stafford, who is heir-apparent, and of the tutor ad litem to his son, Earl Gower, who is a pupil, are required to the disentail. These facts are set forth in the petition, which proceeds to state that deeds of consent by them will be produced in the course of the proceedings, failing which the values in money of the expectancies or interests in the foresaid subjects of the said Marquess of Stafford and Earl Gower respectively, "with reference to this application, will be ascertained and provided for in terms of section 5 of the said Act 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61, and section 13 of the said Act 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53."

The Marquess of Stafford and the tutor of Earl Gower decline to give their consents to the disentail, and it is maintained by the respondents that it is incompetent to dispense with the consents of the next heirs, where the application is for authority to disentail a portion only of the entailed estates.

That contention is founded on the terms of the 5th clause of the Entail Amendment Act of 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61), which, on the preamble that it is expedient that the 3d section of the Rutherfurd Act should be amended, proceeds to enact that in any application for authority to disentail an entailed estate ~~which~~ by virtue of any tailzie dated prior to 1st August 1848 certain things may competently be done.

The respondents found on the words "application to disentail an entailed estate," which they say, as before, does not include an application to disentail part only of the estate.

The 3d section of the Rutherfurd Act, among other things, required that the instrument of disentail should be executed at the sight of the Court, and that the petitioner should have obtained the requisite consents at or before presenting the application. The first of these requisites was amended by the 4th section of 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 94, the second of them is one of the matters dealt with by the 5th clause of the Act now under consideration, which enacts that the requisite consents of the heirs of entail "may competently be given after such application has been presented to the Court, and in the course of the same."

Now, it is impossible to doubt, as I have said, that an application to disentail a part of an entailed estate was competent under the 3d section of the Rutherfurd Act, and no reason has been suggested why, in a matter purely of procedure like this, consents should not be produced in the course of the proceedings in an application to disentail part of an estate, as well as in an application for the disentail of the whole estate. It is difficult to accept a construction of the Act which leads to that result. Accordingly, I think that when the 5th section refers to an application to disentail an entailed estate, it refers to an application to disentail an estate, which in terms of the 3d section of the Rutherfurd Act may be either an application to disentail an estate in whole or in part.

But if this first amendment applies to both kinds of applications, so also must the next, which is the one with which we are more immediately concerned, and by it the Court is empowered, in the event of any of the heirs of entail, except the nearest heir for the time, refusing to give or being legally incapable of giving his consent, to dispense with such consent in terms of the provisions therein set forth, viz.:—that the Court shall ascertain the value in money of the expectancy or interest in the entailed estate with reference to such application of such heir or heirs, and shall provide for such value in money being properly paid or secured. It is said, however, that the provisions in respect of which the consent of the heir may be dispensed with do not provide for the case of the disentail of a part only of an estate, in respect that they do not provide any means for ascertaining the value in money of the expectancy or interest of such heir in the part of the estate disentailed. It appears to me that the difference in value of the entailed estate before the disentail, and the value of the part remaining after the disentail represents the loss to the heirs of entail by the disentail, and that this furnishes the means of ascertaining the money value of the interest of any particular heir or heirs in the part of the estate disentailed.

These provisions, however, only apply to the consent of Earl Gower, and the question remains as to the competency of dispensing with the consent of the Marquess of Stafford. If, however, I am right in holding that the present application is a competent application, then no difficulty arises as to his consent, because the 13th section of the Act of 1882 provides that in any application under the Entail Acts to which the consent of the heir-apparent or other nearest heir is required, and such heir shall refuse or fail to give his consent, the Court shall ascertain the value in money of the expectancy or interest in the entailed estate of such heir, and shall dispense with the consent of the heir, and shall proceed as if such consent had been obtained, and that the provisions of sections 5 and 6 of the Entail Act of 1875 shall apply to the nearest heirs as well as other heirs. It is indisputable that this is an application under the Entail Acts to which the consent of the heir-apparent is required, and therefore the clause applies in terms to it. I think, moreover, that the clause is also conclusive as regards the consent of Earl Gower, because it goes on to provide that the 5th and 6th sections in question shall apply to all applications to which consents are required, and to entails dated on or after 1st August 1848, as well as to entails dated prior to that date. Assuming the competency of the application, I think that the consents of the heirs of entail may be competently dispensed with, and as the application is competent, I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right.

But it is said that the petitioner is barred from disentailing in respect of the agreement entered into between him and Lord Stafford in 1878. This objection, if well founded, only applies to the proposed disentail of part of the Sutherland estates. But I concur with your Lordship that it is not well founded.

At the date of the agreement the petitioner could not have disentailed the Sutherland estates without the consent of the Marquess, but they together could do so. They accordingly agreed that the estates should be disentailed and again re-entailed along with the lands of Embo and others, which the petitioner held in fee-simple, under the conditions set forth in the agreement. No doubt one of the objects sought to be effected by the agreement was, as set forth in the narrative, that the estates should be secured by fetters of entail from being alienated from the earldom of Sutherland, or wasted, or charged with debt.

The agreement was implemented in all its parts. The estates were disentailed and re-entailed, and as the law then stood, it was out of the power of the petitioner to have disentailed them, or any part of them. But the change of the law introduced by the Entail Act of 1882 put it in his power to do so, and this change in the law, which neither party could have foreseen, has given rise to the present question. The petitioner has done everything that he was bound to do by the agreement, and I can see nothing in it to debar him from taking advantage of the change in the law, and disentailing the estates with the requisite consents.

Sutherland v.
Stafford.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The Duke of Sutherland agreed to re-entail certain estates, and to bring into the new entail certain other estates which he held in fee-simple. I think that obligation was fully performed by the execution of the deed of entail which followed upon it, and indeed I do not understand that to be disputed. I think that the obligation was not only performed but exhausted by the execution of that deed of entail, and that the Duke cannot be required to do anything further to give effect to his agreement. The legal effect of the entail so executed is determined not by the contract, but by a series of Acts of Parliament which limit and define the powers of heirs in possession of entailed estates; and I find nothing in the contract which subjects the heir in possession under the new entail to any further restriction than may be imposed upon him by the law in force for the time being, or which gives the substitute heirs any other or more effective right against the heir in possession than that law gives them. The contract appears to me to have been that the Duke of Sutherland should execute a deed of entail which would have all the efficacy which the law allows, or may in future allow to deeds of entail, but no other or further efficacy than that.

Upon the second point also I agree with your Lordship. The power of the heir in possession to disentail his estate in whole or in part is given by the Rutherfurd Act under certain conditions. The subsequent Acts altered the conditions by dispensing on certain terms with consents which were essential under the Rutherfurd Act, but they do not restrict or enlarge the power of the heir of entail in possession in so far as regards the subject over which it is to be exercised. I agree with your Lordships in the construction that you have put on the Act of 1875, but if there were room for any doubt as to the effect of that enactment I think it would be entirely removed by the Act of 1882, because that Act is applicable in terms to all applications under the Entail Acts to which the consent of the heir-apparent or other nearest heir is required. Now that is the position of the present application. The consent of the Marquess of Stafford, who is the nearest heir, is required, and accordingly the petitioner is entitled to found on the 13th section of the Act of 1882, which provides that in any application under the Entail Acts to which the consent is required the Court is to ascertain the value in money of the heir's expectancy or interest, and to proceed in terms of the previous Act of 1875. But then there follows another clause which is directly applicable not only to the case of the Marquess of Stafford, but to the case of all other persons who may be affected by such a petition, because the statute proceeds to enact that certain sections of the Entail Amendment Act of 1875 shall apply to all applications in which consents are required, whether on or after the 1st of August 1848. Now, I confess I can see no room for doubt that these provisions are applicable to the present case, although the petitioner does not propose to disentail the whole of the lands which are affected by the fetters of the deed of entail under which he holds the subjects included

No. 102. Feb. 27, 1892. Duke of Sutherland v. Marquess of Stafford. in this petition. I agree with your Lordship that while the Act of Parliament authorises the disentail of a part of an estate, although the remaining part may still be held under the fetters, it does not preclude the heir of entail, whose interest is to be valued, from getting the full value of his interest, whatever that may be. The value to be ascertained is not that of the heir's right in any part of the estate as a separate subject. The value to be ascertained is the heir's expectancy or interest in the entailed estate, and if it be the case that when the estate is divided upon an application of this kind, so that one portion of it is left within the fetters, and another portion relieved from them, the aggregate value of the two separate portions is less than the value of the estate as a whole,—which is the suggestion that is made to us,—I can see no room to doubt that the substitute heir of entail is entitled to say that what is to be valued for the purpose of dispensing with his consent is his interest in the portion to be taken away, not as a separate subject but as part of the entailed estate; and I agree with what your Lordships have said, that he does not get the full value of his interest in terms of the Act of Parliament if he receives anything short of the difference between the value of the estate to which he is still to succeed after the portion to be disentailed has been severed from it and the value of the whole estate to which he would have succeeded if there had been no such separation.

Upon the other points of the case also I am entirely of the same opinion as your Lordships.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

THE COURT adhered, reserving all questions of expenses.

On 27th February the Marquess of Stafford presented a petition for leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

LORD ADAM.—This is an application by the Duke of Sutherland for authority to disentail, and we have decided that he has a title to insist in it, and to have the part of the estate disentailed which he desires to have disentailed. It appears to me that in such a matter the Duke has a pre-eminent interest to have the case decided with as little delay as possible, for the reason which has been suggested, namely, that if any mischance occurs the whole proceedings may prove abortive, and by allowing the delay which an appeal occasions we are increasing the chance of such an occurrence. That, I think, is a very material consideration for refusing leave to appeal at this stage.

When we look at the interest of the other side, no doubt we find that they have an interest to have the question of their right to prevent this application being proceeded with decided before further proceedings under the petition are taken, but that is not so strong an interest as the interest of the petitioner to have the matter determined without delay.

Looking to these considerations, I think we should refuse leave to appeal.

LORD M'LAREN.—It seems to me that it may now be regarded as an established practice in entail petitions that, unless in exceptional circumstances, leave to appeal to the House of Lords against an interlocutory judgment of this Court will not be granted, the reason being that the death of any of the parties to such a proceeding materially alters the conditions of the question. The right may be lost altogether, or at anyrate a new party will intervene in the proceedings. The case is not so strong here as in some instances, because the application is not for a disentail of the whole estate, but it is difficult to draw a distinction between one case and another on that ground, because what is a small part of one estate may be as large as the whole of another estate of smaller size. I am rather in favour of refusing the application.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I was at first impressed by the consideration that there are here legal questions of magnitude and importance which are undoubtedly detachable from the sequel of the case. On the other hand, there is very great weight in what has been advanced by Lord Adam, and I have come to think that the balance of considerations is in favour of refusing this application. Two points weigh with me in coming to this conclusion. The first is, that having regard to the relative interests of the disputants, the peculiarity of proceedings of this kind that the death of the petitioner before decree terminates the litigation gives the Duke an exceptional right to be considered. In the second place, I do not think, after all, that the proceedings here will necessarily or naturally be of a highly complicated character. I sympathise greatly with the difficulties the parties may have in working out the subsequent procedure so as to promote their own pecuniary interests without hampering their argument on the main question, but the responsibility for this rests with themselves, and I am afraid we are not called upon to delay proceedings by allowing an appeal to the House of Lords merely in order to facilitate their dialectics.

THE COURT refused the petition.

Reimers.

Parent and Child—Bastard—Aliment.—A claim for aliment by an illegitimate child against his parents is a claim for debt and transmits against their representatives.

PAUL GERHARD ONCKEN died on 19th June 1888, leaving four children. By his trust-disposition and settlement special provision was made for his eldest son, and the residue of the estate was bequeathed to the three younger children. 1st DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

On 15th July 1890 William John Valentine, C.A., was appointed judicial factor on the estate, and after the other provisions of the settlement had been satisfied a sum of £1296, 5s. 7d. remained for distribution as residue.

In a petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary for special powers and for discharge, the judicial factor stated that there was in existence an imbecile illegitimate son of the truster, named Alexander G. Reimers, twenty years old, who was boarded out at a cost of £30 per annum; that the truster had recognised the paternity, and had maintained the lad during his lifetime; that the lad's mother was dead, and that he (the judicial factor) considered the estate liable for his maintenance, the cost of which he put at not less than £30 per annum. The prayer of the petition accordingly asked the Court (1) to fix what sum, if any, the petitioner was bound to retain for the maintenance and support of Reimers, and expenses

No. 103. connected therewith; (2) to authorise division of the balance of residue; (3) to authorise division of any balance remaining at Reimers' death out of the sum set apart for him; and (4) to grant the petitioner his discharge.

Feb. 27, 1892. Oncken's Judicial Factor v. Reimers.

The opinion of the Accountant of Court, which had been obtained by the judicial factor, was to the effect that if the claim for Reimers' aliment was to be held to be a debt due by the truster, the judicial factor might be authorised "(1) to retain £750, the income and capital of which to be applied by him in meeting Reimers' board and maintenance, and the expenses of the factory, at a rate not exceeding £35 a-year; (2) to divide the balance of the estate among the beneficiaries; and (3) upon Reimers' death, to divide the said sum of £750 or balance thereof, among the beneficiaries."

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) reported the case to the First Division.

When the case was called, counsel for the petitioner intimated that he was to argue that there was no legal obligation on him to pay aliment to Reimers out of the trust-estate.

The Court thereupon appointed a curator ad litem to Reimers. The curator subsequently lodged a minute, in which he submitted that the claim of the ward was a claim of debt for which the truster's estate was liable, and that the Court should give effect to the opinion of the Accountant of Court as to the amount necessary to be retained.

Argued for the petitioner;—The claim which an illegitimate child had against its parent for aliment was not based either on contract or on delict, but arose ex jure naturali. It did not therefore transmit,—as a claim of debt did,—against the representatives of the deceased parent. There was a distinct decision to that effect.¹ The case of Clarkson,² which was relied upon by the other side, was hardly in point, as it was brought at the instance of the mother against the father's representatives and her position was not in pari casu with that of a child. The action at her instance was in the nature of a claim of relief for which she was jointly liable with the father. The same criticism applied to the decision in the recent case of Gourlay.³ So long as the father lived there was authority for holding that a claim for aliment was not recognised as debt.⁴ It had also been held that such a claim was not discharged by ranking in a sequestration.⁵ The mere fact that there was no case where such a claim had ever been sustained led to the inference that it had no legal existence. In any view, the sum which the Accountant proposed to set aside was excessive.

Argued for the compearer;—The claim of a bastard for aliment was on an entirely different footing from that of a legitimate child. Whether it arose to any extent ex jure naturali or not, it had always been regarded as partaking of the nature of an ordinary debt.⁶ It must therefore transmit against the representatives of a deceased parent.⁷ The criticisms which had been made by the petitioner on the cases of Clarkson and Gourlay did not affect their authority in the present question, because the mother could have no claim of relief against the father's estate unless that estate were first liable for the child's aliment. The dicta in Reid v. Moir were entirely obiter. The case of Marjoribanks decided that a claim for aliment which was continuous and ran on from year to year was not discharged by the sequestration, and the claim there was for payment of aliment falling due subsequently to the sequestration. The decision in Ker v. Moriston's Trustees had been specifically overruled in Clarkson's case. Assuming the validity of the claim, the sum suggested by the Accountant was not too large.

Oncken's
Judicial Factor v.
Reimers.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This is a petition at the instance of the judicial factor on the trust-estate of the late Mr Oncken for special powers and discharge, and comes before us on the report of the Lord Ordinary.

The question is whether the judicial factor is bound to retain any, and if so, what sum for the aliment of an illegitimate imbecile son of the late Mr Oncken. It is admitted that Mr Oncken was the father of this child.

Mr Oncken left four legitimate children. It appears from the Accountant's report that the amount of the trust-estate available for distribution is £1296, 5s. 7d. The sum proposed to be retained in respect of the claim for aliment is £750, so that, if this claim be sustained, the result is that the illegitimate child may carry off the major part of the estate, leaving a sum of little more than £500 for distribution among his widow and three of his legitimate children.

It was not disputed that the father and mother of an illegitimate child are, jointly and severally, liable to aliment the child until he is able to support himself.

The usual way in which this obligation is implemented is that the mother supports the child, and recovers from the father his share of their joint debt. The action brought by the mother against the father is an action of relief, and is founded on the ground that he as well as she is liable to aliment the child.

It is said, however, that the obligation to support an illegitimate child is not an obligation arising either ex contractu or ex delicto, and so giving rise to an ordinary civil debt, but that it is an obligation arising ex jure naturali, and giving rise to a debt having different characteristics. One of these is said to be that the debt or obligation, though valid during the life of the parent, does not transmit against the representatives. If that be so, the claim of the illegitimate child in this case must be repelled.

But while I agree that the debt arises ex jure naturali, and may possibly have some characteristics different from an ordinary civil debt, it is clear that whatever the nature of the debt may be, it has been recognised and enforced by the civil law, and I am of opinion that it is conclusively settled by authority that the debt does transmit against the representatives of the deceased parent, and will be enforced against them.

The first case to which I would refer is that of Gairdner v. Munro, February 8, 1848, 10 D. 650. In that case Gairdner died in 1836, and Munro was appointed judicial factor on his estate. A sum of £100 was set aside to meet a claim which had been intimated for aliment, present and prospective, for an illegitimate daughter, Cecilia. The rest of the estate was divided among the creditors, who received a dividend of 9s. in the pound. From the date of her father's death in 1836 till 1847 Cecilia Gairdner had been alimented by a person of the name of Laing. In that year, with Laing's concurrence, Cecilia

No. 103. Gairdner raised an action against Munro for arrears of aliment. She claimed the whole sum which had been set aside to meet her claim, but the Court found her entitled only to a dividend of 9s. in the pound on the amount of her claim, on the ground that she was in no different or better position than any other creditor on the estate.

Feb. 27, 1892.
Oncken's
Judicial Factor v.
Reimers.

It appears to me that this case distinctly affirms the liability of the father of an illegitimate child for the aliment of that child, and that that liability transmits, after his death, against his estate. I do not see how otherwise the pursuer could have been ranked for a dividend.

The next case to which I would refer is that of Clarkson v. Fleming, mentioned in the report of the Accountant of Court. In that case the mother of an illegitimate child, in the year 1847, raised an action of aliment against the father, in which she obtained decree against him for aliment for seven years, commencing as at 30th December 1844, reserving to her her claim on behalf of the child for a further extension of the period for aliment. This decree expired on 30th December 1851. The father of the child died during that year. In 1854 she raised an action of wakening and transference against William Fleming, as the representative of his deceased brother, for further aliment.

The Court found that "the defender as representing his deceased brother, the father of the child, is liable in a reasonable sum for the aliment of the said child from the time he attained the age of seven years," again affirming the proposition that the estate of a deceased father of an illegitimate child is liable for his support.

It was maintained that the claim in that case, being by the mother of the child against the father, for relief of his share of the aliment, which they were jointly bound to contribute, was a proper claim of debt, and was different from a claim at the instance of the child against the father, which it was said was only due ex jure nature, and was not a proper civil debt, and did not transmit against his representatives.

But I do not think there is any substance in this distinction. No doubt the action was an action of relief, but the ground on which the pursuer was found entitled to relief was that the deceased father's estate was equally liable with her for aliment to the child. If the father's estate had not been directly liable to the child for the debt, she could have had no ground of action.

The last case to which I would refer is that of Downs v. Gourlay, 13 R. 1162.

In this case Downs gave birth to an illegitimate child, of which Wilson was admitted to be the father. Wilson died on 27th April 1885, when the child was two years old. After Wilson's death his estates were sequestrated, and Gourlay was appointed trustee on the sequestrated estates.

Downs claimed to be ranked on the sequestrated estates for aliment for her daughter until she should attain thirteen years of age. The trustee rejected the claim. The Court remitted to the trustee to rank the claim as a contingent claim.

The Lord President in giving judgment says,—“The question here is whether the mother was a proper creditor. If she was, there is no answer to her claim. I think the mother of an illegitimate child is always entitled to sue the putative father for a contribution towards the maintenance of the child so long as it is unable to maintain itself, on the ground that it is a debt. It does not matter whether it is a debt or a right arising out of natural law. It is a debt incurred on proof or admission of his having begotten the child. I do not think that the is a rule confined to the circumstances of this particular case. It must hold good as a general rule, and accordingly I think the mother is entitled to rank upon his estate." No. 103.

Lord Shand says,—“The claim for the aliment of an illegitimate child lies against both parents. The claim arises from the father and mother being the cause of the child’s existence. Primarily it is the child’s claim, but as the mother is bound to maintain the child, she has a claim against the father for contribution. Whether the claim is the claim of the child or the claim of the mother, it is the claim of a creditor, and accordingly I am of opinion that the mother is entitled to rank on the bankrupt estate of the admitted father of her illegitimate child.”

Feb. 27, 1892.
Oncken’s Judicial Factor v.
Reimers.

This case again was the case of a mother suing, but for the reasons I have previously stated, that can make no difference.

It will be observed that in the cases of Gairdner and Downs the claims were claims on sequestrated estates, in which legitimate children could have had no claim, but in both the claims of illegitimate children were sustained.

In Clarkson’s case there would appear to have been no legitimate children.

However inequitable, therefore, it may appear to be that in a case like the present the claim of an illegitimate child should be preferred to that of legitimate children, the law would appear to be clear on the subject.

We were referred to the case of Reid v. Moir, in which it was said that the late Lord President threw doubts on the authority of the case of Clarkson v. Fleming.

In the case of Reid v. Moir his Lordship had occasion to consider the reciprocal obligations of parents and their legitimate children, and in the course of his opinion referred to those of parents and their illegitimate children. I do not, however, gather from his opinion that he intended to express any dissent from the decision in Clarkson’s case. It appears to me that he merely gave expression to some criticisms on the terms in which some of the Judges had expressed their opinions, which he thought were somewhat loose and indiscriminating.

But however that may be, the observations there made were entirely obiter, and it appears to me that as the case of Clarkeon cannot be distinguished in principle from that of Downs, his Lordship’s opinion in the latter case must be taken as his final opinion on the subject.

Assuming the claim of the child in this case to be well founded, the question is as to the sum which ought to be retained by the judicial factor to meet the claim. The Accountant of Court is of opinion that £750 is the proper sum, and I see no reason to doubt that he is right.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD KINNAR concurred.

LORD M’LAREN was absent.

THE COURT authorised the judicial factor to set aside the sum of £750 for the maintenance of Reimers, and expenses connected therewith, and quoad ultra granted authority as craved.

At this date the last entered vassal had been dead for several years, although the fact was not then ascertained. In 1891, the superior raised an action against the proprietor in statutory form for payment of a casualty, it being by this time ascertained that the last entered vassal had died before 1873. The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) held that the casualty due was the rent of the subjects for the year 1873, the year in which the infeftment was registered. On a reclaiming note, held that the measure of the casualty was the rent of the year 1874, the year in which the statute giving the vassal an implied entry was passed.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

BY disposition dated 2d, 3d, and 5th May 1873, William Buchanan acquired certain subjects in the High Street of Johnstone, and having recorded this disposition in the General Register of Sasines, on 19th May 1873, was duly infeft in them as of that date.

On 30th March 1891 George Ludovic Houstoun, immediate lawful superior of the subjects so acquired by Buchanan, raised an action against him concluding for declarator that in consequence of the death of William Robertson, who was the vassal last vest and seized in the subjects, a casualty, being one year's rent of the said subjects, became due to the pursuer. There was a corresponding conclusion for payment of £65 being the rent for the year 1874.

The contest between the parties came to be confined to this, viz., which year's rent was to be taken as the measure of the casualty admittedly due. While the case was in the Outer-House no admission was made as to the year of Robertson's death; a proof was led, which was quite inconclusive on the point, and the pursuer contended that the year 1881, in which year Robertson would have attained 100 years of age must be taken as the year of his death, and that the rent of that year must be taken as the measure of the casualty.

The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling), however, rejected that year and took 1873, the year of infeftment, as the year the rent of which should determine the casualty,† and gave decree for £48, 1s.

* Section 4.—“When lands have been feued, whether before or after the commencement of this Act . . .

“(2) Every proprietor who is at the commencement of this Act, or thereafter shall be duly infeft in the lands shall be deemed and held to be, as at the date of the registration of such infeftment in the appropriate Register of Sasines, duly entered with the nearest superior . . . to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice . . . but such implied entry shall not be held to confer or confirm any right more extensive than those contained in the original charter or feu-right of the lands, or in the last charter or other writ by which the vassal was entered therein. . . .

“(3) . . . Provided always that such implied entry shall not entitle a superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could, by the law prior to this Act, or by the conditions of the feu-right, have required the vassal to enter to pay such casualty irrespective of his entering.”

† “OPINION.— . . . If the date of William Robertson's death were known, and that date had been subsequent to the infeftment of the defender, the year to be taken would be the year in which the death occurred. It could

In the Inner-House it was admitted that Robertson had died many years before 1873, and the pursuer now maintained that 1874 must furnish the standard for computing the rent, that being the year in which the statute giving right to demand it was passed. His interest to maintain 1874 as against 1873 was that there was a rise of rent in 1874 to the amount of £18 or thereby. It was further explained at the bar that the present action was a test action, and would rule many other cases in Johnstone.

Argued for the pursuer;—The meaning of the statute in short was that every infeftment was also a confirmation; but till the statute passed an infeftment had not that quality, and therefore the defender's infeftment in 1873 had not that quality. It first put on that character when the Act came into force. That then was the year the rent of which was to be taken, for by the old law the year's rent was paid when the charter of confirmation was given, in exchange for that charter, and the measure of the payment was necessarily the rent of that year. No statute was presumed to be retrospective; it must expressly be made so. Now, the provision as to the operation of confirmation did not necessarily imply a retrospective effect in this matter of payment. All that was meant was that the rights of the vassal were to be confirmed as from the date of the infeftment. That was so under the old law as much as under the new, and the statute said that its provisions were to have no further effect. If 1873 was taken as the year, then a casualty was due and payable before it was asked, i.e. before it was due, for no casualty was due till it was not be an earlier year, for subsection 3 of section 4 of the Conveyancing Act provides that the implied entry established by that Act shall not entitle a superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could have demanded it under the old law, and under the old law he could not have raised a declarator of non-entry to enforce payment of a casualty while the fee was full. Nor could it be a later year, for the only later year possible would be the year of demand, and that view was expressly rejected in the case of Stuart v. Murdoch, 19 S. L. R. 649, which was a judgment by Lord Curriehill acquiesced in by both parties.

"Here, however, it has not been found possible to fix the date of the last vassal's death. The pursuer came into Court alleging that he died 'about thirty years ago.' The proof, so far as it goes, supports the view that he died in America about forty years ago, and that his relatives went into mourning for him at the time. But there is nothing like a definite date assigned to the event, and the pursuer now invites me to adopt an arbitrary date, viz., the expiration of 100 years from the date of his birth, which happens to be known. It seems to me that there is no warrant for such a course, which would be inconsistent with the pursuer's own averments and with the tenor of the proof. A hundred years may mark the extreme limit of the presumption of life, but that is a very different thing from fixing the actual date of death.

"In these circumstances the only year which can be adopted is the year in which the defender was infeft; for that is the date from which, by force of the statute he must be held as having been duly entered with the superior. If authority be required for that proposition, I find it in Lord Curriehill's opinion (above cited), and also in Schedule B of the 1874 Act, which, in giving the form of a summons like the present, makes the date of the defender's infeftment the only alternative to the date of the last vassal's death. The reason obviously is that a casualty is primarily exigible for the year of entry (though of course it could not be demanded till the commencement of the Act), and it is postponed to a later year only where it can be shewn that the last entered vassal was alive at the date of the implied entry. Nobody can shew that here. The defender does not allege it. The pursuer has not proved it, and on record he alleges the contrary.

"The defender was infeft on 19th May 1873. I therefore take the year from Whitsunday 1873 to Whitsunday 1874. . . ."

asked. Again, suppose that in 1870 a vassal A sold to B with an a me holding, and B took infeftment. In 1872 A again feued to C with a de me holding and infeftment followed. If the superior then confirmed B's rights, then the result would be at common law that B would have a mere mid-superiority. But if the view of the defender as to the retroactive effect of the statute were sound B would have the full right, because C's title would flow a non habente potestatem. If such an anomalous interference with titles was the result of the defender's view it was plain that it could not be sound. The point now argued had never come up for decision. The cases¹ had turned upon the question whether the year of demand or the year of entry gave the proper measure of the casualty. This point as to the retroactive effect of the statute had not been argued, although Lord Shand had obiter favoured the pursuer's view.²

Argued for the defender;—Although it was true that this point had not been argued in the case of Stuart v. Murdoch,³ the rent of a year before the passing of the statute had been taken. Against Lord Shand's dictum might be set that of Lord Deas in the same case (The Straiton Estate Company). This much at all events had been settled by the cases referred to, viz., that it was not the rent of the year of demand, but the rent of the year of entry that was to be taken. Now, if that were so, then the words of the statute made it retrospective. To avoid giving them a retrospective effect the pursuer had to add to the words "as at the date of registration," these words "if that be subsequent to the statute, or if not, at the date of the statute." That anomalous results might arise was immaterial, for the statute in pursuit of its main object, the simplification of conveyancing, had left out of view a good many pecuniary results. Undoubtedly, superiors had been much benefited by its operations, although that had not been intended. However that might be, it was certain that the statute, q in taking the year of the death of the last entered vassal as the year in which casualty fell to be paid, where that was posterior to the statute, had made large pecuniary questions dependent on a mere accident. Hence it was vain to resist the plain interpretation of the words of the clause by the argument that the results were anomalous.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The defender in this case is the proprietor of certain heritages situated in Johnstone, held by him of and under the pursuer, who is the superior of the same. The defender acquired the subjects in 1873, and the conveyance in his favour is recorded on 19th May of that year, from which date he therefore stood infeft. The subjects were, at the date of the defender's infeftment, in non-entry, but he became entered with the superior by operation of the statute on 1st October 1874. The pursuer claims from the defender a casualty of a year's rent in respect of such entry, and this the defender admits to be due.

But the parties differ, and this is the only question between them, as to what year's rental is to be taken as the criterion or standard for fixing the amount due to the superior. The pursuer maintains that the rental of the year 1874 must be taken, that being the year of his vassal's entry; the defender, on the other hand, maintains that it is the rental of 1873, that being the year of his infeftment. The determination of this question depends on the construction of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, which provides (sec. 4, subsec. 2),—"Every proprietor who is at the commencement of this Act, or thereafter shall be, duly infeft in the lands, shall be deemed and held to be, as at the date of the registration of such infeftment, duly entered with the nearest superior, . . . to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice."

Buchanan.

The defender maintains the meaning of that provision to be that any proprietor infeft at the date of the Act should be held to be entered as at the date of his infeftment, and that, as the date of entry is the time at which the year's rental is to be taken for ascertaining the amount of the casualty, so the amount of composition due by him should be taken as at May 1873, the date of his infeftment, and, according to his view, the date also of his entry. This is the view which the Lord Ordinary has adopted, and a very plausible argument was submitted in support of it. But I differ from that view, which I think is not the meaning nor the fair construction of the Act.

In my opinion the entry, which was operated by force of statute, took place at 1st October 1874, the date when the Act came into operation, and no sooner. The defender was not entered with the superior, as matter of fact, before that date; he became an entered vassal then by force of the statutory provision. The words of the Act, that by such implied entry the vassal is to "be deemed and held to be" duly entered as at the date of his infeftment, must be read with the words that follow, viz., "to the same effect as if the superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice." When so read I do not think that the meaning of the provision is doubtful.

By the law and practice existing before 1874 a writ of confirmation had the effect of entering the vassal as from the date of his infeftment in any question with the superior. It perfected the vassal's title as from the date of his infeftment. But the date of the entry, as regarded any question of casualty, was the date of the writ of confirmation. Accordingly, when the statute provides that every entered vassal at its date should be thereby held and deemed entered as from the date of infeftment, to the same effect as if the superior had granted a writ of confirmation, it only provides that the implied or statutory entry shall have the same, but no greater effect than a writ of confirmation granted at its date by the superior would have had—they operate "to the same effect." While, therefore, the implied entry under the Act has the same retroactive effect as a writ of confirmation (and to declare that it has seems to me the purpose of the part of the clause I am dealing with), it does not interfere with any law or practice, or any claim which might be affected by the date of entry.

I think the defender's entry both in fact and law was at 1st October 1874, and therefore I am of opinion that the pursuer's casualty is to be ascertained on the basis of the year's rent from Whitsunday 1874 to Whitsunday 1875.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and gave decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

MRS MARGARET T. JAMIESON OR MACDIARMID AND HUSBAND, Defenders (Respondents).—Guthrie.

MR AND MRS MACDIARMID'S MARRIAGE-CONTRACT TRUSTEES, Defenders (Respondents).—Lord-Adv. Sir C. Pearson—Dundas.

Husband and Wife—Personal obligation of married woman—Novation.—Testamentary trustees, as directed by the testator, divided the residue of his estate among his son A and three daughters, each receiving over £4000. Ten years afterwards a claim was made upon the deceased's estate by a bank upon a cash-credit bond for £5000, in which the testator had become bound as cautioner for his son's firm of A and B, along with B's father.

A new transaction was then entered into in which A paid £2500 to the bank for B's share of the firm business, and a new cash-credit bond for £2500 was granted to the bank for A's behoof, which was signed by A, by the husbands of two of his sisters, and by the third sister, with consent and concurrence of her husband. The new bond proceeded on the narrative that the prior bond had been discharged, and the latter was delivered up by the bank.

A having become bankrupt, his two brothers-in-law who had signed the £2500 bond paid that sum to the bank, and obtained an assignation to the bond.

In an action by the assignees against the testator's third daughter for declaration that she and her separate estate were bound to relieve the pursuers of her share of the bond, held (1) that the £5000 bond had been discharged, and (2) that the defender having been a married woman when she signed the bond for £2500, it was not binding upon her,—diss. Lord Young, who was of opinion that the transaction was virtually a consent by the testator's representatives to B and his father getting a discharge on paying their half of the £5000 bond, and the continuance of the existing liability of the deceased's estate for the remainder by the granting of the new bond, and (2) that it was competent for the defender to enter into this transaction, and that she was liable under it, as she would have been under the original bond, to the extent of her share of her father's estate.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Low.

DR JOSEPH JACKSON, Denholme, Bradford, and Alexander Wylie, W.S. raised an action against Mrs Margaret Turnbull Jamieson or MacDiarmid, wife of Rev. A. MacDiarmid, and her husband as her administrator-in-law and also against the marriage-contract trustees of Mrs MacDiarmid, for declaration that Mrs MacDiarmid and her separate estate were bound to free and relieve the pursuers "of the obligations undertaken by them to her and for the benefit of her estate, and of the payments to the amount of £1006, 10s. 11d. made by the pursuers equally between them for her and for the benefit of her estate," under certain deeds to be referred to. The summons also contained a petitory conclusion for payment.

The circumstances in which the action was raised were as follows:—The late Peter Jamieson, merchant in Edinburgh, died on 21st January 1872. He was survived by a son James, and by three daughters, Jane, wife of the pursuer Mr Wylie, Jane, wife of the pursuer Dr Jackson, and the female defender, who was then unmarried.

By Mr Jamieson's settlement he directed his trustees to divide his estate among his four children at the first term of one year after the youngest should reach majority. The female defender was the youngest and had attained majority when her father died.

The trustees, among whom were the testator's son James Jamieson and his son-in-law Alexander Wylie, who acted as agent for the trustees, divided the residue of the estate among the testator's four children, each receiving £4717, 8s. 0½d., and on 11th December 1873 they granted the trustees a discharge of their whole actings and intromissions.

During his life Mr Jamieson had taken the titles of certain heritable property himself, and to his then unmarried daughter Margaret (Mrs MacDiarmid).

as substitute to him. Her share of the succession thus amounted in all No. 105.
to £6000.

Mrs MacDiarmid was married in 1875. By an antenuptial contract of marriage then entered into, she conveyed her whole property, heritable and moveable, to trustees for the purpose, inter alia, "of paying any debts or obligations due or contracted by her prior to the celebration of her marriage." Mar. 1, 1892.
Jackson v.
MacDiarmid.

The pursuers stated that it appeared after the division of the estate that Mr Jamieson had at the time of his death been bound as a cautioner in a cash-credit to the National Bank for £5000, dated 16th and 18th October 1871, Mr James Jamieson, the son, having gone into partnership as a brewer with a Mr Jenkinson, and Mr Peter Jamieson and Mr Jenkinson's father having each become cautioner to the bank, but being liable inter se for half the sum; that this sum was all drawn out and not repaid; that the estate had been divided without the trustees, other than James Jamieson, becoming aware of the existence of the bond.

They further stated that in 1885 this amount of £5000 was claimed by the bank from Mr Jenkinson and the beneficiaries on Mr Peter Jamieson's estate; that James Jamieson was then taking over the whole business of Jamieson & Jenkinson, and arranged to take over Jenkinson's half of the bond, and actually paid up £2500 with interest to the bank; that there remained the other £2500, for which all the beneficiaries on Peter Jamieson's estate were liable to the bank. (Cond. 4) "The original bond could then have been put in force against the defender Mrs MacDiarmid and her estate for the half then remaining unpaid, with relief as accords. She was saved immediate payment of this half by the interposition of the pursuers, and her concurrence with them in a new bond. This half it was then arranged should be transferred to a new account opened in name of the said James Jamieson, and the pursuers, along with the defenders Mrs MacDiarmid and her husband, recognised their liability therefor to the bank, and obtained delay, the pursuers as acting for the respective wives, and Mrs MacDiarmid acting for herself with the concurrence of her husband. A new bond of cash-credit for £2500 was accordingly granted to the bank, dated 28th, 29th, and 31st December 1885 (quoted below).

. . . By the new bond the said defender acknowledged liability for the said £2500 remaining unpaid of the original debt of £5000 owing by her father and his estate, with accruing interest of not less than 5 per cent per annum, along with the said James Jamieson as the principal obligant, and the pursuers as, along with her, his cautioners. The defender Mrs MacDiarmid and her estate took benefit by the pursuers' interposition. Neither she nor they desired or intended that she should obtain this benefit gratuitously, or that her just share of the family liability as at her father's death should be transferred to and borne by the pursuers without recourse against her and her estate. The pursuers never in any way discharged this right of recourse for her share. No discharge of the original bond for £5000 was granted by the bank. In the new bond for £2500 the discharge of the original bond for £5000 is narrated as conditional on the said payment of the half thereof by the said James Jamieson, and on the granting of the new cash-credit by the said James Jamieson as principal obligant, and by the pursuers and the defender Mrs MacDiarmid and her husband as cautioners. The counter statements (quoted infra) are denied. Shortly after the date of the second bond the first bond was handed by the bank to Mr Wylie intact, to be held, as it now is held, for himself and his co-pursuer as their voucher or document of debt until Mrs MacDiarmid's share is paid. The deletion of the deceased William Jenkinson's name was thereafter made by the agent for his trustees and representatives,

No. 105. as in pursuance of the arrangement above mentioned, for James Jamieson taking over the business. Mrs MacDiarmid and her husband were, at and from the date of the second bond, fully aware that Mrs MacDiarmid's liability was thereby continued as for half the original bond; they made repeated inquiries as to the principal obligant's business, and they, in all their dealings with the pursuers and other members of the Jamieson family, held themselves out as fully recognising Mrs MacDiarmid's continued liability, and as accepting their equal share in this family obligation." . . . (Cond. 5) "The pursuers were compelled by the bank on 27th February 1890 to pay to them, and for the benefit of Mrs MacDiarmid and her estate, her third, amounting to £833, 6s. 8d., with interest from 31st December 1885, amounting to £170, 15s. 5d., and the further sum of £2, 8s. 10d. of expenses—in all, £1006, 10s. 11d. The counter statements are denied."

Jackson v.
MacDiarmid.

The pursuers produced the original cash-credit bond for £5000. They also produced the cash-credit bond for £2500 granted as above stated in 1885.*

They also produced an assignation by the bank, dated 15th June 1891, of the cash-credit of 1885 for £2500 in favour of the pursuers.

Separate defences were lodged for Mr and Mrs MacDiarmid, and for their marriage-contract trustees. The former defenders stated;—(Ans. 4) "Explained that Mr and Mrs MacDiarmid were pressed to sign the bond by the said Alexander Wylie in ignorance of the real state of affairs, and without having an opportunity of consulting an independent agent. The personal obligation granted by the defender Mrs MacDiarmid, as a married woman, is null, and cannot be enforced, and the pursuers have therefore no right of relief against her. Although no formal discharge of the original bond for £5000 was granted by the bank, the said bond was delivered to the said Alexander Wylie in exchange for the new bond

* "I, James Jamieson, . . . and we, Alexander Wylie, . . . Doctor Joseph Jackson, Denholme, Bradford, and Mrs Margaret Jamieson or MacDiarmid, wife of the Reverend Alexander MacDiarmid, . . . with the consent and concurrence of the said Reverend Alexander MacDiarmid—Considering" (the cash-credit bond for £5000 was here narrated), "and that said cash-credit has since been operated on to the full extent: And considering further that the said firm of Jamieson & Jenkinson has now been dissolved, and that I, the said James Jamieson, am now to carry on the business of brewer and maltster on my own account and for my own behoof, and that one-half of said cash-credit, viz., £2500, has now been paid into said bank account on behalf of me, the said James Jamieson, and in respect of the cash-credit hereinafter written the said cash-credit for £5000 has been discharged: Therefore I, the said James Jamieson, and we, the said Alexander Wylie, Joseph Jackson, and Mrs Margaret Jamieson or MacDiarmid, with consent of the said Alexander MacDiarmid—Considering that the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, have agreed to allow us credit on a current account to be kept in the books of said bank in name of me the said James Jamieson, and to be operated on by me, or by anyone duly authorised by me, and that to the extent of £2500 sterling, on these presents being granted, have therefore bound and obliged, likeas we, the said James Jamieson, Alexander Wylie, Joseph Jackson, and Mrs Margaret Jamieson or MacDiarmid, with consent and concurrence foresaid, hereby bind and oblige ourselves, conjunctly and severally, each as full debtor, . . . to repay to the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, aforesaid, or assignees thereof, on demand, the foresaid principal sum of £2500, or whatever portion thereof may appear to be due to said bank on the foresaid current account, and also whatever monies the said bank have advanced or may advance, or have or may become engaged for on account of the said James Jamieson."

for £2500. The bond for £5000 was delivered to the said Alexander Wylie on 5th January 1886, a few days after the new bond for £2500 was signed by Mrs MacDiarmid. The bank would, if called on, have granted a discharge of the said bond, but the usual practice in such cases is for the bank to deliver the bond itself when paid or satisfied, and to regard delivery as equivalent to discharge. Apart from this, the signature of William Jenkinson, one of the granters of the said bond for £5000, was deleted before the bond was delivered to the said Alexander Wylie, and in this way the bond was effectually cancelled."

MacDiarmid.

The marriage-contract trustees stated ;—(Ans. 4) "The new bond, dated in December 1885, bears to be and was granted by Mrs MacDiarmid and the other granters, not as the representatives of Peter Jamieson, but as individuals. On the narrative, inter alia, that the said cash-credit for £5000 had been discharged, the bank, in respect of said new bond, granted a new and independent credit to the extent of £2500, as therein set forth. The obligation against Peter Jamieson contained in the original cash-credit bond was by said new bond, and in respect of the consideration therein set forth, extinguished and discharged, and could not thereafter be enforced against his representatives. A new and independent account was accordingly opened in the bank's books in name of James Jamieson, beginning with the entry, '1886, Jany. 27. To cash, £2500,' and bearing no reference to the prior account in name of Jamieson and Jenkinson." They further stated,—(Ans. 5) "Explained that by the marriage-contract after referred to, dated 10th June 1875, Mrs MacDiarmid conveyed to these defenders as trustees her whole property, heritable and moveable, for the purpose, inter alia, of paying 'any debts or obligations due or contracted by her prior to the celebration of' her marriage, which took place in 1875. No obligation which Mrs MacDiarmid may have incurred in respect of the said cash-credit bond in 1885 falls within the terms of the said direction in the marriage-contract. Mrs MacDiarmid had after her marriage no power to effectually burden her estate by personal obligations. The assignation by the bank to the pursuers is referred to for its terms. Explained that it assigns to them only the said new cash-credit bond for £2500."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The defender Mrs MacDiarmid and her separate estate being liable for and burdened with the sums of principal and interest now sued for, and the pursuers having advanced the same for the benefit of her and her estate, they are entitled to be reimbursed for the same, as concluded for. (2) The pursuers having paid the defender Mrs MacDiarmid's share under her bond along with them to the bank, they are entitled to repayment of the same from her and her estate. (3) The pursuers having incurred obligations and made payments for a debt of the defender Mrs MacDiarmid and her estate contracted before and continued by the pursuers' interposition for her benefit after her marriage, they are entitled to decree against her and her marriage-contract trustees, in terms of the conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

Mr and Mrs MacDiarmid pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuers' averments, so far as directed against these defenders, are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The cash-credit bond for £5000 having been discharged by novation, Mrs MacDiarmid, as one of her father's representatives or otherwise, is not liable in respect of his obligations thereunder. (3) The defender Mrs MacDiarmid having been a married woman at the date of the said bond for £2500, she is not liable to implement the obligations contained therein.

The marriage-contract trustees pleaded ;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons as against these defenders. (2) These defenders ought to be assoltized, with expenses, in respect that the estate under their charge as trustees foresaid is not liable in payment of the sum sued for, nor any part thereof. (3) The cash-credit bond for £5000 having been discharged by novation, Mrs MacDiarmid, as one of her father's representatives, is not liable in respect of his obligation thereunder. (4) Mrs MacDiarmid's obligation under the cash-credit bond for £2500 being a new obligation contracted after the date of her said marriage-contract, these defenders are neither bound nor entitled to make payment to the pursuers as concluded for.

—The Lord Ordinary (Low), on 14th November 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the first and third pleas in law for the defenders Mr and Mrs MacDiarmid, and the first four pleas in law for the defenders Mr and Mrs MacDiarmid's marriage-contract trustees: Assoltizes the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—If in 1885, before the bond of cash-credit, to which the pursuers and the defenders Mr and Mrs MacDiarmid were parties, was granted, the bank had demanded payment from Mrs MacDiarmid and her marriage-contract trustees of the sum for which Mr Peter Jamieson, if alive, would have been liable under the cash-credit bond of 1871, I do not think that either Mrs MacDiarmid or her trustees could have resisted the claim. The claim when it emerged was a good claim against Mr Peter Jamieson's estate, whether in the hands of his testamentary trustees before division or in the hands of beneficiaries after division. Mrs MacDiarmid would have been liable in so far as she was lucrata by succession to her father, and her trustees, apart from the clause in the contract obliging them to pay her antenuptial debts, would, I apprehend, have been liable to the same extent, because they, as her assignees, were only entitled to the amount to which she had right under her father's settlement, and the result of a debt due by her father's estate, emerging after division among the beneficiaries, would simply have been to shew that she, or her trustees as in her right, had received more than they were entitled to.

"The claim of the bank under the first bond was not, however, met by payment, but a new bond was substituted for the old bond, and in my opinion the obligation under the old bond discharged. It is true that there was no formal or separate discharge of the old bond, but the new bond narrates that, 'in respect of the cash-credit hereinafter written, the said cash-credit for £5000 has been discharged,' and the old bond was delivered over to Mr Wylie, one of the obligants under the new bond. It thus appears to be clear that, so far as the creditor—the bank—was concerned, the obligation under the old bond was satisfied and extinguished.

"It was only, however, in respect of the obligation under the old bond that any liability could attach to the funds in the hands of Mrs MacDiarmid's trustees. The case would not, I think, be different if, instead of the claim being under a cautionary obligation undertaken by Mr Peter Jamieson, it had been for a debt incurred by him during his lifetime, which his trustees had omitted to pay before dividing the estate. If in such a case a third party had paid the debt, the creditor could of course have had no claim against Mrs MacDiarmid's trustees, and the third party who paid the debt could have had no claim unless he had obtained an assignation of the debt and claimed as in the creditor's right. Here the pursuers hold no assignation of Mr Peter Jamieson's obligation, and they do not sue as in right of the creditor. They simply say that they have paid or satisfied a debt which the trustees might have been called upon to pay, and that therefore the trustees are bound to relieve them. I do not think that there is any warrant in law for such a claim, and therefore I assoltize Mrs MacDiarmid's trustees.

"The claim, however, is also made against Mrs MacDiarmid, and it is necessary to consider what her position is. She, and her husband as co-tenants,

The pursuers reclaimed. They argued;—The debt which the pursuers had paid was a debt which belonged to Peter Jamieson, and the defender Mrs MacDiarmid, to the extent she was lucrata by the succession, was liable for it.¹ It was said that the old bond was at an end, having been discharged by novation, and that Mrs MacDiarmid was not liable under the new one. But the new one for £2500 was just a transference to a new account of an existing obligation in which she was liable, and her liability was not altered.² A transaction including a personal obligation by her, though a married woman, in taking over an inheritance, that she would guarantee a debt connected with it was good.³ Apparently the Lord Ordinary would have thought novation not operated, and that the pursuers were right if they had had an assignation to the original bond for £5000. The pursuers were willing to obtain that, though they held it to be unnecessary.⁴ Even if the cash-credit bond for £2500 were held to be quite a new obligation instead of being a mere transcription of an old one, it was at least in rem versum of Mrs MacDiarmid, and should were parties to the bond of cash-credit of 1885. The pursuers have paid the amount in the bond, and have obtained an assignation, and they now claim payment from Mrs MacDiarmid of her share. Mrs MacDiarmid pleads, however, that, having been a married woman at the date of the bond, her obligation, even although granted with the consent of her husband, is null. I think that the question is whether Mrs MacDiarmid's bond was enforceable in a question with the bank, because if it was not, the pursuers cannot claim either as assignees of the bank, or on the ground that Mrs MacDiarmid was bound to the bank along with them as co-cautioner. It was conceded that the husband's consent did not make the bond good if it would otherwise have been null, but it was contended that the object of the bond being to postpone payment of a debt which otherwise might have been enforced against Mrs MacDiarmid's estate, in so far as derived from her father, the obligation must be held to be in rem versum of her and therefore enforceable. No doubt at the time when Mrs MacDiarmid signed the bond, the bank might have made a claim against her as representing her father, and she became a party to the bond in order to carry over the claim, and in the hope probably that she might never be called upon to fulfil her obligation. I do not think, however, that that was a transaction in rem versum of Mrs MacDiarmid of a kind which renders a personal obligation of a married woman enforceable. The present case seems to me to be ruled by the decision in Ewing v. Lady Strathmore's Trustees, 9 S. p. 558. There Lady Strathmore had prior to her marriage granted a bill. After her marriage she granted a renewal bill for the sum in the first bill, with interest and expenses, the first bill being discharged. It was held that Ewing could not claim on the first bill, it being discharged, and that the second bill, being granted after marriage, could create no obligation against Lady Strathmore. I think that all the arguments which were adduced for the pursuers in the present case were open to Ewing in his claim against Lady Strathmore's trustees, and there is not, to my mind, any such difference between the circumstances of the two cases as to render the principle which was applied in the one inapplicable to the other. It is important to remember that the claim of the pursuers against Mrs MacDiarmid is rested entirely upon the second bond. They hold an assignation to that bond, but they have no assignation to the first bond, or for the rights of the bank thereunder, against Mr Peter Jamieson and his representatives. If they had held such an assignation, the result might have been different, but I must deal with the case as it stands."

bind her. But for it she would have been liable to the bank on the old bond, but in arranging that liability she obtained the benefit of coming under this less liability. In any view, she could bind the income of her separate estate, which was not alimentary, and the pursuers ought to be allowed to make good the claim out of the income.¹

Argued for the marriage-contract trustees and Mr and Mrs MacDiarmid;—The foundation of the pursuers' claim was not the old debt but a new one. The old bond was discharged; the new one itself, to which alone they had an assignation, said so. If it were a new obligation, and one arising after marriage, the marriage-contract trustees would not be liable under the terms of their conveyance.

Mrs MacDiarmid further argued;—The obligation in the bond of 1885 was not binding on Mrs MacDiarmid as a married woman. No doubt there were exceptions to the rule that a married woman could not bind herself by a personal obligation. These arose (1) if the transaction was in rem versum of her, or (2) if it represented an obligation previously existing upon her. But neither exception existed here. The case of Ewing quoted by the Lord Ordinary was quite in point.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question in this case is, whether the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs MacDiarmid are, or separately Mrs MacDiarmid as an individual is, liable to pay to two co-obligants in a cash-credit bond for £2500 the proportion for which she is bound in the bond. The history of the case is that Mr Peter Jamieson, a good many years ago, had a cash-credit bond in the bank for £5000, and in 1885 an arrangement was made by which a part of the money—£2500—was paid up. But a new bond was entered into by Mrs MacDiarmid and the two pursuers for £2500, and the question is, in the first place, whether under that cash-credit bond the trustees of Mrs MacDiarmid can be called upon out of the trust-estate in their hands to pay the proportion effeiring to Mrs MacDiarmid.

Now, it is to be noticed that the original bond for £5000, for her proportion of which, as succeeding to Mr Jamieson, Mrs MacDiarmid would have been liable, and which might have been exacted from her share before the estate was handed over to the trustees, if it was sufficient to meet it, or to such extent it was not, was, though not discharged in actual form, delivered up by the creditor, the bank, and the obligation under it was extinguished,—the creditor, the bank, being satisfied that the time had come for giving up the bond. In these circumstances I agree with the Lord Ordinary, in the first place, that there can be no claim against Mrs MacDiarmid's marriage-contract trustees in regard to the new cash-credit bond for £2500.

The pursuers also claim against Mrs MacDiarmid. They say:—"We were called upon to pay up the sum in that bond for £2500; we have done so, and Mrs MacDiarmid must now pay her share." The pursuers' case is that they have been called upon to pay up a certain sum in a cash-credit bond, that they have paid it up, and that Mrs MacDiarmid, whose name is in the bond, must pay up her share. That really comes to the simple question whether, supposing they had not paid up, the bank could have called upon her to pay up.

After considering the matter, I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that the bank could not—that Mrs MacDiarmid was not in a position, being a married woman, to incur this personal obligation. No. 105.

We must, accordingly, I think, adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Mar. 1, 1892.
Jackson v.
MacDiarmid.

LORD YOUNG.—Mrs MacDiarmid's share of her father's succession—her father died in 1872—amounted, we are informed upon record—there is no evidence—to about £6000. She married in 1875, and the money being still extant, undiminished, she put it into the hands of her marriage trustees under an antenuptial contract for her and her husband in succession in liferent, and her children in fee. In respect of this succession of hers, and only in respect of it, and within the amount of it, she was liable for a debt of her deceased father from whom she got it. The amount of that debt was £5000, and the creditor therein was the National Bank.

We are informed that in 1885 the debt was brought formally as an existing obligation, of which payment was then required by the bank, before the beneficiaries on Mr Jamieson's (the father's) estate—that is, before Mrs MacDiarmid and her husband, and her two sisters and their husbands. In that year the bank demanded payment of this debt of £5000, and she, and her husband as her curator, were required to consider a proposal whereby, on the one hand, the amount of the debt was to be reduced to £2500, and on the other hand two individuals, or rather one individual and the estate of the other, who were bound as joint obligants along with her, were to be discharged. I shall immediately notice, so far as I think necessary, the details of the proposal, but in the meantime I point out that it regarded a then existing liability attaching to Mrs MacDiarmid in respect, and only in respect, of her separate estate inherited from her father. And the primary, most general, and most interesting question in the case seems to be, whether or not a married woman with a separate estate, and who in respect of it is under a certain liability which is enforceable against it or out of it, can, with the consent of her husband, lawfully enter into a transaction respecting that liability of hers.

That a particular transaction may be impeached as unconscionable or inequitable I assume, but the question which I now propound is only this—whether any transaction whatever with a married woman on such a matter is impossible according to the law of Scotland. That question necessarily implies the existing relation of debtor and creditor between the married woman and the party proposing or willing to transact with her, and I cannot assent to the proposition that the law prohibits a married woman from transacting with her creditor upon any terms, however just and however advantageous to her and to her estate, which she holds subject to that creditor's debt. Nor does it signify, in my opinion, that the transaction proposed involves, whether of necessity or mere convenience in carrying it out, the granting of a new obligation by her to her creditor. Further, I think it is immaterial to the question of her legal ability to transact that her creditor had other debtors bound jointly with her in the same debt, and that they also were parties to the transaction.

Now, it is the Lord Ordinary's opinion, and assented to by all the parties, that in 1885 Mrs MacDiarmid was debtor to the National Bank for £5000 in respect of the cash-credit bond of 1871, to which her father was a party, and that her separate estate was subject to be attached in payment. On the other hand, she was, as matters stood, entitled to demand total relief from each of

No. 105. James Jamieson, her brother, and William Jenkinson junior, relief to the extent of one-half from William Jenkinson senior, or rather from his representatives, for he was dead in 1885, and a rateable proportion from each of her two sisters, who were in exactly the same position as herself.

Mar. 1, 1892.
Jackson v.
MacDiarmid.

Now, with no evidence before us and no averment, I am not in a position to estimate what was the value of that right of relief against the Jenkinsons. It may have been more or less valuable, or altogether worthless. I cannot tell; I have no means of knowing.

Such exactly was her position when the transaction immediately in question was proposed. The proposal was that Jenkinson senior's estate and Jenkinson junior should pay to the creditor £2500, being one-half of the debt, and be discharged from the obligation. Whether they were good for that without aid from others I cannot tell, or whether they were good for more, or whether that claim of relief against them for any part of the other half would have been worth a farthing, I cannot tell. The proposal was that the Jenkinsons should pay £2500, being one-half of the debt, and be discharged of their obligation, and that the remaining half should stand as a debt of James Jamieson and of Mrs MacDiarmid, and her two sisters, or their husbands, who were willing to be bound for their wives.

It is, I think, plainly immaterial with whom the proposal originated, or what were the motives for it. It seems just and reasonable enough on the face of it. It clearly could not be effected without being submitted to the obligants, and intelligently consented to by them, and by every person interested, and primarily by the creditor (the National Bank), who was demanding payment of the whole £5000, and had admittedly a good claim against all the obligants in the bond for the whole. That the proposal was submitted and intelligently assented to by the bank is clear enough. They were willing to take payment of one-half of the debt and to discharge the Jenkinsons, although the Jenkinsons were liable to them for the whole. But they were also willing, as a matter of prudence, to take payment of one-half of the debt and discharge the Jenkinsons, and to take the members of the Jamieson family as the only debtors for the other half.

The creditor in the debt being thus content to assent to the proposal, were the debtors also content and in a position validly to signify that they were. That they did each and all of them in fact signify consent, is undoubted and admitted. Whether or not Mrs MacDiarmid could validly do so is the only question. It may, I think, be assumed that the state of matters as existing when the proposal was submitted could not be changed, whether to her prejudice or benefit, without her consent and that of her husband; but the proposition now urged is that she and her husband were not at liberty to consider the proposal for a change, and must of legal necessity reject any such proposal however beneficial in their opinion and in fact, so that their assent to any change must be set aside as illegal and invalid. That is not according to my view. Confining myself to the question of Mrs MacDiarmid and her husband's power to act in that matter, I am of opinion that they were at liberty to consider any proposal for a modification or change of a subsisting debt upon their own estate, and to assent to it or not as they saw fit. This, however, is subject also to the operation of the rules of law and equity, according to which a married woman may repudiate an obligation into which, even with her husband's consent, she has been misled to her prejudice.

I have said enough to indicate that, in my opinion, differing from that which your Lordship has expressed, the validity of Mrs MacDiarmid's obligation by No. 105. the bond of 1885 cannot be considered irrespective of the obligation which was clearly and admittedly upon her in the bond of 1871, if, as I have pointed out, that prior and immediately enforceable obligation was what she and her husband were dealing with and arranging when they subscribed the bond of 1885. What they had to consider, and I have no doubt did consider, was whether it was reasonable and for her advantage to substitute the one obligation for the other. To represent the two as unconnected, and to take the last as a voluntary, gratuitous, cautionary obligation by a married woman is, I think, unreasonable, and indeed contrary to the fact.

Mar. 1, 1892.
MacDiarmid.

In the interest of Mrs MacDiarmid and her sisters it may or may not have been judicious and prudent to consent to the discharge of the Jenkinsons on payment of one-half only of the existing debt in consideration of the consequent restriction of their own liability to the other half. That was the question which they and their husbands, charged with their interests, had to consider and make up their minds upon. They did so, and I venture to ask, what reason have we to affirm that they did not judge and act sensibly and prudently in the matter?

In the account of the bank under the old bond, £5000 stood at the debit of James Jamieson and William Jenkinson. Under the new arrangement, with the new bond substituted for the old, one moiety or £2500 was discharged, while the other moiety was put to the debit of James Jamieson alone, with Mrs MacDiarmid and her sisters and their husbands as cautioners. We are told—I have already observed that we have no evidence in the case at all—but we are told that “the said James Jamieson never made any payments to account of the said £2500 remaining outstanding from the date of the new cash-credit bond in December 1885, nor of the interest accruing thereon. This sum was merely the half of the original credit of £2500 for which Peter Jamieson's estate was liable, transferred to James Jamieson's name on the continued security of the beneficiaries on his father's estate, including Mrs MacDiarmid for her share in that estate. James Jamieson left this £2500 standing overdrawn, as it had always stood, after as before the date of the new bond.”

I think it will appear sufficiently from what I have said that what was proposed, considered, and assented to, was merely the discharge of the Jenkinsons upon payment of one-half of the debt by them. The granting of a new obligation or a new bond had really no effect in the matter. If Mrs MacDiarmid and her husband, and the other sisters and their husbands, had simply signified their assent to the discharge by the bank to the Jenkinsons upon payment of £2500, thereby giving up their claim of relief against them, and accepting the limitation of their own obligation to the other £2500, everything would have happened exactly as it did. The £2500 would have stood undiminished at the debit of the account, and the cautioners would have been liable for it, and could not have pleaded the discharge of the Jenkinsons, to which they had assented, as any ground for relieving them, as without such consent they might, upon the rule of law that a creditor in a debt cannot discharge any of the cautioners without the consent of the others, or if he does he will liberate the others as well as those whom he has consented to discharge. But everything would have been exactly the same without any new bond at all upon the liberation of the Jenkinsons upon paying up one-half of the debt being consented to. The amount of the debt would have been the same—£2500 paid up, the remaining £2500 standing, not one whit of difference being made by its being put to the debit of James Jamieson instead of James Jamieson and William Jenkinson.

In the absence of evidence I am unable to say that that arrangement was detrimental to the interests of Mrs MacDiarmid. Her interests and those of her sisters were identical, and in the absence of anything to the contrary I feel constrained to attach importance to the judgment of all the parties at the time, on which they certainly acted. Under the arrangement, assuming its validity, Mrs MacDiarmid's share of the ultimate loss is about £800. Can we affirm judicially that she was misled into it to her injury, and that her loss would have been less or nil had the proposal of 1885, which she and her husband assented to, been rejected? Her liability is measured, as the Lord Ordinary points out, by the amount of what she got from her father. But her liability would remain whatever she did with it—although she spent it. Her liability for the debt of her father by the bond of 1871 is measured by the amount of her succession to him. She put the amount of her succession into the hands of marriage trustees. Now, the question whether or not the pursuers have a direct claim against the capital of the fund in the hands of the marriage trustees is, I think, a subsidiary question, and it may be a question of no interest whatever. I do not know what amount of separate estate Mrs MacDiarmid may have. I have no information. Of course if there are no funds recoverable the pursuers will take nothing by any decree, but if she has estate to meet the claim, irrespective of the funds in the hands of the marriage trustees, that will certainly be liable, and may be attached.

She has been drawing the liferent of this £6000, we are told, for the last seventeen years. I do not know whether that has been accumulating or not. I have no means of knowing, very likely it has, or to a considerable extent. She continues to draw the liferent, that is the income, of this £6000 termly, and will as long as she lives, and her husband thereafter through her, that is to say, through her succession to her father, and through her making a disposition of what she succeeded to, will also enjoy it if he survives her. I should think that if there is separate estate, the protection of the children's interest in these funds in the hands of the marriage trustees ought to have effect.

I said it was a subsidiary question, and possibly one of no interest whatever, whether there is a direct claim upon the capital, for the trustees would be entitled to retain the income for the future until this £800 was made up. It would be a substantial benefit, I assume, to the pursuers to have decree establishing her liability and their liability if there is any separate estate, and that would be quite consistent with the protection of these funds in the hands of the marriage trustees so far as the children are concerned.

Liability of this sort is not to be got quit of by putting the possession of the fund in the hands of marriage trustees, any more than it is got quit of by spending it. It would not have been affected in the least degree, although the remedy might have been diminished, if it had been spent upon her trousseau or spent in any other way. She is still liable to the extent of her succession to her father, and her liability in respect of that is what she arranged by the arrangement and transaction leading to the bond of 1885.

Your Lordship has said—and I entirely agree with it—that the question is the same as if the bank had been demanding payment. The bank has been paid. The other two sisters were married to gentlemen who were too honest and honourable not to stand by the obligation under which they came. Accordingly they have paid the bank. It has been observed that there is a technical No. 105.

 plea open to Mrs MacDiarmid from the form of the obligation, viz., that it is by her with her husband's consent, which is not open to them, because they ^{Mar. 1, 1892.}
 came forward directly and undertook the obligation in respect of their wives' ^{Jackson v.}
 succession to their father. But if they (the pursuers) had not paid, the bank ^{MacDiarmid.}
 would have been the claimants; and supposing the bank claimed the £800 from Mrs MacDiarmid and her husband under the obligation in that bond, could they say they never meant to implement it, that they did not mean the bank to discharge the Jenkinsons as with their consent and in reliance upon the obligation which they expressed in that bond which they handed to the bank, and when the bank came to demand payment upon that bond upon which they desired the bank to rely, could they say,—“Oh! Mrs MacDiarmid is a married woman and is not liable, we never meant to pay, we intended to deceive you”; or if that was not their intention at the time, what has occurred to justify that contention now?

I think the case would have been all the same, had the bank been making a demand upon that bond which was given to them containing her and her husband's consent to the discharge of the Jenkinsons on the footing that they would not be liable for the other half of the debt, notwithstanding there was no relief against the Jenkinsons as there was before. I think that defence to an action at the bank's instance demanding payment would have been bad.

It only makes the case more heartless that Mrs MacDiarmid and her husband are proposing to throw the whole liability upon the other two sisters and their husbands. I could not express my opinion of that conduct without using strong language.

My opinion is that this bond is enforceable according to its terms, as being substituted in modification of a prior and admitted obligation for a larger amount, and that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought therefore to be altered.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD TRAYNER.—If I could distinguish in this case between what is to be considered the equity of the pursuers' claim and the legal rules which seem to me to determine the rights of the pursuers, I should have a good deal of sympathy with the claim the pursuers put forward against the defenders. But I do not think I am entitled to proceed upon equity when the rights of parties are clearly determined by the strict rules of law. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment, which I think is according to law, should be affirmed.

(in respect of which payment the other creditors at that time granted discharges), and who had subsequently received 2s. per £1, objected to his obtaining decree. There were four other creditors, and the applicant stated in his examination that he proposed, when able, to pay them in full, but not to make any arrangement with the objecting creditor, and that it was diligence used by him that had led to the presentation of the application. The Sheriff on this ground, and because there were practically no assets, refused the application. The Court recalled this judgment, and remitted to grant decree of cessio.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of
 Lanarkshire.

JOHN SPROUL, journeyman joiner, 244 Cumberland Street, Glasgow. raised a process of cessio in the Sheriff Court there. He stated that he was notour bankrupt, was unable to pay his debts, and that his inability to pay his debts arose through misfortunes and business losses.

According to the state of affairs Sproul's only assets were worth £3, 5s. The state shewed that there were five creditors, whose debts amounted in all to £56, 7s. 3d. The chief creditor was James M'Cusker, commission-agent, to whom Sproul owed £27, 10s. 3d. He opposed the granting of cessio. One of the others was Sproul's mother-in-law, to whom he owed £11, and his landlord, to whom he owed £13, 10s. The other two were tradesmen.

The state of affairs also shewed that Sproul had previously been in business as a grocer, but in 1889 had been obliged to grant a trust for creditors, under which they received 3s. per £1.

From the examination of Sproul it appeared that M'Cusker, the objecting creditor, was then a creditor for the same debt, and had received the dividend. The debt arose from M'Cusker having signed bills for Sproul to enable him to buy out his partner in the grocery business.

The other creditors under the trust-deed had discharged Sproul on receiving their dividend, but M'Cusker had not. The application for cessio was brought in consequence of arrestments of wages and a pointing used by M'Cusker, whereby he had obtained £1, 18s., or other 2s. per £1 on his debt. The other creditors at the date of the application for cessio were not pressing their claims.

Sproul deponed with regard to the creditors other than M'Cusker,—"I intend to pay them when I am able," further, with regard to M'Cusker—"I have already offered to pay M'Cusker £18, 10s. M'Cusker offered to accept £15 in full of his debt before the presentation of the petition. I do not propose to make any arrangement now."

Sproul's wages, when fully employed, were 34s. a-week, but on an average over the year about 25s. per week. He offered to assign them to the extent of £5 for behoof of his creditors.

The Sheriff-substitute (Birnie), on 17th September 1891, gave decree of cessio.*

* "NOTE.—If the case of Hairstens, 13 R. 207, is to be read as meaning that cessio is incompetent in the absence of substantial assets, this cessio is incompetent; but Lord Shand differed in that case, and, as I read the succeeding case of Reid, 1890, 17 R. 757, there is no absolute rule. As explained by Lord Shand in both cases, cessio is the equivalent of sequestration in small estates, and is the commencement of discharge; and it is a question of circumstances whether it ought to be granted or not. In the decisions, so far as reported either in the Supreme or the Sheriff Courts, the verdict has generally been against the debtor; but in the present case no improper conduct is averred. The opposing creditor has already obtained more than 5s. per £, and he is the only creditor opposing. It seems to me the debtor ought to be permitted in such circumstances to commence the proceedings necessary for his discharge. When he applies for his discharge, it will then be open to consider if he should give over some portion of his income to the opposing creditor. In some instances M'Cusker appealed.

The Sheriff (Berry), on 21st November 1891, recalled the interlocutor, and dismissed the petition.*

Sproul appealed.¹

No. 106.

M'Cusker.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The appellant has been hardly dealt with in this case. It is necessary to look into the circumstances in which the present respondent appealed to the Sheriff against the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute granting cessio. This applicant for the benefit of cessio is a working joiner, earning, when fully employed, 34s. a-week. Unfortunately for him he went into business as a shopkeeper some time ago and was unsuccessful, and since then his circumstances have been bad. At the time of his failure in business he executed a trust-deed for creditors, and under this trust 3s. per £1 were paid to the then existing creditors. Since then this creditor who is now opposing the cessio has got 2s. more per £1 from him, or in all 5s., which would be sufficient dividend for the applicant to have paid if it had been paid to all the creditors, and if the question now were whether he could get a discharge under cessio. He has no other opponent, the other creditors being content to leave him alone.

These being the circumstances, I am of opinion that this applicant is entitled to decree of cessio.

The remaining question is as to the conditions upon which it is to be granted.

debtors have been ordained to do so as a condition of obtaining cessio (Calderhead, 1890, 17 R. 1098; Simpson, 1888, 16 R. 131), but the present debtor has no sure income, and might fail innocently in any obligation taken by him."

* NOTE.—The question whether a petition for cessio should be granted is one of discretion, depending on the circumstances. I give great weight to the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute, who, in the present case, has thought that the circumstances are such as to justify the grant; but after a careful consideration of the debtor's deposition, along with the statement of affairs he has lodged, I have come reluctantly to the conclusion that it ought not to be granted in hoc statu. The debtor is a working joiner earning weekly wages, which he states at present at 34s. per week. His liabilities are given at £56, 7s. 3d., and his assets at £3, 5s. The largest creditor is Mr M'Cusker, to whom £27, 10s. 3d. is due, and who opposes the debtor's application. Besides Mr M'Cusker there are only four creditors, one of whom, Mrs Gillies, the debtor's mother-in-law, is not, as he says, pressing him; and the others, including his landlord, Mr Armour, he says that he means to pay in full. It would thus appear that, while paying other creditors in full, he proposes to make no provision for the debt of Mr M'Cusker, his principal creditor. 'I do not,' he says, 'propose to make any arrangement now'—i.e., for Mr M'Cusker. From the existing assets, as set forth in the debtor's statement, it is plain that no means of satisfying any of the debts can be looked for. Even if the £3, 5s., at which his assets are estimated by the debtor, were realised from the articles of household furniture and joiner's tools of which they are said to consist, nothing, after payment of the trustee, would remain for the creditors. There are, in truth, practically no assets for distribution. In refusing the application at present, it is not, I think, necessary to say that a grant of cessio is incompetent where there are no assets; but the fact of there being no assets leads one to look carefully at the position of the debtor before granting his application. Here it is not favourable to the application that the debtor avowedly contemplates making no provision towards the payment of one creditor, while intending to pay other creditors in full. It would, in my opinion, be an abuse of the process of cessio to allow a debtor, who comes forward with a statement that he has in effect no assets, to make it a handle for defying a particular creditor, as the debtor here proposes."

 M'Caaker.

The cases cited on that point are cases in which the debtor had a salary, and in these cases the applicant was obliged to assign part of it for his creditors' behoof as a condition of obtaining decree of cessio. But this man is not in receipt of such an income. He is a working man with weekly wages. I do not think that the case is appropriate for such a condition, all the more so as it is clear that, when the appellant comes to apply for a discharge, conditions applicable to his circumstances, as then existing, may be introduced into the discharge.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I am not disposed to agree with the Sheriff that there is good ground for refusing cessio in the fact that the appellant has expressed his intention of paying his creditors in full with the exception of the respondent—I mean the creditors under the trust-deed. His intention to pay in full is a laudable one, and whether he has good grounds for not including this particular creditor within that laudable intention, I have no means of knowing. He has somehow stirred up that creditor—his present opponent—to stand upon his utmost rights, for the latter has done diligence against him by arrestment and pouding, and in this way has recovered somewhat more than 3s. per £1.

It was explained that this cessio, in which all the creditors except this one concur, is prosecuted only to prevent the continuation of these proceedings on the part of the respondent in the future. I think we shall do justice by affirming the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Sheriff's interlocutor, and remitted to the Sheriff to grant decree of cessio.

Bankruptcy—Trust for behoof of creditors—Title of trustee to reduce illegal preferences.—The trustee under a voluntary trust-deed for behoof of creditors has no title to sue a reduction of illegal preferences unless he has a title derived from creditors.

1st DIVISION.
 Lord Low.

ON 3d June 1891 John Fleming, shipowner, Aberdeen, granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors in favour of John Ellis, coal-merchant at Aberdeen, and John C. Bennet, solicitor there. The trust-disposition was in these terms:—"I, John Fleming, . . . give, grant, assign, and make over to and in favour of" the trustees "All and Sundry my whole estates and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of whatever denomination, and wherever situated, presently belonging or addebted, which shall belong or be addebted to me during the subsistence of the trust, with the writs and evidents and vouchers and instructions of my said estates, and with all right, title, and interest which I have or may claim therein; turning and transferring the premises from me and my heirs and successors for the purposes after specified to and in favour of my trustees, whom I hereby substitute in my full right and place there . . . with power also to my trustees, either in my name or in their own names, to sue and insist in and to defend all actions, and to do any other thing that they shall consider necessary in the execution of the trust . . . in trust for the purposes following . . . (secondly) for division of the balance of the proceeds of my estate among my whole just and lawful creditors at the date hereof according to their several rights and preferences, and to a scheme of division among my creditors to be prepared by my trustees, providing that my said creditors, including any holding securities over my estate, shall be ranked, and the securities valued in the same manner and to the same extent as if my estates had been sequestrated under the existing Bankruptcy Statutes at the date hereof: Further, if any of my creditors do diligence against my estate, or if my trustees shall under any circumstances think it advisable that sequestration of my estates under the said statutes should be obtained, I hereby grant the following mandate for that purpose—that is to say, I hereby authorise my trustees to apply for sequestration of my estates under the said Bankrupt Statutes," &c.

Fleming's
Trustees v.
M'Hardy.

On 6th August the trustees brought an action against David M'Hardy, a creditor who had not acceded to the trust-disposition, concluding for reduction of certain preferences which were alleged to be illegal at common law and under the Act 1696, cap. 5. The pursuers, as their title, founded on the trust-deed only.

The defender pleaded;—(1) No title to sue.

On 16th February 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced an interlocutor by which, inter alia, the defender's first plea in law was repelled.*

The interlocutor being adverse to the pursuers on other points (not now reported), they reclaimed.

Argued for the pursuers on the question of title to sue;—The Lord Ordinary had rightly sustained the title to sue. The trustee under a trust-deed for behoof of creditors had a title to challenge illegal preferences although the deed did not confer power expressly. The fair inference from the deed, particularly the clause declaring that the ranking and preferences should be according to the Bankruptcy Acts, was that a title to reduce illegal preferences was intended to be conferred on the trustees; and the acceding creditors must by accession be held to have validated that. The acceding creditors, by the fact of accession, surrendered their right to take separate proceedings, but it was not to be supposed that their right to challenge illegal preferences was thereby lost. Rather it must be held that the trustees, either as the assignees or the mandataries of the acceding creditors, had the title to sue.

Argued for the defender;—The pursuers had no title to sue. They were the assignees of the debtor, not of the acceding creditors, and he could not give them a title to challenge his own deeds. A trust might be created which should give the trustee a title to reduce illegal preferences, but the title must proceed from creditors, and there was nothing here to shew that the trustees had got such a title from creditors.¹

LORD M'LAREN.—If any important pecuniary interest had been involved, I should have preferred to take time to consider this question, but it appears to me that no pecuniary interests beyond the expenses of the present action are

* "OPINION.— . . . The first point which I have to consider is the defender's plea of no title to sue. He contended that a trustee for behoof of creditors under a voluntary trust-deed has no title to sue a reduction of a fraudulent preference either at common law or under the statutes. The defender was unable to cite any authority in support of his contention, and in my opinion it cannot be sustained. It seems to be consistent with principle that a trustee for creditors should have a title to challenge illegal alienations or preferences, and all the authorities, including Mr Bell, appear to assume that such a right exists."

No. 107. affected by the decision on the question of title to sue, and I understand that
Mar. 2, 1892. all your Lordships are agreed that the practice is in accordance with the explanatory statement of Professor Bell, and that the mere granting of a voluntary trust-deed for behoof of creditors, without a clause giving express power to reduce illegal preferences, does not give the trustee a title to reduce such preferences. The argument which we heard to the contrary resolved itself into this, that it was expedient that the trustee ought to have this power. But there may be cases in which the debtor has no desire or intention that his trustee should be put in position to reduce preferences where he knows that the first hint of such action on the part of the trustee would result in his sequestration. If such be the debtor's wish, why should he not be allowed to act in accordance with it, and ultimately to extricate himself from his difficulties without putting his creditors at arm's length to one another? Of course no creditor need accede unless he pleases, but the debtor may think that the trust may reasonably be administered without raising questions as to existing preferences. If, on the other hand, it is desired to give the trustee all the powers of a trustee in a sequestration, and only to avoid the stigma of notour bankruptcy, it is easy to insert a clause arming the trustee with the power to cut down preferences. On these grounds I am of opinion that we should sustain the first plea in law and dismiss the action.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The Act of 1696 gives a creditors of a particular character the right to sue for the reduction of preferences falling within the scope of the Act, and it gives the right to nobody else. It therefore follows that nobody can sue under it unless he can set forth a title giving him right to sue as a prior creditor or as the representative of a prior creditor.

Now, the pursuer sets forth no such title. He is neither the assignee of the general body of creditors nor of particular creditors. He sets forth as his title to sue that he is trustee for creditors, but the averment in fact on which the title is supported is, that the insolvent granted a general conveyance in favour of his whole estate in order that it might be divided among his creditors. It is very clear that under such a conveyance the trustee is not the assignee of the creditors, and is nothing but the assignee of the insolvent debtor. It is from the insolvent debtor alone that he derives his whole right and title. The sanction of the creditors may enable the trust created by the debtor to be carried into practical effect, because, by acceding the creditors have given an undertaking that they will not take separate action for their own interest, but it adds nothing at all to the title of the trustee, nor does it add to or enlarge the rights which the insolvent has conveyed to him. The question must always be, whether the right which a trustee under a deed of this kind is seeking to enforce is included in the aggregate of the rights assigned to him by the insolvent debtor. The right which the trustee is here seeking to enforce is clearly not so included. The insolvent himself could not set aside his own deed; and he cannot give to another a right which was not vested in himself. I agree that it is possible to put the trustee under a private deed in the same position as a trustee in bankruptcy, as regards his right to reduce illegal preferences, provided his right is derived from creditors who had themselves a good title to reduce. But there is nothing in the conveyance in question which can be construed into such assignation by creditors.

I agree, therefore, that the defender's first plea should be sustained.

LORD ADAM concurred.

Fleming's
Trustees v.
M'Hardy.

LORD M'LAREN.—I quite agree that the right to reduce preferences flows from the particular creditors who have acceded. If the deed contains such a power they by their accession are held to have conferred it on the trustee, but if the deed contains no such power, then their accession does not imply their assent to anything beyond what is contained in the deed.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

Henry v.

Adoption—Homologation—Minor—Adoption of liability.—The proprietor of an estate in Shetland, which had been formerly liferented by his father, was applied to shortly after reaching majority by A, one of a number of his father's tenants, who, in accordance with a custom in Shetland, had deposited money at interest with their landlord, for payment of his deposit. The proprietor wrote in reply that he would "attend to your request as soon as possible," but that his affairs had been left in a "muddle," and it would take some time to get them into order. "It would be better perhaps to have chosen some other time to have drawn your money, as, of course, you are aware these have on the whole been bad years for getting moneys."

Shortly thereafter the proprietor was sequestrated. In the course of an application to get the sequestration recalled, his agent sent a circular to A, along with other depositors who were claimants in the sequestration, requesting him to assist him in this object, and enclosing a mandate in these terms:—"I, the undersigned, one of the depositors with the estate of Melby, being satisfied that Mr Scott's affairs can by good management and care be retrieved, hereby consent to the recall of his sequestration, and am willing that he should have time to pay his deposits."

A did not accede to this request.

In an action by A against the proprietor, who did not represent his father and who was not liable for his debts, for payment of the deposit, held that these letters did not import that the defender had after coming of age accepted liability for the deposit.

The late Dr R. T. C. Scott was liferenter of the estate of Melby in Shetland from 1852 till his death on 6th January 1875. On his death his son, R. T. C. Scott, entered into possession of the estate as fiar. He was then ten years of age.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Caithness,
Orkney, and Shetland.

In 1888 Umphray Henry, formerly a small tenant on the estate, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Lerwick against Mr Scott, who had attained majority on 16th July 1885, for payment of £83, 10s.

The pursuer stated that in 1854 he lodged £14 on deposit with Dr R. T. C. Scott, the defender's father, that this sum was gradually increased by small payments at the periodical rent settlements till it reached £90 in January 1875, "when the account was taken over by James Garriock, factor for the curators of the defender, and that £10 had been drawn on 7th January 1882, but since then nothing had been drawn or added." The pursuer further stated that the defender's predecessors, and afterwards the defender, had regularly paid interest at $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent till January 1887, since which time no interest had been paid, and £3, 10s. of interest was due.

The pursuer further stated,—“On 26th September 1887 pursuer wrote defender asking for payment of his deposit. The defender replied on 8th October stating that it was inconvenient for him to do so at present, and that pursuer might have chosen a better time, as ‘these have been on the whole bad years for getting moneys.’”

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The sum sued for being due and payable by the said defender to the said pursuer, decree ought to be granted as craved. (2) The defender having homologated the debt since coming of age, is barred from disputing it at this stage. (3) The defender having written the pursuer admitting the debt since coming of age, is barred, personali exceptione, from defending this action.

The defender stated that Garriock had no power in any capacity to borrow money for him or take over obligations on his behalf without authority of the Court or his constituent; that his father, Dr Scott, was merely a liferenter; that the deposit was not a burden on the estate; and that he (defender) took no benefit from his father's estate.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The obligation for the sum here sued for not having been granted by the defender, or those for whom he is responsible, he should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

A proof was taken, the result of which and of certain documentary evidence subsequently before the Court by admission of parties to the appeal, was as follows:—

Dr Scott was merely a liferenter of the estate. During Dr Scott's life-rent he had received certain deposits from tenants at interest, according to a frequent custom in Shetland. The pursuer was then a tenant of Melby.

Dr Scott on his death on 6th January 1875 was survived by his wife and by two children, the defender, then ten years of age, and a daughter. He left a settlement whereby the defender was excluded from his succession in consequence of his being, under the settlement of the estate, a fiar of Melby.

Some evidence was led to shew that a transaction had taken place between the defender's curators and his father's representatives by which the former acquired for the defender an estate which had belonged to his father at the price of £1800; and that part of the price was to be paid by the curators taking over the liabilities of the father's estate to his depositors. The Court, however, held that such a transaction had not been proved.

The evidence in regard to the defender's adopting his father's obligation after majority was as follows:—

The defender came of age on 16th July 1885. During his pupillage Mr Garriock had been his factor loco tutoris. During his minority he had held a factory and commission from him with consent of the curators. After his majority the defender granted a new factory and commission in his favour. This was recalled in July 1887. It was admitted that Garriock paid interest as stated until the factory was recalled. On 26th September 1887 the pursuer applied to the defender with regard to the deposit, and, on 8th October 1887, received this reply:—“Dear Sir,—I should have replied to yours of 26th Sept., but I have been busy. I shall attend to your request as soon as possible, but my affairs have been left in such a ‘muddle,’ and it will take some time to get into working order again. It would be better perhaps have chosen some other time to have drawn your money, as of course No. 108.

you are aware these have, on the whole, been bad years for getting money^s”

Mar. 8, 1892.
Henry v.
Scott.

In October 1887 the defender obtained sequestration of his estates, but shortly afterwards, having changed his agents, and recalled the factory and commission held by Mr Garriock, he applied for recall of the sequestration. The pursuer was one of the claimants in the sequestration, and on 9th November 1887 the defender's agent, for the purpose of receiving his assistance in obtaining the recall, sent this circular to the claimants:—“If you are favourable to the sequestration of Mr Scott being recalled, and his continuing to conduct the estate of Melby himself, I would be obliged by your signing the enclosed form and returning it to me. I enclose a stamp for the purpose. I may mention that the following depositors, viz. (three depositors were here mentioned), have all signed it, they being of opinion that their money is quite secure in Mr Scott's hands, and that affairs will be better managed by him.” The form enclosed consisted of a mandate as follows,—“I, the undersigned, one of the depositors with the estate of Melby, being satisfied that Mr Scott's affairs can, by good management and care, be retrieved, hereby consent to the recall of his sequestration, and am willing that he should have time to pay his deposits.” The pursuer did not sign it.

On 14th January 1888 the sequestration was recalled in consequence of an informality in the proceedings.

On 19th February 1889 the Sheriff-substitute (Mackenzie), on the ground that by the defender's actings since he came of age he had accepted liability for the deposit, decerned against the defender for £83, 10s.*

On 28th March 1889 the Sheriff (Thoms), after findings in fact, of new decerned against the defender for the sum sued for.†

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The defender did not represent his father, and took nothing from his estate. Unless, therefore, he had adopted liability for his father's debt or had barred himself from maintaining that he had not done so, he must be absolved. But his letter of 26th September 1887 did not acknowledge the debt. It assumed the truth of the letter to which it was a reply, and promised attention to that letter. Nor was the circular of October any acknowledgment that the claims of the creditors to whom it was sent were just. It was merely a request to them to give their aid as claimants in judicial proceedings. Neither document contained anything sufficient to bar him from maintaining his legal rights as to the deposits. The pursuer's position had not been altered in consequence of them.

Argued for the pursuer;—The letter of October plainly by its terms admitted that the pursuer was entitled to be repaid by the defender.

* “NOTE.— That there has been homologation and admitted liability on the part of the defender does not admit of doubt. He says himself that on coming of age he had no idea of repudiating these deposits. The letter which he wrote to the defender also is clearly to the effect that he considered the sum in question due.—(Robertson v. Robertson, 2d July 1831, 9 S. 865, 3 Scot. Jur. p. 571; Forrest v. Campbell, 4th Nov. 1853, 16 D. 16, 26 Scot. Jur. p. 22; Gall v. Bird, 3d July 1855, 17 D. 1027, 27 Scot. Jur. p. 231.)”

† “NOTE.— The defender, on 8th October 1887, wrote the letter acknowledging his liability personally to the pursuer. This is followed up by another acknowledgment in the appeal which the defender made to the pursuer to come to his aid as a friendly creditor, in order to get the sequestration of his estates recalled. On these grounds the Sheriff is glad to arrive at the same result as the Sheriff-substitute.”

MacDiarmid.

In the absence of evidence I am unable to say that that arrangement was detrimental to the interests of Mrs MacDiarmid. Her interests and those of her sisters were identical, and in the absence of anything to the contrary I feel constrained to attach importance to the judgment of all the parties at the time, on which they certainly acted. Under the arrangement, assuming its validity, Mrs MacDiarmid's share of the ultimate loss is about £800. Can we affirm judicially that she was misled into it to her injury, and that her loss would have been less or nil had the proposal of 1885, which she and her husband assented to, been rejected? Her liability is measured, as the Lord Ordinary points out, by the amount of what she got from her father. But her liability would remain whatever she did with it—although she spent it. Her liability for the debt of her father by the bond of 1871 is measured by the amount of her succession to him. She put the amount of her succession into the hands of marriage trustees. Now, the question whether or not the pursuers have a direct claim against the capital of the fund in the hands of the marriage trustees is, I think, a subsidiary question, and it may be a question of no interest whatever. I do not know what amount of separate estate Mrs MacDiarmid may have. I have no information. Of course if there are no funds recoverable the pursuers will take nothing by any decree, but if she has estate to meet the claim, irrespective of the funds in the hands of the marriage trustees, that will certainly be liable and may be attached.

She has been drawing the liferent of this £6000, we are told, for the last seventeen years. I do not know whether that has been accumulating or not. I have no means of knowing, very likely it has, or to a considerable extent. She continues to draw the liferent, that is the income, of this £6000 termly, and will as long as she lives, and her husband thereafter through her, that is to say, through her succession to her father, and through her making a disposition of what she succeeded to, will also enjoy it if he survives her. I should think that if there is separate estate, the protection of the children's interest in these funds in the hands of the marriage trustees ought to have effect.

I said it was a subsidiary question, and possibly one of no interest whatever, whether there is a direct claim upon the capital, for the trustees would be entitled to retain the income for the future until this £800 was made up. It would be a substantial benefit, I assume, to the pursuers to have decree establishing her liability and their liability if there is any separate estate, and that would be quite consistent with the protection of these funds in the hands of the marriage trustees so far as the children are concerned.

Liability of this sort is not to be got quit of by putting the possession of the fund in the hands of marriage trustees, any more than it is got quit of by spending it. It would not have been affected in the least degree, although the remedy might have been diminished, if it had been spent upon her trousseau or spent in any other way. She is still liable to the extent of her succession to her father, and her liability in respect of that is what she arranged by the arrangement and transaction leading to the bond of 1885.

Your Lordship has said—and I entirely agree with it—that the question is the same as if the bank had been demanding payment. The bank has been paid. The other two sisters were married to gentlemen who were too honest and honourable not to stand by the obligation under which they came. Accord-from that, there was no liability. I think it is not an acknowledgment of debt at all, and still less an undertaking of liability admittedly not previously existing. No. 108.

Henry v.
Scott.

A case of this kind was attempted to be made out, that the curators of the defender here, during his minority, agreed to purchase the father's separate estate, not that which he liferented and to which the son succeeded in fee through his grandfather, but a separate estate,—I think it was explained,—lying into the other, and therefore desirable and likely to be coveted by the proprietor of the other; that the curators agreed to purchase that for the sum of £1840; and it is said that accompanying that there was an undertaking to pay something for ameliorations on the one side, and an agreement upon the other that the liability for the deposits with the father, for which the trustees were responsible to the extent of any estate which they had, should be taken over by the pupil son, the agreed-on price of the land, about £1800, being abated to that extent, or held to be paid to that extent. I think there is no evidence of that upon which we can proceed. I think there is no evidence upon which we can proceed that the curators in the discharge of their legal duty and within their legal powers, or that they, with the consent of the minor after he attained minority, agreed to take over the liability for these sums at all. I think there is no evidence of any agreement that the taking over of a liability, not previously existing, for the amount of the deposits, should be held as payment in tanto of £1800, the agreed-on price of the lands which belonged to Dr Scott in fee-simple. If such a case had been made out it might have been sufficient, but there is no such case made out.

Therefore, upon the whole matter, I am of opinion that there was no original liability upon the son when he succeeded his grandfather or when his father died, and that no such liability was subsequently put upon him either by his guardian during pupillarity, or by his curators, with his consent, after he emerged from pupillarity into the condition which we term minority, when a minor may, if there is no lesion to him, come under obligation with the consent of his curators.

That disposes of the whole case. It is an action against him as under liability, either original or subsequently assumed, or put upon him, to this possessor for £80. I think there was no such original liability, and that the liability was never subsequently put upon him or assumed by him.

My opinion therefore is, that upon findings to that effect we should alter the judgment of the Sheriff, and sustain the defences to the present action.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

Company—Contract—Rescission of voidable contract to take shares—Offer of acceptance.—A company offered at a premium, and succeeded in allotting, and issue of shares. Some months afterwards the directors issued to the new shareholders a circular informing them that they had discovered that the prospectus for new shares contained material misrepresentations, and that the true state of the company at the date of the prospectus had been that the paid-up capital and "premium reserve" fund had been lost, and that dividends in past years had been paid out of capital. This circular, which was dated 12th May 1891, further stated that the directors were advised that they ought, under section 1 of the Companies Act, 1862, to present a petition to the Court for authority to remove from the register of members the names of the new shareholders, and to return their money, and that they were about to present a petition for that purpose which would be served upon them.

W. and D., two of the new shareholders, replied to the circular, the one on the 14th and the other on the 20th, intimating that they should be glad to have their names removed, and to have their money returned.

On 18th May the directors called a meeting of the company to consider resolutions for a voluntary winding-up.

On 20th May the directors presented a petition for authority to remove the names of the new shareholders from the register, and to repay their money.

On 26th May certain of the original shareholders presented a petition for a winding-up order. A winding-up order having eventually been obtained on that petition, 26th May became the date of the liquidation.

No answers were lodged to the petition of 20th May.

In the liquidation a number of the new shareholders objected to being put on the list of contributories, maintaining that their contract to take shares, which was voidable for misrepresentation, had been rescinded by the circular of 12th May, and, in any view, by the petition of 20th May prior to the winding-up.

The Court, holding that the circular of 12th May was an offer to rescind the contract, which required to be expressly accepted, and that the presentation of the petition of 20th May could not avail shareholders who had not expressly become parties thereto prior to the 26th May, and might therefore have claimed to retain their shares, settled the new shareholders on the list, excepting W. and D., but removed the names of W. and D. who had, prior to liquidation, expressly agreed to the rescission of their contract. No. 109.

THE EDINBURGH EMPLOYERS LIABILITY AND GENERAL ASSURANCE COMPANY was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, on 18th February 1887. It subsequently carried on employers' assurance, accident assurance, and kindred business. Mar. 4, 1892.

The shares were £1 shares, of which 5s. was paid up per share. The number of shares issued up to December 1890, which are hereafter called "old" shares, was 27,063. 1st DIVISION.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

In December 1890 a prospectus was issued offering a further issue of shares at a premium of 1s. 3d. per share.

The prospectus represented, inter alia, that the company was prosperous and doing a large business; that "a six per cent dividend had been earned and paid since the commencement of the company," and that the company had a sum of £4200 of "premium reserve," which was shewn in its balance-sheet for the previous year, of date 28th February (when the company's financial year ended).

In January and February 1891 6108 of these shares were taken up by about sixty-five persons. These shares are hereafter called the "new" shares.

On 12th May 1891 there was issued to the new shareholders (a copy being sent to the old shareholders at the same time) by the company a circular in the following terms, signed by the chairman and the managing director,—“The financial year of this company expired on 28th February last. The directors have since had a thorough investigation made into the affairs of the company, and they regret to inform you that their investigation discloses some startling results. When the prospectus for the issue of new shares was published in December last, the directors, proceeding upon the previous balance-sheet, and the business which was subsequently placed before them, were of opinion that the company was in a satisfactory condition. The investigation, however, has brought to light the fact that claims to a large amount had been intimated to the late manager, Mr James M'Cankie, before the balance-sheet for 1889-1890 was adjusted, and many of them before the financial year expired, which he omitted to disclose to the board or to the auditor, and of which no account is taken in that balance-sheet. The directors had no means of knowing of these claims except through the manager. The result is that the directors are now satisfied that no profit was earned for the previous year, and, on the contrary, that the sum treated as a premium reserve was more than exhausted by claims actually intimated before the balance-sheet was issued. As at 28th February last, therefore, the paid-up capital of the company has been practically lost, though it has a large uncalled capital. A good business has, however, been built up, and the directors are negotiating for the amalgamation of the company with another, so that the full benefit of the value of the business may be obtained for the shareholders. The directors feel that in the above circumstances a grave injustice has been done to those shareholders who applied for shares on the prospectus issued in December, and had shares allotted to them. They have taken legal advice on the subject, and specially whether they have, or can get, the power to enable them to remove the names of the new shareholders from the register, and to repay them the money paid on their shares, together with the premium thereon. They have been advised that under section 35 of the Companies Act of 1862 this can legally be done with the authority of the Court, and they propose immediately to present a petition to the Court setting forth the whole circumstances, and craving

No. 109. the necessary authority. We think it right to inform you of this at once. so that your mind may be set at rest in regard to your position as a new shareholder. A copy of the petition to the Court will afterwards be served upon you. In the meantime, any of your friends will be perfectly safe to insure with the company, or to renew insurances already existing, and we trust you will use your influence to prevent the business being prejudiced while the negotiations are in progress."

On 18th May 1891 the company sent out notices of an extraordinary general meeting, to be held on 26th May 1891, "to consider, and if resolved, to pass" extraordinary resolutions that a provisional agreement between the company and another, with which it was proposed to amalgamate, be confirmed, and "(2) That, in respect of said agreement, and also in respect of the company having suffered such losses that it is inexpedient to carry on the business, the meeting declare the company to be dissolved, except for the winding-up of the same. (3) That the Edinburgh Employers Liability and General Assurance Company, Limited, be wound up voluntarily."

Along with the notice was sent a circular on behalf of the directors explaining the proposed agreement and requesting proxies for the meeting.

On 20th May 1891 the company presented to the Court the petition under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862,* of which intimation was given in the circular of 12th May above quoted. The petition stated that the names of the "new" shareholders had been entered on the register without sufficient cause; and craved service upon them, and that the Court should "rectify the register of shareholders or members of the company by deleting or removing therefrom the names of the said shareholders."

This petition stated with regard to the prospectus of December 1890:—"It has now come to the knowledge of the directors that certain statements of a material character contained in said prospectus were altogether misleading. . . . Had the manager laid before the directors a full statement of the information in his possession they would have been parties to the issue of the said prospectus or the allotment of new shares and they are advised that the new shareholders have good and sufficient grounds for rescission of the contract to take shares, and repayment of the moneys already paid up in payment thereof. In particular, reference may be made to the statement in the prospectus as to the '6 per cent dividend earned and paid since the commencement of the company.' This representation has been discovered by the directors to be inconsistent with fact. The actual state of matters is as follows":—(The petition then compared with the statements in the balance-sheet the true state of the claims which had been intimated and should have appeared there, and stated that these amounted to at least £4900, of which the directors were in ignorance.) "Had they known of their existence, they would have insisted upon their being entered in the balance-sheet, and . . .

* The Companies Act, 1862, enacts (section 35),—"If the name of any person is without sufficient cause entered in or omitted from the register of members of any company under this Act, . . . the person or member aggrieved, or any member of the company, or the company itself, may . . . apply for an order of the Court that the register may be rectified, and the Court may either refuse such application . . . or it may, if satisfied of the justice of the case, make an order for the rectification of the register, . . . and generally the Court may in any such proceeding decide any question that it may be necessary or expedient to decide for the rectification of the register."

result would have been (1) that the premium reserved to meet unexpired risks, viz., £4200, would have been entirely swept away in payment of said intimated claims; and (2) that the foresaid dividend of 6 per cent would not have been declared. It now appears, in fact, that instead of said dividend having, as stated in said prospectus, been earned and paid, it had not been earned, but had been paid out of capital. In these circumstances, the directors have felt that a grave injustice has been done to the shareholders who took shares on the faith of the prospectus as issued, and, as stated, they are advised that rescission and repayment can be obtained by the new shareholders."

The petition was served upon the new shareholders. No answers were lodged, the explanation given by such of them as appeared in the subsequent proceedings being that "having learned from the said circular and petition the intention of the company to admit the wrong done to them and to restore them against it, the respondents approved of the said petition, and lodged no answers thereto."

The meeting of the company of 26th May, of which notice was given by the circular of 18th May, was held, but the resolutions for voluntary liquidation and amalgamation were lost.

Upon 26th May 1891, while the order for answers to the company's petition was still current, Charles Morton and others, certain of the old shareholders, presented a petition to the Court for a winding-up of the company, narrating the facts above stated, and averring that the company was being carried on at a loss. They alleged further that the directors were devising a scheme for putting the company into liquidation, and had resolved upon liquidation, and transferring the business to another company in a manner contrary to the shareholders' interest; and further, that it was incompetent to have the names of the new shareholders removed from the register. They submitted that it was just and equitable that the company be wound up by the Court.

The company, on 2d June, lodged answers to the petition of Morton and others. The answers stated that the company was solvent, and that winding-up by the Court would be unjust and inequitable, and with regard to the "new" shareholders, stated that their names had been registered "without sufficient cause," and that the petition was an "attempt to defeat the petition of 20th May to have their names taken off, and to procure the retention by the company of moneys improperly obtained, which should not be sanctioned by the Court."

Before discussion upon the petition of Charles Morton and others of 26th May and the answers thereto, an arrangement between the petitioners and the company was arrived at, and, in terms of a joint minute, the Court, on 24th June 1891, pronounced the order for the winding-up of the company by the Court.* The date of the winding-up was accordingly 26th May, the date of the presentation of the petition for that order.

Mr R. C. Millar, C.A., and Mr James Romanes, C.A., were appointed official liquidators.

The liquidation was remitted to Lord Stormonth Darling.

* Certain of the new shareholders, having heard of the proposed arrangement, boxed a note to the Court, which appeared in Single Bills on the same day, 24th June, craving to be allowed to compare and support the petition of 20th May. On 7th and 8th July counsel were heard on this minute. The First Division pronounced this order:—"Having resumed consideration of the petition, . . . the minute of compareance for Elizabeth Griffiths and others, and heard counsel for the parties, sist process."

Liquidators of Edinburgh
Employers,
&c. Co. v.
Griffiths.

The questions now reported arose in the proceedings under a note by the liquidators for settlement of the list of contributories.

In this note it was proposed to settle on the list of contributories, inter alia, the new shareholders.

Elizabeth Griffiths and others, being twenty-eight of these, lodged answers, objecting to their names being settled on the list. They held 4134 out of the 6108 new shares.

Rev. J. A. Smith, Rev. W. Duke, and two other persons, who had failed to lodge answers timeously, and had accordingly been settled on the list, subsequently applied by petition to have their names struck off the register of the company.

A record consisting of a condescendence for the objectors Griffiths and others, and answers thereto for the liquidators, was made up.

From correspondence produced it appeared that, on 24th March 1891, one of the respondents, Mr Shand, who had heard certain reports unfavourable to the company, wrote to the secretary acknowledging the certificate of new shares sent him on the 11th, and adding,—“In the circumstances I consider that the company was not entitled to issue the additional shares which they recently issued, and I have therefore to intimate to you that I require my name to be removed from the register, and repayment of the £125 which I paid to the company on 17th December last.” In a subsequent letter to each director of 19th May Mr Shand said, referring to the circular of 12th May,—“After such an assurance, I naturally concluded that I did not require to attend further to the matter, and I am the more willing to take no active steps as I was unwilling to cause additional expense to the company. The circular of 18th inst., however, informs me that steps are to be taken to put the company into liquidation. Liquidation may have the effect of prejudicing the rights of ‘new’ shareholders.”

In these circumstances, the respondents Griffiths and others pleaded, inter alia;—1. The respondents are not liable to be placed on the list of contributories, in respect that they were induced to take the said new shares by material misrepresentation, and their names were entered on the register of members without sufficient cause; et separatim, because their right to be relieved and to have the contract rescinded was intimated to them, and judicially admitted by the company prior to the commencement of the winding-up. 4. The respondents are entitled to have the register of the company rectified by the removal of their names, in respect of the Companies Act, 1862, sec. 35.

The liquidators pleaded, inter alia;—1. The respondents’ averments are irrelevant. 4. The respondents’ objections should be repelled, in respect (1) that the petition of 20th May was incompetent, irrelevant, and ultra vires, and was truly presented, not in the interests of the company, but in the interest of the directors, and after liquidation had been resolved on, and was not authorised by the company; (2) that the liquidation order of the Court precludes the Court from now sustaining the respondents’ objections.

The Lord Ordinary, on 5th January 1892, repelled the pleas in law for the respondents, and settled their “names on the list of contributories.” *

* “OPINION.—The question here is, whether the respondents Mrs Griffiths and others are to be placed on the list of contributories of this company as holders of shares allotted to them in or about December 1890.

“The company was formed in 1887, with a nominal capital of £150,000 divided into 150,000 shares of £1 each, of which 5s. per share were paid up.

In the petition for the Rev. J. A. Smith and others, the Lord Ordinary No. 109. refused the petition.

Employers,
&c. Co. v.
Griffiths.

Down to December 1890 only 27,063 of these shares were subscribed for. In that month the company issued a prospectus offering a new issue of shares, and the result was that 6108 additional shares were accepted at a premium of 1s. 3d. per share in addition to the 5s. paid up. The present respondents, who are twenty-eight in number, hold 4134 of these new shares. Four other persons, representing 800 shares, have taken separate proceedings in the liquidation, objecting to their names being placed on the list of contributories. The remaining 1174 new shares are held by thirty-three persons, who have down to this time taken no steps to repudiate liability. Only two of these thirty-three are holders of old shares as well.

"The prospectus issued by the directors, on which the new shares were taken, represented the company as in a flourishing condition. In particular, it asserted that a 6 per cent dividend had been earned and paid since the commencement of the company, and that the company possessed a sum of £4200 of 'premium reserve.' Both of these statements turned out to be false, the premium reserve being entirely absorbed by claims which had been intimated before the date of the prospectus, and the dividend of 6 per cent having been paid out of capital. I shall assume therefore that the 'new' shareholders were induced to take their shares by misrepresentation of material facts, and that, while the company was a going concern, they would have been entitled, if they chose, to have their contracts rescinded and their names removed from the register.

"It by no means follows that this right remains, now that the company has gone into liquidation. And here it is necessary to attend very closely to certain material dates. The financial year of the company expired on 28th February 1891. On 12th May the directors addressed a circular to all the new shareholders (sending at the same time a copy of it to the old shareholders), in which they acknowledged with great frankness the misleading character of the prospectus, which they ascribed to the suppression of certain facts by the manager, and intimated that they proposed immediately to present a petition to the Court under section 35 of the Companies Act of 1862, setting forth the whole circumstances, and craving the necessary authority to remove the names of the new shareholders from the register, and to repay them the money paid on their shares, together with the premium thereon. On 18th May they issued a notice for an extraordinary general meeting of the company, to be held on 26th May, for the purpose of passing resolutions to confirm a provisional agreement for transference of the business to another company, and for voluntary winding-up. Under section 129 (3) of the Act of 1862 an extraordinary (as distinguished from a special) resolution to wind up must bear that it has been proved to the company's satisfaction that it cannot by reason of its liabilities continue its business, and that it is advisable to wind up the company. The notice in this case did not contain these very words, but it bore that the company had suffered such losses that it was inexpedient to carry on the business, and I take it that these words must, in the circumstances, be read as meaning the same thing. On 20th May the directors presented a petition in terms of the intimation in their circular, to have the register rectified by removal of the names of the new shareholders, and for authority to repay to them, out of the funds of the company, the sums paid by them on their shares, including the premium thereon. This petition was ordered to be intimated to the new shareholders, and no answers were lodged; but before the induciae had expired, viz., on 26th May, a petition was presented by some of the old shareholders (in which certain creditors appeared) to have the company wound up by the Court, and as an order for judicial liquidation was on 24th June pronounced on this petition, the 26th of May must be taken as the commencement of the winding-up. On 20th June a number of the present respondents boxed to the Court a minute of co-appearance in the directors' petition of 20th May, but this minute did not appear in the rolls until after the order for liquidation had been pronounced, and accordingly their Lordships of the First Division held that they could not deal with it except by sisting process, leaving all questions to be decided in the liquidation proceedings.

The respondents reclaimed. In the Inner-House the record was amended, and certain facts which were not known to both parties when the case was in the Outer-House were agreed upon by joint minute.

"In order to appreciate the importance of these dates, it is necessary to consider the case-law (chiefly English) as to the right of a shareholder to have his name removed from the register on the ground that he has been induced to take his shares by fraud imputable to the company.

"In the first place, it is clear that such a contract is not void but only voidable. In the second place, the general rule is that, after the company has gone into liquidation, the demand of the shareholder comes too late—Oakes v. Turquand, L. R., 2 Eng. and Ir. App. 325. But to this there is the exception that if the shareholder, before the commencement of the winding-up, has taken legal proceedings to have his name removed, that will be enough—Reese River Co. v. Smith, L. R., 4 Eng. and Ir. App. 64. Mere repudiation, without legal proceedings being taken, will not do—Hare's case, L. R., 4 Ch. 503. But the legal proceedings need not be at the instance of the repudiating shareholder himself, provided there be an agreement between him and the company that they shall stand or fall by the result of legal proceedings taken by other shareholders in the same position—Pawle's case, L. R., 4 Ch. 497, and M'Neil's case, L. R., 10 Eq. 503. The mere fact of legal proceedings being taken by other shareholders will not be enough, unless there is a positive agreement to abide by the result of them—In re Scottish Petroleum Co., 23 Ch. Div. 413. The general rule that, after winding-up has commenced, the demand of the shareholder comes too late, has not been further relaxed, and the relaxations which have been allowed all present the feature of active steps being taken before the liquidation, either by the repudiating shareholder himself, or by someone else representing him by agreement with the company. Nor is the commencement of the winding-up in all cases the earliest point of time at which the right of a shareholder to get rid of his shares is lost. The case of Tennant v. City of Glasgow Bank, 6 R. 554, affd. 4 App. Cas. 615, establishes that a declaration of insolvency will have the same effect, for in that case it was held, in the words of Lord Cairns (p. 623 of App. Cas.), that 'it became impossible, after the advertisement of the 5th of October, for the body of shareholders in the company, whose agents the directors were, to make any alteration in their status, whether by a transfer or by a repudiation of shares, which would affect the rights of creditors in the company.' Now, the advertisement of 5th October in that case was a notice convening an extraordinary general meeting for the purpose of winding-up, similar to the notice which was issued in this case on 18th May.

"Such being the law, as established by decisions, the first question is, whether the presentation of the directors' petition for rectification of the register on 20th May (six days before the commencement of the winding-up) was equivalent to a taking of legal proceedings by the respondents themselves. It is plausibly urged that this step on the part of the directors as representing the company was a concession of the respondents' right to have their names removed, and made it unnecessary for them to take proceedings of their own. But I am of opinion that it cannot be regarded as a proper equivalent—(1) Because there was no concurrence on the part of the respondents, and nothing to prevent them from afterwards objecting to the removal of their names from the register; and (2) because it was impossible, after the circular of 18th May, either on the application of the directors or of the respondents themselves, to make any alteration in the status of the body of shareholders. It is said by the respondents (condescendence 12), that the liquidation is not a creditors' but a shareholders' liquidation, and that the uncalled capital on the old shares will be sufficient to meet all the liabilities; but this is denied by the liquidators, who assert (statement 1) that the entire uncalled capital, on both old and new shares, falls short of the claims which have been lodged. I cannot, therefore,

It was admitted, inter alia;—(1) “That the prospectus of new shares issued by the company in December 1890 contained material misrepresentations which would entitle the subscribers for said shares, including the respondents, to have their names removed from the register, and the assume that the interests of creditors would not be prejudiced by the release of the respondents; and even if that were so, the case of Burgess, 15 Ch. Div. 507, is an authority for holding that the interests of contributories are to be regarded as well as those of creditors, on the ground that by section 38 of the Act of 1862 the winding-up order imposes new liabilities on members (including past members), and entirely alters the position of parties.

“It was urged by the liquidators that the petition of 20th May was ultra vires of the directors, at all events without the consent of the company, as being practically a reduction of capital. I cannot adopt that view, for the directors had power under the articles to compromise any liability in respect of an agreement to take shares, and I think if the company had been a solvent and going concern, it would have been their duty to consent to the names of the respondents being removed from the register on a demand to that effect being made. If so, I cannot see that there would have been in that case anything improper in their proposing to get the authority of the Court themselves. I do not go into the question whether they were actuated by any motive for avoiding personal liability under the Directors’ Liability Act of 1890. For I think that either of the two grounds which I have mentioned above is sufficient to deprive their petition of any efficacy as an equivalent for a legal proceeding taken by the respondents in proper time.

“There remains the question whether the directors’ circular of 12th May, though not of course a legal proceeding, had the effect of operating, by agreement, a rescission of the respondents’ contract to take shares. It certainly was couched in very strong terms, and was well calculated in its own words to set the minds of its recipients ‘at rest in regard to their position as new shareholders,’ so completely as to stay their hands from taking any personal action. It is not said that down to that time any of the respondents, except Mr D. L. Shand, had asked that his name should be removed from the register. Waiving the question whether, in the knowledge which the directors must then have possessed of the company’s insolvency, they had any right to take the initiative in rescinding the respondents’ contracts, I am unable to see that their circular constituted anything like an agreement for rescission. Every one of the persons who received it (with perhaps the exception of Mr Shand) might have refused to allow his name to be taken off; and it is admitted not only that thirty-three of the sixty-five new shareholders have allowed their names to be settled on the list of contributories without objection, but that four of the respondents granted proxies for the meeting of 26th May, and that a fifth attended the meeting, which of course was conduct altogether inconsistent with the idea that they had ceased to be shareholders. I think it is impossible to hold that the mere fact of the respondents not objecting to the course which the directors proposed inferred on their part a consent to the rescission of their contracts; and if the circular had the effect (as very likely it had) of lulling them to sleep, I am afraid they must take the consequences of not themselves adopting those legal proceedings which alone are effectual, where liquidation ensues, to vindicate a shareholder’s right to have his name removed on the ground of fraud.

“With regard to Mr Shand, he had certainly repudiated as early as 24th March, but I am afraid he is open to the objection that he failed timeously to take active steps to have his name removed. For if he knew on 24th March that his contract to take shares was voidable on the ground of fraud, and intended to avoid it, I think he was bound to take immediate steps for that purpose in justice to all concerned.

“In the view which I take there is no distinction between those of the respondents who appeared and those who did not appear in the directors’ petition of 20th May. All of them must, I think, be settled on the list of contributories.”

money paid in respect of said shares repaid, provided steps for obtaining removal and repayment were timeously taken." It was also admitted that several of the respondents had granted proxies in favour of the directors for the meeting of 26th May.

With regard to one of the respondents, Leonard Henry West, it was admitted that on 14th May 1891 he sent to the managing director of the company the following letter relative to the circular of 12th May:—"I am in receipt of your circular herein, and am surprised to learn the position of affairs. I, however, note that you are going to present a petition for rectification at once, and I therefore rely upon that, and shall be glad to receive repayment in due course." Further, that on receipt of the circular of 18th May West wrote as follows to the managing director:—"I am in receipt of your circular of the 18th, but see no reference to petition for rectification and for repayment of the money to those to whom shares were allotted on recent issue; and as one of such allottees, I must be assured that proceedings are being taken in accordance with your circular of 12th inst. Please let me have an immediate reply." Further, that on 2d June in answer to a notice of call issued by the company on 29th May, he wrote as follows:—"Dear Sir,—I have your notice of call on my return from London to-day, but am surprised that you should send such a circular to any shareholder. What is being done with reference to the petition for rectification? Section 38 was enacted for the express object of meeting such cases of injustice as would be caused by a call upon the allottees of December last, and the petition must be pushed on and repayment made in accordance with your circular of the 12th ult."

The following new plea was stated for West with regard to this correspondence,—“In any view the respondent West is not liable as a contributory in respect that by the company's circular of 12th May, and his letters relative thereto, his agreement to take shares was rescinded prior to the winding-up.”

With regard to the Rev. W. Duke, one of the parties to the petition of Rev. J. A. Smith and others, for rectification of the register, it was admitted that in answer to the circular of 12th May, he wrote on 20th May “ . . . I need not say I shall be glad to have my name removed from the register, and be repaid the money advanced as proposed.”

With regard to certain others of the new shareholders, it appeared from the letters admitted by the parties that none of them had prior to 26th May, the date of the liquidation, written in answer to the circular of 12th May unequivocally expressing agreement to have their name removed from the register.

The liquidators amended their record by adding the following statement:—"The said circular of 12th May 1891 was issued, and said petition of 20th May 1891 was presented, at a time when the company had failed to meet, and was unable to meet, its due debts, and when it was to the knowledge of the directors insolvent. They were issued and presented respectively by the directors, not in the bona fide performance of their duty to the company, but in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme which they had devised for avoiding the personal liability which they knew they had incurred to the new shareholders. They were so issued and presented after the directors were aware that liquidation was inevitable, and after they had determined on winding up the company. The result of the removal of the new shareholders from the register, thereby proposed at said dates, would have been to defraud both the remaining shareholders and creditors of the company. The said petition of 20th May was presented without the authority of the respondents and other new shareholders, and was not adopted by them prior to liquidation. The resdents and other new shareholders continued to be treated and acted as shareholders of the company after the issue of said circular, and the presentation of said petition at said respective dates.”

They amended their fourth plea above quoted, as follows:—“4. The respondents’ objections should be repelled in respect,—(1) That the petition of 20th May was incompetent, irrelevant, and ultra vires, and was truly presented, not in the interests of the company, but fraudulently in the interests of the directors themselves, and after liquidation had been resolved on, and was not authorised by the company; (2) that the company was, as the directors knew, insolvent, and unable to carry on business at and prior to 12th May 1891, and the directors had in consequence before said 12th May resolved that the company must go into liquidation; and (3) that the liquidation order of the Court precludes the Court from now sustaining the respondents’ objections.”

Argued for the respondents (reclaimers);—The respondents could not be held to their contract to take shares. That contract had been abrogated, and the claim to hold them to it yielded up by the other party—the company—while the company was a going concern. The circular of 12th May shewed a going business, a statement not of insolvency but the contrary, and admitted that the names had been entered without sufficient cause. It had been followed by the judicial statement to the same effect on 20th May. The interest of the new shareholders was to assent to the course intimated in the circular. The proper construction of their not rejecting it, or answering the petition of 20th May, was that they were presumed to assent to it. They would not have been heard to say after such silence that they intended to hold on to this company which intimated to them that they were free. It was said that there must be rescission before winding-up. That was quite true. But the fallacy of the liquidators seemed to be that they confounded legal proceedings with rescission. The distinction was that rescission was constituted by a giving up of the contract by that party who had the interest to keep the other bound.¹ Legal proceedings were the usual evidence of that, because the ordinary case was that that party would not let the other go. But rescission itself was neither the seeking the aid of a Court nor the act of a Court, but the act of the contracting parties themselves, and here the act was complete. The company had voluntarily done all that a suit could do. The petition of 20th May was either itself a rescission, or a ministerial act following thereon for the new shareholders’ safety—a judicial statement that the contract was already rescinded. Where a company removed a shareholder’s name for a good reason, even if he did not know of that, and had asked removal on another ground, the rescission was complete.² It was quite true, as the Lord Ordinary (quoting Hare’s case) stated, that mere repudiation without anything else was not enough. But the answer was that here there had been the undertaking to remove the name which Hare, the repudiating shareholder, had not been able to get from the company. If when Hare had repudiated the company had agreed to remove his name, surely that would have sufficed. The cases of Pavle, M’Neill, and the Scottish Petroleum Company, quoted by the Lord Ordinary, shewed just what the reclaimers contended, that it was perfectly lawful for a company to agree with a shareholder to remove his name without the necessity for any proceedings at all. Of course the modus operandi there was a test case. The contention of the reclaimers here seemed to

The petition for liquidation of the 26th May was just an attempt by the old shareholders whose officers had admittedly deceived the new shareholders, and then confessed the deception and endeavoured to release them, to get behind the rescission of the contract by the device of putting the company into liquidation. Thus they were to get in the liquidation the advantage of a wrong imputable to themselves. The petition of 26th May, though not presented by the respondents, was presented for them by a person (the company) having a title to act for them, and the benefit of it (which they by not opposing it plainly intended to take) ought not to be lost to them.

II. It was said to be too late to rescind, not only after 26th May, but after 18th May, when the notice to wind up and amalgamate was given, and the case of *Tennant*¹ was quoted in which it was held that a mere public declaration of insolvency was equally with winding-up a point of time after which the contract to take shares could not be rescinded. Thence, it was argued that the directors' petition of 20th May, being after the circular of 18th, was too late as a rescission. The first answer was that the rescission arose from the circular of 12th, not repudiated in course of post (and indeed in the case of West and Duke replied to by letters expressing desire to be taken off the list). But, further, the circular of 18th May was not a declaration of insolvency. It intimated a winding-up but in the words of Lord Hatherley in Wright's case, supra, it was "a winding-up for the purpose of going on." It was a transference of the business to another company, which formally required a winding-up. The circular stated that the company had "suffered such losses that it was inexpedient to carry on the business," but that must be taken with the rest of the circular, and it would be going far beyond the principle of Tennant to adopt the liquidators' argument.

III. In any view West and Duke were free by their closing with the very terms of the circular of 12th May. To a shareholder such as Mr. Shand, who had before the 12th May complained of what had been done and demanded relief (though not in Court), the circular of 12th May came as an answer to his demand and settled his right.

IV. The averments of the liquidators in their amended record were irrelevant. Mere insolvency, known or unknown to the directors, was not enough. Nothing short of a public declaration of insolvency would bring the case up to one in which it was too late to rescind. At 26th May there had certainly not been that, but the contrary.

Argued for the liquidators;—The case of the new shareholders was based upon the circular of 12th May. Passing by for the moment the liquidators' averment that that was issued in pursuance of an attempt on the directors' part to escape liability, what was the effect of that circular? The attempt on the other side was to give it, even where never answered, the force of an agreement to rescind the contract to take shares. It was said it might be presumed to be acceded to by any shareholder, and that if he did not answer it in course of post he must be held to have acceded to it. But could a man by his mere receipt of such a circular, and not answering it be held bound to give up his shares if he chose to hold them? The test of rescission for this case was, could such a shareholder be held to have elected to give up the shares? Expressions in Smith v. Eddowes and River Company had been appealed to on the subject of rescission. But these, so far as going beyond the actual judgment, were obiter, and were not consistent with other decisions,¹ and in the case itself Lord Cairns and Lord Westbury did not go so far. The cases of the Scottish Petroleum Company and Hare were in point, and the respondents' case failed entirely when the test put in Hare's case was applied to it. It must be admitted that on this point the cases of West and Duke were more favourable.

But II. If recourse were had to the petition of 20th May that came too late. The circular of 18th May was a declaration that in consequence of losses the company as such was to come to an end. It mattered not that its business was to be taken up by another company. The release of the new shareholders would violate the canon laid down by the Lord President in Tennant's case,² that the option to void the contract is barred where innocent third parties have in reliance on the fraudulent contract acquired rights which would be defeated by its rescission. It was always a question of equity whether a voidable contract should be avoided. But, further, the petition of 20th May was not answered. The respondents did not close with the offer which it made. Apart from that, that petition was incompetent. It was a proposal to write down the capital wholesale. But that was incompetent.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—Since this case came into the Inner-House a minute of admissions has been lodged and the record has been amended. The parties are agreed that the questions raised are thus in a position for final judgment, unless we should be of opinion that certain statements of the liquidators are relevant and ought to be remitted to probation. My opinion is that they are not relevant, and accordingly that we are able now to dispose of the whole case. My reasons for considering the averments to be irrelevant may more conveniently be explained after I have stated my views on the case as it stands.

The Lord Ordinary has collected the facts with clearness and accuracy. On 20th May the Edinburgh Employers Liability and General Assurance Company presented a petition praying the Court that the register be rectified by the removal of the names of certain persons, these persons forming a whole class of shareholders. The usual order was made that the petition should be served on all the persons so named, allowing them to lodge answers within eight days. While this period was current, namely, on 26th May, a petition for judicial liquidation was presented, and on 24th June an order for winding-up was pronounced. The company thus went into liquidation on 26th May.

The reclaimers are certain of the persons whose names were sought to be removed from the register under the petition of the company. Their names being on the register at the date of the liquidation, they prima facie must be contributories, but they seek to shew that judicial proceedings having been taken before the liquidation for their removal from the register, they are now entitled to relief. They found themselves upon what is now formally admitted in the first article of the minute of admissions, namely, that material representations had been made in the prospectus of the shares allotted to them, which would entitle them to have their names removed, provided steps for obtaining such removal were timeously taken, and they say that the petition for the removal of their names having, in these circumstances, been presented by the directors after notice had been given to them, in terms of a circular of 12th

May, and no dissent having been expressed by them, they are entitled now to claim the relief which they might, before the liquidation, have claimed for themselves, and which the directors had petitioned for before the commencement of the winding-up. It appears to me that the question whether any shareholder can successfully claim the benefit of the company's petition depends upon whether he did or did not, prior to the liquidation, close with the offer of the directors made in the circular of 12th May, that he should cease to be a shareholder. That circular of 12th May was, I think, an open offer to any shareholder, but then it was an offer requiring acceptance.

The contract under which each of the defrauded shareholders became a shareholder was voidable, but only at the instance and in the option of each shareholder. The mere fact that each shareholder was apprised of his having this option in nowise implied, either in law or in fact, that he would choose to exercise it. All or any of these persons might prefer to keep their shares, and unless and until they intimated their choice, they had the right to remain, and did remain, shareholders. The case of Mr West, who, in my opinion, is entitled to the relief he seeks, very well illustrates, by contrast, the general case of the reclaimers. In answer to the circular he wrote as follows (his Lordship quoted Mr West's letter). Now that letter, following the circular and followed by the petition, entitles Mr West to say that the petition is his petition, for it was presented in pursuance of an agreement between him and the directors that they should petition for the removal of his name. Mr West is thus entitled to plead the law of the Reese River Company v. Smith, L. R., 4 E. and I. App. 64; and his case is, I think, a fortiori of Paulle's case, L. R., 4 Ch. 497, and M'Nally's case, L. R., 10 Eq. 503. The case of the Rev. Mr Duke is undistinguishable from Mr West's, and he is, in my opinion, entitled to the same relief. I regret that I am unable to assimilate any other cases to those of these two gentlemen. Those cases were singled out and developed since the case came into the Inner House, and accordingly they are not dealt with by the Lord Ordinary.

What is wanting in the case of all the others is any closing with the proposal of the directors that they should go off the register. It appears to me that one of them deprived himself of the right to hold to his shares, which unquestionably belonged to him, in spite of the directors' petition to remove the names. Apart from some renunciation of this right, any one of them might have lodged answers to the petition and opposed it; and I find it impossible to hold that mere silence or abstaining from announcing resistance to the directors' proposal amounts to such renunciation. The proper criterion is, I think, stated by Lord Justice Selwyn in Hare's case (L. R., 4 Ch. at p. 511), in which is directly applicable to the present case:—"There is nothing, in my judgment, to shew that Mr Hare had deprived himself of the power which he possessed of acting for himself, and of exercising his own judgment or option, either to retain the shares or to have his name removed." Mr West and Mr Duke satisfy this test; all the others fail to satisfy it.

This leads me to consider the parts of the liquidators' record which admitted furnish their only answer to the claim of the two gentlemen I have named.

The liquidators contended that, even on the admitted facts, the petition for the removal of the shareholders' names was incompetent and ultra vires, inasmuch as it was presented after liquidation had been resolved on. Now, it is scarcely accurate to speak of liquidation as having been resolved on, for at 20th May the company had not resolved upon anything, and the directors announced, and could only announce, their intention to propose a liquidation at the meeting of shareholders which they were calling. Nor does the circular of 18th May announce or imply either insolvency or inability to carry on business, for it does no more than state that while the paid-up capital amounting to 5s. of the £1 shares had been lost, a good business had been built up, and the directors were negotiating for the amalgamation of the company with another. These are the statements made as to the position of the company, and the provisional agreement for amalgamation which was recommended by the directors in their circular of 18th May is in harmony with these statements.

Liquidators of

&c. Co. v.
Griffiths.

In these circumstances, I do not think that the admitted facts support this contention of the liquidators. De facto the company at 20th May was a going concern. Neither to the public nor to the shareholders had any announcement been made of insolvency or inability to go on, or of a resolution cedere foro.

The liquidators, however, point to certain averments of theirs which are not covered by the minute of admissions. These averments resolve into two propositions,—(1) It is said that, at the date of the circulars and the petition, the company was in the knowledge of the directors insolvent, and that the directors had resolved that the company must go into liquidation. Even if the company was ex post facto proved to have been insolvent in the knowledge of the directors, this would not, in my opinion, avail to cut down the validity of the actings of the directors in relation to this petition, these facts being latent. The statement that the directors knew that the company must go into liquidation is a mere amplification of the principal averment, and does not add to its value.

(2) It is averred that the petition to rectify the register was not truly presented in the interests of the company, but fraudulently in the interests of the directors themselves. Taken by itself, this proposition does not vitiate the petition, for the shareholders proposed to be relieved were on the admitted facts entitled to this remedy, if timeously applied for, and a sinister motive on the part of the directors in tendering to them the justice to which they were entitled could not prejudice their right to obtain it. Nor does this averment of fraud impart to the averment of insolvency any additional weight against the objections to its relevancy which I have already considered.

My opinion is therefore that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, with this variation, that we remit to his Lordship to direct that the names of Leonard H. West and William Duke be removed from the register of shareholders.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT remitted to the Lord Ordinary to direct that the names of West and Duke should be removed from the list of contributors, and, with this variation, adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

IN January 1892 William Campbell, chemist, Glasgow, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, praying to be decerned executorial, qua husband, to his deceased wife, who had died intestate and without issue on 10th January 1892. Thereafter Alexander Bilsland Falconer, a brother of the deceased, presented a competing petition, praying to be decerned qua one of her next of kin.

On 29th January the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) dismissed the husband's petition, and decerned the brother executor as craved.

The husband appealed, and argued;—The case could not be distinguished from Stewart v. Kerr,¹ in which the other Division had decided against the husband. But the soundness of Stewart v. Kerr had been much doubted, especially when, as there and here, there was no issue, for then, under the Married Women's Property Act 1881,² the husband's interest in his wife's estate was equal to that of the whole next of kin. The question was one of general importance, and might be sent to the whole Court, or might be reconsidered by the other Division in consultation with their Lordships.

The respondent was not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Mr Salvesen frankly confessed that the decision in the case of Stewart v. Kerr was exactly in point, and that case was decided as recently as March 19, 1890. It would only be in the most exceptional circumstances that we should be justified in doing anything else than follow a fully considered decision, as that was. I have heard nothing to shew that there are such exceptional circumstances here, and consequently I think we must follow the case of Stewart.

LORD ADAM.—I agree. I see no reason to doubt the case of Stewart.

LORD M'LAREN.—I also concur. Even if I thought a decision on a point of practice doubtful in principle, I should, generally speaking, be disposed to follow it, for in such cases the important matter is usually to have a rule of some sort authoritatively settled. But in the present instance I am very far from thinking that the case of Stewart, which we have been asked to reconsider, depends on principles which I should regard as questionable. On the contrary, the reasoning of Lord Rutherford Clark, in his opinion, appears to me unanswerable.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of opinion that the question has been decided by judgment binding upon us, which we must follow.

THE COURT adhered.

The Sheriff assolvied the defender, finding that the statements alleged to have been made by him were true, and had been made by him in the discharge of his duty as minister; and further, found the girl and her father, her curator and administrator-in-law, liable, conjunctly and severally.

Fraser v.
Cameron.

In January 1892 James Fraser, mason, Rothies, Banffshire, presented a 2^d Division note of suspension to the Court of a charge at the instance of the Rev. Donald Cameron, Free Church minister, Rothies, for payment of sums of £100, 4s. 6d. and £18, 17s. 10d. Lord Low.

The complainer averred that in February 1891 his daughter Annie Fraser, aged nineteen, with his consent and concurrence as her curator and administrator-in-law, had instituted proceedings against the respondent for defamation of character; that on 2d September the Sheriff-substitute (Rampini), after a proof, had found that the respondent had uttered libellous and actionable statements against the complainer's daughter's character, but that the respondent was privileged in uttering them, and assolizied the respondent from the conclusions of the action, and found him entitled to expenses; that on appeal the Sheriff (Ivory) had recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, and found that the statements made by the defender were true, and that he acted throughout in the discharge of his duty as a minister of the congregation and moderator of the kirk-session to which the parties belonged, and assolizied the respondent, and found the complainer's daughter and the complainer, her curator and administrator-in-law, liable, conjunctly and severally, to the respondent in expenses, which amounted to £100;* and that subsequently the Sheriff-substitute had given decree for £18, 17s. 10d., the expenses of the appeal, "against the pursuer and the complainer in the same terms"; that the complainer was charged in his individual capacity to pay these expenses, and that as curator and administrator-in-law for his daughter he had no funds belonging to her in his possession.

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) It was ultra vires of the Sheriff to pronounce any decree against the complainer as an individual in respect of his having acted in the cause as curator and administrator-at-law of his said daughter, and the charge, in so far as it seeks to enforce payment of the foresaid decrees against the complainer as an individual, should be suspended. (2) It was incompetent for the Sheriff-substitute to decern against the complainer as curator and administrator-at-law of his said daughter, or as an individual, for the expenses incurred in the appeal against the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

The respondent pleaded;—(1) The complainer's averments are irrelevant. (2) The whole proceeding complained of having been competent and regular the note should be refused, with expenses.

On 20th February 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Low), "in respect the complainer does not offer caution," refused the note.

The complainer reclaimed.

During the discussion the respondent intimated that he was willing that caution should be dispensed with in order that the question as to the father's liability for expenses should be decided. The parties thereupon lodged a minute agreeing that the case should be treated as on a passed note.

Argued for the complainer;—It was incompetent for the Sheriff to find him personally liable for the expenses here. He was liable as his daughter's

* In his note the Sheriff stated:—"The pursuer's father, though not a pursuer in this action, has not only as her curator and administrator-in-law, but personally, taken a prominent and leading part in it, and the Sheriff has accordingly found him liable personally in expenses as well as the pursuer."

curator and administrator-in-law, but no further. He was not the dominus litis, for if the Sheriff had awarded damages the whole sum found due would have gone to his ward. Further, a father was not bound to concur with his daughter in an action, and if he declined to do so it was pars judicis to consider whether a curator ad litem should be appointed to her. But it was settled that such an officer could not be made liable in expenses individually. [LORD TRAYNER.—That is because he is an officer of Court.] It was equally settled that a judicial factor¹ and a curator bonis² could not be personally liable.

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not regard this case as one attended with any difficulty.

The female pursuer and her father conducted against the defender, who is the Free Church minister of the parish in which they reside, a litigation in which, upon the face of the case made, it is undoubtedly disclosed that the defender was privileged and in the execution of his duty in making the statements complained of.

The defender successfully defended himself, and now the question is, whether the father can in law be made to pay the expenses of process in which the Sheriff has found him liable.

Now, the father took upon himself the responsibility of the litigation. There was no obligation upon him to do so, or to give his consent to it. Having failed, it appears to me that he is just in the position of a litigant who has raised an action unsuccessfully, and that he is liable to pay the expenses of the action. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff is right.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I must say I have felt considerable sympathy with the suspender here, who, as the father of his daughter whose character has been assailed, has desired to try and vindicate her reputation.

I must hold, however, that the result of the action of damages shewed that the minister was acting in the discharge of what he honestly believed to be his duty, and without any malicious feeling towards the girl, and that the judgment of the Sheriff is well founded.

Then the question arises, whether it is within the Sheriff's competency, and that is the only point before us, to find not only the girl but her father liable in expenses to the defender.

I have no doubt that it is quite within his competency, and I may say, though the matter is not before us, that I see no reason to doubt that the Sheriff has exercised a wise discretion in finding both father and daughter liable, and that without trespassing upon the question of the liability of an administrator or curator giving his consent to an action. If he consents merely to make an action formally competent there may be just grounds for not subjecting him to liability for expenses, but here the matter is different.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT interposed authority to the joint minute for the part found and found the charge and whole grounds and warrants ordered proceeded with.

donald.

On 11th April 1891 the trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement brought an action of multiplepoinding for distribution of Mr Hall's estates, the main question raised being whether the estate fell to be distributed in terms of the trust-disposition and settlement, or in terms of the antenuptial contract.

The grandson, Andrew Hall Macdonald, and his father as his admini-

Macdonald.} claimants are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim. (2) In respect of the terms of the said marriage-contract, the trust-disposition and codicil were ultra vires, and ought not to receive effect, and the claims founded thereon ought to be repelled.

Mrs Hall, the widow, stated (what was not disputed) that the value of Mr Hall's estate at the date of the marriage was about £6000, and that at his death it amounted to £56,000 or thereby, and she claimed to be ranked and preferred to the liferent use of the whole fund, pleading,—On a sound construction of the antenuptial contract and trust-disposition and settlement, and in the circumstances as condescended on, the claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of her claim.

The trustees, other than the widow, as individuals, lodged a claim for their legacies under the trust-disposition, but the trustees, as such, lodged no claim to the whole estates to be administered by them in terms of the trust-disposition. As pursuers and real raisers they pleaded;—(1) The pursuers, as trustees foresaid, are liable in only once and single payment of the trust-estate held by them. (2) The pursuers are entitled to hold and administer the trust-estate for behoof of the party or parties who may be found to have just right thereto, or, alternative, on payment and conveyance of the estate to such persons and in such proportions as shall be determined herein, they are entitled to decree of exoneration and discharge, as concluded for.

On 19th November 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that on the dissolution of the marriage between the late Andrew Hall and the claimant Mrs Jane Chisholm Scott or Hall by the death of the said Andrew Hall, there was no living child of the marriage; (2) that the claimant Andrew Hall Macdonald is the sole heir of the said marriage; (3) that the whole estate of the said Andrew Hall vested in the said Andrew Hall Macdonald under the antenuptial contract of marriage between the said Andrew Hall and the said Jane Chisholm Scott or Hall, subject to the provision therein in favour of the said Jane Chisholm Scott or Hall; (4) that it was provided by the said marriage-contract that in the event of the dissolution of the marriage without a child of the marriage then living, which event occurred, the provision of the liferent of the estate to the widow should be restricted to an annuity of £150; (5) that the said restriction of the widow's liferent has not been effectually removed by the trust-disposition and settlement of the said Andrew Hall, and that the provision to her of a liferent of said estate is ineffectual, as being in breach of the said marriage-contract; (6) that the legacies to the claimants John Scott and Norman Reid were beyond the power of the testator, and are ineffectual: Therefore repels the claims of the claimants Mrs Jane Chisholm Scott or Hall and of John Scott and Norman Reid, and decerns: Finds that the claimant Andrew Hall Macdonald is entitled to the whole fund in medio, subject to the right of the said Mrs Jane Chisholm Scott or Hall to an annuity of £150, and to that effect sustains the claim of the said Andrew Hall Macdonald, and ranks and prefers him on the fund in medio accordingly."*

* "OPINION.—(After summarising the provisions of the marriage-contract)—It is thus provided that if there shall be no child alive at the dissolution of the marriage the widow's liferent shall be restricted to an annuity, and the first question is whether that provision applies when at the dissolution of the marriage no child of the marriage survives but a grandchild does, and that depends

Hall's Trustees v. Macdonald.

The widow and the trustees reclaimed, and argued ;—1. The provision by Mr Hall to the issue of the children of the marriage was purely testaon whether the word 'child' in this clause can be construed as including a grandchild.

"I was impressed with the argument in favour of that construction, but on full consideration I have come reluctantly to the conclusion that I cannot adopt it. I consider, indeed, that the word 'child' is flexible, and is capable of being read as comprehending a grandchild, but that interpretation cannot be readily adopted. According to its primary and natural signification the word certainly denotes only issue in the first degree, and in order to warrant the inclusion of grandchildren some clear and decided indication to that effect must be found in the rest of the deed.

"The words 'child' or 'children' occur in the deed several times, and in three instances are used in collocation with the issue of the children. In these three instances the meaning of the words is of necessity confined to issue of the first degree, and cannot, by any possibility, include grandchildren. Now, the meaning of the term in these instances being absolutely fixed, it is maintained that it falls to be construed in the same way in other parts of the deed. That is always a strong, and sometimes a conclusive, consideration ; and in the case of Edwards v. Hughes, 19th December 1890, 18 R. 319, was regarded as absolutely conclusive. I doubt whether it is absolutely conclusive in this case, for it seems difficult to hold that in at least one passage the word 'children' was not intended to extend to other issue. I allude to the clause of apportionment where the power is to apportion among the children with the declaration that, failing apportionment, the estate should be divided equally among the children and the issue of such of them as might have died. Reference was also made to the clause providing for action and execution on the contract, and it was maintained that it could not be supposed that the granter intended by this clause to protect the rights of his widow and children and not of his grandchildren. This argument, however, appears hardly conclusive, for the granter might have thought it right to leave the interests of grandchildren to be protected by their surviving parent or by trustees under their parents' marriage-contract.

"Further, when it is found that the granter takes pains to mention issue in particular instances, it is reasonable to infer that when he mentions children only he had not their issue in contemplation.

"It is quite true that some anomalous consequences follow from construing the word 'children' in the clause in question as not including grandchildren. For it would appear that under the first part of the deed the widow, if she married while a grandchild lived, would forfeit her whole life-ent, while under the second part so construed she would, if she married while a grandchild lived, have an annuity of £50. That is so, apparently, but then the deed is ill framed and ill conceived throughout. There is a similar difference between the provisions of the first part of the deed and those of the second applicable to the case of the widow marrying when no issue of the marriage survived. In the one case she would retain her whole life-ent, and if the latter part of the deed applied her provision would be restricted to £50. In a deed like this it does not, I think, go for much to point out an anomalous or unreasonable consequence as resulting from what is otherwise the natural construction of the deed. On the whole, I cannot find sufficient grounds for departing from the primary meaning of the words used, and for extending the meaning of the word 'child' in the particular clause in question so as to include a grandchild.

"If, therefore, this question falls to be determined by the marriage-contract, I think it must be held that the event has occurred in which the widow's life-ent was to be restricted to an annuity. I cannot say that I fully appreciate the object of this restriction or its reasonableness. But what I have to consider is not the propriety of the provision but merely the construction of the words.

"I think that the grandchild's provisions are protected by the marriage-contract, and were contractual and not testamentary—Mackie v. Gloag's Trustees, 6th March 1884, 11 R. (H. L.) 10—and that he is therefore in a position to mentary and revocable. The contrary view might be put on one or other of two grounds. It might be said that provision by a father in his marriage-contract to the issue of children of the marriage was presumably obligatory in the same way that provisions to the children themselves were presumably obligatory,—that was to say, that the father could not gratuitously revoke the provision; or it might be said that it was pars contractus in the particular case that the father should not be at liberty gratuitously to revoke his provisions to remoter issue of the marriage, just as it might be pars contractus that he should not so revoke provisions to strangers.¹ As regarded the first of these grounds, it had never been held that grandchildren were in this matter in the same position as children; the fair result of the authorities was that they were not.² The position of the immediate issue of a marriage was essentially different from that of remoter issue. A father was under a natural obligation to provide for his own immediate issue, and consequently a provision by him to them in his marriage-contract was presumed to be made in fulfilment of this natural obligation and so to be obligatory; but he was under no such natural obligation to his remoter issue, who had their own father to look to, and therefore provisions to them were presumably testamentary only. Then there was nothing in the deed here to lead to the conclusion that the provision to the issue of children was binding on Mr Hall as being pars contractus, while the clause giving him power of apportionment, and the clause of execution, neither of which mentioned the issue of children, were inconsistent with such a conclusion. But even if Mr Hall was not entitled at his own hand to revoke the provision to the issue of children, he could do so if Mrs Hall consented, for where the obligatory character of the provision depended on contract merely, and not also on natural obligation, it was within the power of the contracting parties jointly to determine the obligation, and Mrs Hall, although she had not expressed her consent during her husband's lifetime, must be held to have done so by lodging her claim in this action. It might be different where there was a trust which could be said to have divested the spouses for the benefit of third parties, as in Mackie v. Gloag.³ Here there was no trust, and no delivery to or for behoof of third parties. 2. In any view, Mrs Hall was not restricted to an annuity of £150, but was entitled to a liferent of the whole of her husband's estates. The sound construction of the clause of restriction was that the existence of grandchildren prevented the restriction from taking effect. If the word "child" plead that he has a jus crediti under the marriage-contract to the whole estate, burdened only by the annuity to the widow, and that Mr Hall was at his death under obligation, by the words of the marriage-contract, to provide to him the estate, subject to that burden.

"The next question is whether Mr Hall has, by his trust-deed, effectually removed the restriction on his widow's liferent to the detriment of the rights provided to the heir of the marriage. I have, with hesitation, and difficulty, and reluctance, also come to the conclusion that there is no sufficient authority for sustaining such a departure from the obligations in the marriage-contract."—[His Lordship then proceeded to consider this question, but as the Inner-House held the marriage-contract to be revocable quoad grandchildren, it is not necessary to refer further to the question.]

in the clause were held to be confined to immediate issue only, the result was to produce a contradiction between one part of the deed and another, as, indeed, the Lord Ordinary had pointed out.

Argued for Andrew Hall Macdonald ;—1. The provisions to the issue of children were contractual, not testamentary. There was a strong presumption that a man intended to provide for all his descendants, however remote, failing their own immediate parents ; and the terms of the gift here shewed that the issue of children were intended to come in the room of their predeceasing parents. It was admitted that had the grandchildren been left to come in under the destination to heirs, the provision quoad them would have been purely testamentary, but they were called specially, and that not by words of proper substitution, such as "whom failing," but as being in the same class as their parents, and the only object of so calling them which could be suggested was to give them a right different in kind from what they would have taken qua heirs, and identical with that of the children. The destination to the issue of the children, therefore, was not a mere substitution, but was part of the contractual provisions of the deed. 2. The widow's liferent was restricted to an annuity of £150, for the word "child" in the restrictive provision was to be read as confined to immediate issue only, which was its natural meaning.¹ The expression was children "procreated" of the marriage, which naturally suggested the actual issue of the marriage ; and then in other clauses issue were called per expressum, from which the reasonable inference was that when the parties meant to include remoter issue they said so.

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The main question which is raised on this record is whether the trust-disposition and settlement of the late Andrew Hall of Crossie, who died on the 19th of February 1891, is valid and effectual to give to his widow the liferent of his heritable and moveable estate, or whether he was precluded by the terms of an antenuptial contract of marriage from giving her more than an annuity of £150. There were no children of the marriage surviving at the date of its dissolution by the death of the husband, and it was maintained by the only grandchild that the marriage-contract has provided for this event by a stipulation binding on the spouses under which he is entitled to the whole estate, subject only to an annuity of £150 in favour of his grandmother.

The contract is in a very common form.—(His Lordship then narrated the substance of the deed.)

The question is, whether the destination in favour of the issue of the children of the marriage creates a right in the grandchildren of the spouses, which the husband could not defeat either by enlarging the annuity to his widow by bequeathing the fee of the estate as he might think fit. The Lord Ordinary has answered this question in the affirmative. He has held "that the grandchildren's provisions are protected by the marriage-contract, and were contractual and not testamentary, and that he is therefore in a position to plead that he has a jus cretiti under the marriage-contract to the whole estate, burdened only with the annuity to the widow, and that Mr Hall was at his death under obligation by the words of the marriage-contract, to provide to him the estate, subject to that burden." Now, I do not understand his Lordship to use the term.

crediti in this definition of the grandson's right in its stricter sense as implying a right to compete with other creditors. It is settled law that where marriage-contract provisions in favour of children are so conceived that the principal is not payable till after the father's death, and does not bear interest from any earlier term, and where no actual benefit or interest can be taken in his lifetime, there is no jus crediti vested in the children, who have nothing more than a spes successionis. But then that is a hope of succession which is protected by the father's obligations, which he cannot gratuitously defeat, and which therefore gives the children the right of creditors against him and his heirs, although they are themselves no more than heirs, in a question with his onerous creditors. It is therefore against the father and his legatees that the Lord Ordinary has held that the grandson in this case has exactly the same right, as a creditor under the marriage-contract, as the children of the marriage would have had if they had survived their father.

Hall's Trustees v. Macdonald.

I am unable to agree with his Lordship.

The general rule which is applicable to marriage-contracts is, that when the husband settles his property or any part of it upon his wife and the children of the marriage, with a destination to other persons on the failure of children, there is no jus crediti given to anyone as against him and his heirs except to the wife and to the children of the marriage, and any clauses of eventual destination to strangers or to remoter heirs must be regarded as mere gratuitous destinations which create no obligation against the granter or his heirs, and which he may therefore defeat at his pleasure. The law is so laid down by Erskine and Bankton, and it has received effect in a series of decisions to which I think it quite unnecessary to refer in detail, both because they are very familiar and because the principle is stated nowhere more clearly than by Lord Watson in the recent case of Mackie v. Gloag's Trustees, 11 R. (H. L.) 10. The House of Lords held in that case that an attempt had been made to bring within the scope of the principle a case which did not fall to be ruled by it, but Lord Watson recognises the principle as being perfectly sound and well established, and quotes with approval the statement of the general rule which is made by Mr Erskine,—“A father lies under no degree of restraint in favour of the substitutes who are called by the marriage-contract after the issue of the marriage, and who acquire no right by such substitution.” That is the general rule of law as quite clearly established by our institutional writers and by the series of decisions to which I have referred. The learned Lord goes on to explain its origin historically, as arising from the practice of Scottish conveyancers to introduce into dispositions of land made in contemplation of marriage, and afterwards into marriage settlements in the modern form, ulterior destinations which were merely incidental to the true purpose of the deed, and which in no way partook of its onerous character. The ground of distinction between the right of the children on the one hand, and the substitutes who may be called failing children on the other is very obvious, because the provisions in favour of children are onerous in the highest degree, whereas the ulterior destination in favour of strangers or remoter heirs for whom there is no antecedent obligation on the contracting parties to provide by an antenuptial settlement is purely gratuitous, and may therefore be revoked when the husband is set free by the failure of children to dispose of his estate by will. That the issue of the children of the marriage are in this respect in the same position as any other gratuitous substitutes is settled by the judgment in Pretty v. Newbigging, 16 D.

No. 112. 667, and by the precedents on which it was decided. Various questions were involved in that case which have no bearing on the present, but the fundamental ground of judgment is to be found in the distinction which was taken by the majority of the Court between the indefeasible right which arises to the children of the marriage from the obligation of their parents, and the mere hope of succession which may be given, failing children, to their issue.

Mar. 8, 1892.
Hall's Trustees v. MacDonald.

It is, no doubt, perfectly competent for the spouses, contracting with each other before marriage, to stipulate for benefits to other persons or classes of persons besides themselves and their children, and if a destination to the heirs or to other relatives of one of the spouses is the counterpart of an obligation in favour of the other, it will be just as onerous and irrevocable as the mutual provisions in favour of the spouses themselves. That is perfectly clear. But I am unable to find any indication of onerosity or mutuality in the deed which is here in question, except in so far as it provides for the wife and the immediate children of the marriage. Even as regards their interests, the settlement by the husband is in form testamentary. He remains the undivested owner of his whole estate during his life, with full and unrestricted power of control and disposal, because the condition that the estate which is to be carried by his conveyance shall belong to him at his death is applicable to acquisita as well as to acquiritur when as in the present case the former are included in the same general words of conveyance as the latter. This was decided in the case of Somerville in May 18. 1819, F. C. That decision was followed in Fernie v. Colquhoun, 1854, 17 D. 232, and I apprehend there can be no doubt that that is now the legal construction of such a conveyance. Now, that is just the kind of settlement in which an ultimate destination, which is purely testamentary in substance as well as in form, is most naturally to be expected. And accordingly it is not disputed that there is such a destination in the present contract, because the ultimate donees are the heirs whomsoever of the husband. But then it is said that the grandchildren are not in the same position as the husband's heirs, because they would not have been specially mentioned at all, since they would naturally have been the heirs if there were no children of the marriage surviving, unless the intention of the contracting parties had been to raise them to the same level as the immediate children of the marriage, and to give them the same rights. I think the observation upon which that argument is founded is not altogether accurate, because the grandchildren—if there had been more than one—taking as heirs by operation of law, would not have taken the whole mixed estate equally among themselves as directed by this settlement, but would have taken their several interests in the heritable and moveable estate as heirs and next of kin respectively. But the question is not whether the settlor intended at the date of this contract to give the same benefit in the contingency for which he was providing to his grandchildren as he had given to his children if they should survive him, but whether the intention so expressed rests upon contract and is embodied in words of obligation, or whether it is a mere expression of goodwill, and is therefore testamentary and revocable. Now, that is a question of intention which is to be gathered from the words of gift alone, because as I have said these are in form testamentary words. The form of the settlement is that of a mortis causa settlement, and therefore in order to determine whether any particular gift is onerous or not, we must look elsewhere than to the mere words of gift. We must consider whether there is any antecedent obligation irrespective of particular stipulations in the contract itself, or if not, whether there is an express or implied stipulation which makes the provision binding upon the husband. No. 112.

Now, as to the first point there is, as I have said, no antecedent obligation to provide for grandchildren so as to create any presumption of onerosity from the mere character of the legatees, or from their relation to the settlor. And therefore we must look to the remaining clauses of the deed in order to see whether we can discover any stipulation made by the wife that the husband shall leave all his estate to their grandchildren in the event which has happened. The only provision in the contract which seems to suggest any argument to that effect is the clause by which the wife gives everything belonging to her to her husband and his heirs. But the ultimate destination of the husband's property also is to his own heirs, and not to the heirs of his wife. And therefore, while the settlement by the wife is certainly made in consideration of the provisions by the husband for her and her children, there would seem to be very slender ground for holding that the substitution, on the failure of children, was also a material consideration for the wife's settlement.

Mar. 8, 1892.
Hall's Trustees v. Macdonald.

But there are other clauses which have a very important bearing on the question; and it appears to me that the clause immediately following the destination by the husband is altogether inconsistent with the notion that the substitution of grandchildren is matter of stipulation, and is quite consistent with the notion that the husband intended a testamentary benefit for his grandchildren and nothing more. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in the construction which he puts upon the words of this clause, in so far as regards the condition upon which it is stipulated that the wife's liferent interest shall be restricted to an annuity of £150. The condition is that in case there be no children procreated of the marriage, or if there shall be no living child or children at the dissolution of the marriage, then the liferent provision to the wife shall be restricted as I have said. I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary that children in that clause cannot mean grandchildren, and therefore that the restriction is to take effect if there be no children alive at the husband's death, even although there be grandchildren alive. But, then, what is the inference from that construction of the clause? It appears to me to be perfectly clear that that is a stipulation in favour of the husband, and not against him. The husband undertakes to give his wife a liferent of his whole estate if there are children alive, to whom the whole estate is to go in fee. But then he stipulates that if there are no children, and therefore no absolute disposal of the fee of the estate, her interest is to be restricted to an annuity of £150 a-year. That is to say, he does not bind himself to give her more, but he certainly does not bind himself not to give her more if he thinks fit. It is a stipulation in his favour. The suggestion that it is a stipulation by the wife as against the husband, that if there be no children but only grandchildren alive at his death, he shall not be allowed to give her more than £150 a-year, however large his estate may be, appears to me to be very hard to maintain. And therefore I am unable to find in that clause any indication of mutuality or onerosity which should prevent the husband from disposing of his whole estate as he may think fit; and I find the strongest possible evidence that there was no such mutuality. The inference which I draw from the construction of that clause is very strongly confirmed by two subsequent clauses of the deed. In the first place, the husband reserves to himself a power of apportionment and division among the children of the marriage, and no such power of apportionment or division among grandchildren. Now, if he had been bound by obligation to give the same interest to his grandchildren as to his children, one does not see why he should not have made the same reservation of a power of apportionment in the one case as in the other, whereas if his gift to his grandchildren was testamentary, and the gift to the children alone obligatory, one can quite understand the reason why he should think it necessary to reserve a power in the one case which reserved itself in the other. But the following clause appears to me to be still more conclusive in favour of the view which I am disposed to take, because I think the contract itself very clearly distinguishes between those provisions which according to the intention of the contract were to be obligatory and those provisions which according to its intention were to be testamentary only. For the final clause is that execution shall pass upon the contract for implement thereof in favour of the wife and of the children of the marriage, at the instance of certain trustees who are named. Now, I agree again with the Lord Ordinary that when the words "children of the marriage" are to be found alone in any clause of this deed they mean what they say; they mean children, and they do not mean grandchildren. And therefore the parties stipulate that the provisions in favour of children and of the wife are to be enforceable at the instance of trustees for their behoof; and they make no provision for the enforcement of ulterior destinations either in favour of grandchildren or in favour of heirs. That appears to me to afford a very clear indication of an intention on the part of the parties to this contract to distinguish between those provisions which were intended to be testamentary and revocable because they were in their own nature gratuitous, and those provisions which were intended to be obligatory and enforceable by action at law. If that view be taken of the deed, it appears to me that all its provisions are perfectly consistent, and stand together in a perfectly logical and intelligible way. On the other view maintained by the respondent, I think we are involved—as indeed the Lord Ordinary finds himself involved—in serious difficulties of construction. The conclusion therefore at which I arrive upon this main question of construction is, that the deed is onerous in so far as regards the interests of the spouses and of the children of the marriage, and purely testamentary in so far as regards ulterior interests beyond theirs, including among those ulterior interests the destination in favour of grandchildren as well as the destination in favour of the husband's heirs.

No. 112.

But if one could find in the deed a stipulation by the wife that in a certain event the husband's property should be given to their grandchildren, although that would undoubtedly be onerous, and therefore binding as between the contracting parties, I am not persuaded that it would be binding upon both of them, so as to make it impossible for both to recall it, because it must be kept in view in considering the legal effect of this deed that while it is irrevocable and requires no delivery as a contract between the parties themselves, it is not delivered to anybody on behalf of any third persons to whom interests under it may have been given. It remained latent, and under the control of the spouses or of the husband. Now, if married persons agree together that they will leave property, or that one of them will leave his property to relations or strangers in whom they may happen to be interested, but towards whom they have no antecedent obligation whatever, and if having so agreed, their contract is retained in their own power and under their own control one does not see why they should not be allowed to alter and revoke it at pleasure so long as it is not delivered. Now, we are exactly in the same position in considering the effect of the husband's deed as if the wife had formally and expressly agreed to it, because she claims to take benefit under her husband's will, which is said to be inconsistent with their marriage settlement. And therefore we have both spouses concurring in discharging the formal obligation, if any such obligation were to be found in the marriage-contract, to give the property to the grandchildren in the case that has occurred.

Hall's Trustees v. Macdonald.

The only case which was cited and commented upon in support of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor to which I think it necessary to refer is the case of Mackie v. Gloag's Trustees, and it appears to me to be no precedent for the decision of the present case. I think it a very valuable authority, because the principle upon which this case ought, in my opinion, to be decided was there clearly recognised, and is illustrated by contrast. But the decision itself is in no way in point. The marriage-contract in that case did not convey the estate which should belong to the granter, Mrs Gloag, at her death, nor was its effect suspended till that event should occur. On the contrary, it was a de presenti conveyance of certain specified estate in favour of the existing children of the granter and of the children to be born of the marriage. The granter was entirely divested of that estate by the delivery of the trust-deed to trustees for behoof of beneficiaries therein named, and so soon as it was ascertained that the granter was so divested, the only question for consideration was a question of construction as to whether the purposes for which the trustees were to hold and to include the original owner included a benefit to the existing children of the granter of the deed, or whether they were confined to the benefit of the future children of the marriage only. Upon that question of construction it was held in the House of Lords that the children of both marriages stood exactly in the same position, but the ground of judgment of the House of Lords and the ground on which Lord Rutherford Clark dissented in this Court was, that this, being an immediate de presenti conveyance divesting the granter, could not be brought within the scope of the principle which was recognised by all the Judges as the proper principle for the construction of marriage-contracts containing provisions for children and ulterior destinations. In the present case it appears to me that the question we have to determine is, whether the provisions in favour of the grandchildren are testamentary or contractual and obligatory? There is no question of construction as to the meaning of the destination. The interest which is given to each series of heirs in succession is identical. The only question is, whether the gift beyond the children of the marriage stands on obligation or whether it is testamentary? and for the reasons I have stated I am of opinion that it is testamentary only.

The result must be, in my opinion, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be recalled, that the claim of the widow must be sustained, and that the claim of the grandchild must be repelled.

If I am right in the views I have expressed, it follows that the claim for the trustees is well founded in substance, but I am not satisfied that we can sustain it as it stands. The trustees are entitled under the trust-disposition to a legacy of £500 each in favour of the acceptor or acceptors and survivor or survivors of them for their trouble in connection with the trust. Now, it appears to me that the proper position for these trustees to take in this competition was to claim the fund in medio to be administered in terms of their trust, and if that claim had been sustained, then it would follow as a consequence that if the legacy to them is a good legacy they would pay it to themselves and get the benefit of it. But they make no claim to administer the trust. They put in a separate substantive claim for a legacy as if it were a mere bequest in their favour, irrespective of their acceptance of the trust, and they ask to be preferred in the fund in medio to the extent of £500 each without saying anything as to what is to become of the rest of the fund. It does not appear to me that we can sustain that claim as it stands, but, if your Lordships agree with me, there can be no great difficulty in the trustees amending their claim.

LORD ADAM.—It appears from the marriage-contract here that in contemplation of his marriage Mr Hall disposed in favour of his promised spouse, in life-rent for her life-rent use alienably, subject to certain restrictions named in the contract, and to the child or children of the intended marriage and the issue of the bodies of such children, whom failing, to his own heirs and assignees whomsoever, all and sundry his estate, heritable and moveable, as at the time of his death. The question is, whether that destination to the issue of the bodies of such children gave the issue a jus crediti under the marriage-contract, or whether that was a testamentary provision only. As regards the children of the marriage, it is of course settled law that the provisions in their favour in a marriage-contract are contractual in the highest degree, and that the contracting parties, the husband and wife, cannot defeat the rights secured to the children by the marriage-contract. There is no doubt about the law on that subject. What the reason of the law may be is of very little consequence, although it probably originated in the claims which ex jure naturali children have against their parents. But the children of such children are in an entirely different position. They have no claim which the law recognises in the same sense as children. They have their own father and mother, and their own father and mother's marriage-contract with reference to any claims they may have, and so far as I recollect there is no case establishing that under such a destination as this grandchildren have a jus crediti. No such case was quoted to us, and the only case which the Lord Ordinary refers to is the case of Mackie v. Glog. I agree with Lord Kinnear in thinking that that case is not an authority for any such proposition. I am far from saying that a provision in a marriage-contract calling persons after the children of the marriage may not be contractual, but the question would depend on the construction of the whole settlement. If it appears, construing the whole settlement, that it was the intention of the contracting parties that a benefit should be secured to such persons, that will be given effect to. But it must arise upon a consideration of the whole clauses of the contract. The old case of Kinsman v. Scot, in the Dictionary, 12,980, was an example of that. There the destination of the husband's property after the children of the marriage was to the heirs of the wife, and the Court, considering the whole contract, came to the conclusion that the provision was contractual and not testamentary, and accordingly they preferred the heirs of the wife. In the case of Mackie, again, it was held, upon a construction of the whole contract, that the provision in favour of the children already procreated of a previous marriage was meant to be contractual, and numerous cases of the kind might be instanced where the decision proceeded upon a construction of the whole contract. But there is nothing in this contract that I can find to suggest that it was the intention of the contracting parties here to give to the grandchildren a contractual right. There are clauses in the contract which I think point exactly the other way, and particularly those to which Lord Kinnear No. 112. referred.

If that be so, and if the destination in this contract to children is a pure destination to children and nothing else, then the result is, that the objects of the trust having failed, the estate of the husband returns to him unaffected by anything unless in so far as he is restricted from dealing with it by the terms of the contract of marriage itself. If that destination is purely testamentary, the result must be that the husband acquires uncontrolled right to the estate except so far as he has restricted himself by the marriage-contract, for there is no other deed existing that I know of which restricts his power to any extent or effect. Now, by the clause in question he did restrict himself, because he left a liferent of his whole estate to his widow to be restricted in certain events, and in the event of no living child of the marriage being in existence at the dissolution of the marriage the widow was only to receive £150 a-year. If that event had not occurred, it is clear that as between the husband and wife he could not have defeated the right given to the wife. But that event has occurred, and the widow's right is now restricted to £150 a-year. But I do not see why the husband should not dispense with that restriction, for that is really all he has done in this case. He has simply dispensed with the restriction imposed in his own favour, and being unlimited proprietor of the estate, I cannot see why he might not do so. It was entirely a matter between him and his widow, no third parties being concerned in the matter. The grandchild has no jus crediti under the marriage-contract, and I cannot see what title he has to interfere. If he has no such jus crediti, what right has he to say to his grandfather and grandmother together, or to the grandfather alone, that he shall not dispose of his own estate without consulting him? Now, I think that is the whole case, and holding the proper construction of the marriage-contract to be as I have stated, I think the husband was quite entitled to dispense with the restriction of the annuity to £150, and that he had the right to dispose of his own estate. I therefore concur with Lord Kinnear.

Mar. 8, 1892.
Hall's Trustees v. Macdonald.

LORD McLAREN.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Kinnear. I would just say in a sentence that it appears to me that the cases in which a grantee under a marriage settlement can claim an indefeasible right may be referred to the three categories which Lord Kinnear has fully examined in his opinion. The indefeasible right must arise from the relation in which the grantee stands towards the parties to the contract, or it must arise from express obligation, or again from the circumstance that one of the parties at the time of the execution of the contract, or at some time during their joint lives, has put property into the hands of third parties, trustees for the benefit of the claimant amongst others. Now, the present case appears to me not to fall under any of those heads. A provision to grandchildren is not presumed to be obligatory in respect of relationship because the parents are not at least in the first instance bound to provide for their grandchildren. The primary duty of providing for them lies upon their own parents. Then I find in the clauses which have been examined by your Lordships no evidence of any obligation, and there is not even that inferential obligation which is sometimes held to exist where one spouse promises to do something for the heir or relative of the other spouse. Then again the case is distinguished from Mackie v. Gloag's Trustees by the absence of any deed of present gift delivered by the parties. The case therefore appears to me to fail entirely, and the result is that the spouses, subject to the right given to one another and to the immediate issue of the marriage, were in my opinion entirely unfettered in the disposal of their respective estates.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur. We shall allow the claim of the trustees to be amended to the effect of claiming the whole estate to be administered according to the trust, and then we shall rank them in terms thereof.

An amendment of the claim for John Scott and others, to the effect of making it a claim for them and Mrs Hall to be ranked and preferred to the fund that they might administer it as trustees, was then put in.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—"Recall the said interlocutor: Repel the claim for Andrew Hall Macdonald and the Rev. Colin Macdonald, his administrator: Sustain the claim for the said Mrs Jane Chisholm Scott or Hall, and rank and prefer her on the fund in medio in terms thereof: Allow the condescendence and claim for John Scott, Hugh Ross, and Norman Reid to be amended at the bar, and sustain the said claim as amended, and rank and prefer the said claimants on the fund in medio in terms thereof, and decern."

Process—Appeal—Proof or jury trial—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV cap. 120), sec. 40.—In an action of damages for assault which had been appealed for jury trial under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, the defender moved the Court to send the case back to the Sheriff Court, on the ground that it was of such a trifling character as not to be suitable for jury trial. The Court, on the ground that if the cause had originated in the Court of Session it would have been sent to a jury, refused the defender's motion, and approved of issues.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.

MRS CRABB, Lilybank Road, Dundee, as curator and administrator-in-law of her pupil son, William Crabb, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Dundee against George Fraser, fruiterer, Craigiebank, Dundee, for payment of £150 as damages for an assault alleged to have been committed by the defender on her son.

The pursuer averred that her son having taken a turnip from a field on the defender's farm, the defender had set his dog upon him; that the dog had bitten him; that defender had struck him, and had threatened him with liquid manure.

The defender denied the more material of these averments, and stated that the whole affair was of the most trifling description, intended merely to frighten the lad from trespassing on the defender's farm.

The Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial, and having lodged issues, moved the Court to approve thereof.

The defender opposed and moved the Court to send the case back to the Sheriff, arguing that the Court had a discretion, in appeals under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, either to send the case to a jury or to remit it to the Sheriff. Here the case was of the most trivial character which it would be absurd to send to a jury. The appropriated causes were not necessarily sent to a jury.¹

Argued for the pursuer;—The present case was in the class of cases appropriated for jury trial, which if the case had originated in the Court of Session would have been sent to a jury as of course, unless the parties consented to a proof. The circumstance that the case had come up under the 40th section of the Judicature Act made no difference, for it was now settled that such cases were to be treated in all respects as if they had originated in the Court of Session.¹

Crabb v.

Fraser.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Prima facie, the proposal of the defender and respondent, that this action should be tried in the Sheriff Court, cannot be said to be unfit or unreasonable. But we must determine upon it with a due regard to the 40th section of the Judicature Act, and so as to give fair play to the system thereby established. This action is now in the Court of Session, and the pursuer, who has taken the appeal for the purpose of jury trial, claims to have her case so disposed of. Now, while the power of the Court to send back for trial in the Sheriff Court cases appealed under this section cannot be disputed, this power has been exercised in view of the category to which the case under consideration belonged. This is an action of damages for assault, and, if it had originated in the Court of Session, it would for that reason unquestionably have gone to a jury. As it is now here, under this statutory power of appeal, I think we must proceed upon this same criterion of what is to be the mode of trial. We could only adopt the opposite course if we were to form some conjecture as to the substantiality of the pursuer's case in each action of damages for assault, and send back for trial before the Sheriff those cases which prima facie did not look well.

There is an obvious inconvenience in such a selection having to be made by the Court which might ultimately have to review the merits of the remitted cases; and it appears to me that the sound rule, and that most conformable to the statute as well as to the decisions, is to send for jury trial those cases which by the legal quality of their ground of action would be designated for jury trial if they had originated in the Court of Session. In all cases, of course, the rule is subject to the statutory condition if special cause be not shewn. But the class of assault is one in which this qualification requires to be stated rather as matter of theory than as of appreciable practical importance.

The pursuer and appellant having moved us to approve the issues proposed by her, I think our proper course is, on her motion, to do so.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT approved of the issues proposed by the pursuer, and remitted the case to a Lord Ordinary for trial by jury.

Cautioner.—Septennial limitation of cautionary obligations—Act 1695, c. 5.
—A bond for borrowed money dated in November 1881 contained an obligation by the borrower to repay the principal sum at Whitsunday 1882, and an obligation by the borrower, and by certain persons as cautioners, to pay at said term the interest then due and interest half-yearly thereafter during the non-payment of the principal sum. Interest was duly paid on the bond until March 1890.

Molleson v.
Hutchison.

In an action against one of the cautioners for payment of his share of the interest from Martinmas 1890 the defender pleaded that the cautionary obligation had been extinguished by the Act 1695, c. 5.

Held by a majority of seven Judges (the Lord President, Lord Young, Lord Rutherford Clark, and Lord M'Laren) (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth Darling) that as the interest sued for was not due till after the lapse of seven years from the date of the bond, the cautionary obligation to pay that interest was not affected by the Act.

Diss. the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Adam, and Lord Trayner, who were of opinion that as payment of the principal sum and interest might have been enforced at any time within seven years from the date of the bond, after which no interest would have been due, the cautionary obligation was extinguished by the lapse of that time.

2D DIVISION,

Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

IN November 1881 the Craiglockhart Hydropathic Company, Limited, granted a bond and disposition in security to Ralph E. Scott and others, trustees of the English and Scottish Law Life Assurance Association, for a loan of £25,000, which the company bound itself to repay at Whitsunday 1882. The bond contained the following obligation as to interest:—"We, the said" company, "and we Robert Hutchison, Esquire of Canlowrie . . ." (and six other persons) "hereby bind ourselves, jointly and severally, and our respective heirs, executors, and representative whomsoever, as cautioners and sureties for and with the said Craiglockhart Hydropathic Company, Limited, to pay to the said Ralph Erskine Scott, &c., as trustees foresaid, and their foresaids, the interest of the said principal sum, at the rate of 5 per centum per annum, from the date hereof to the said term of payment, and half-yearly, termly, and proportionally thereafter during the not payment of the principal sum, and that at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment of the said interest at the said term of Whitsunday next to come for the interest due preceding that date, and the next term's payment thereof at Martinmas following and so forth half-yearly, termly, and proportionally thereafter during the not payment of the principal sum, with a fifth part more of the interest due at each term of liquidate penalty in case of failure in the punctual payment thereof."

In May 1884 the bond was assigned to James Alexander Molleson, C.

In July 1884 the Court pronounced an order for winding up the company.

The subjects conveyed in security were sold for £13,800, on 12th March 1890, by Mr Molleson. After deducting that price from £25,000, there remained a balance of principal of £11,200.

On 16th December 1890 Molleson raised against Robert Hutchison an action, concluding for £1600, with interest at 5 per cent from Whitsunday 1890, or otherwise,—“(First) The defender ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £40, with interest on said sum of £40 at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date of citation to follow hereon until payment; and (second) the defender ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuer, and his executors and assignees, (1) of the interest of the said principal sum of £1600, at the rate of £5 per centum per annum, from and after the term of Martinmas 1890, and in all time coming, and that half-yearly, termly, and proportionally during the not payment of the said principal sum, and that at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment of the said interest, viz. the sum of £40, at the term of Whitsunday 1891, for the interest due preceding that date, and the next term's payment thereof, being the 12 sum of £40, at Martinmas following, and so forth half-yearly, termly, and proportionally thereafter during the not payment of the said principal sum; the same terms of payment respectively being always first come and bygone, with the interest of each of the said sums at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the time when the same falls due until payment; or otherwise (2) of the sum of £40 at each term of Whitsunday and Martinmas in all time coming, beginning the first payment at Whitsunday 1891, with interest on each term's payment at 5 per centum per annum from each term when the same becomes due till paid."

Hutchison.

The pursuer stated that "the rateable proportion" of the sum of £11,200 remaining due to him, "for which the defender is liable under the obligation in the said bond to the pursuer as now in right of the said bond, is one-seventh, viz., £1600, with interest thereon at 5 per cent from the term of Whitsunday 1890 till payment, or failing such liability he is liable under the said obligation for interest since said term in perpetuity on the said amount. As the defender has failed to pay the said £1600, and arrears of interest due, the present action has been rendered necessary."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer is entitled to decree against the defender, in respect of the obligation undertaken by the latter in the said bond and disposition in security, for the proportion due by him and still remaining unpaid of the balance of the principal sum therein contained, with interest thereon as concluded for, with expenses. (2) Or otherwise, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the alternative conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The obligation of the defender under the said bond and disposition in security having been extinguished by the operation of the Statute 1695, cap. 5,* the defender should be assoilzied.

The pursuer did not insist on his conclusion for payment of the principal.

The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling), on 2d June 1891, sustained the defender's second plea in law, and assoilzied him.†

* The Act 1695, c. 5, enacts that "considering the great hurt and prejudice that hath befallen many persons and families, and oftentimes to their utter ruine and undoing, by men's facility to engage as cautioners for others, who afterwards failing have left a growing burden on their cautioners without relief, therefore and for remeied thereof . . . no man binding and ingaging for hereafter for and with another, conjunctly and severally, in any bond or contract for sums of money shall be bound for the said sums for longer than seven years after the date of the bond, but that from and after the said seven years the said cautioner shall be eo ipso free of his caution; and that whoever is bound for another, either as express cautioner or as principal or as co-principal, shall be understood to be a cautioner, to have the benefite of this Act; provided that he have either clause of relief in the bond, or a bond of relief apart, intimat personally to the creditor at his receiving of the bond, without prejudice always to the true principals being bound in the whole contents of the bond or contract; also of the said cautioners being still bound, conform to the terms of the bond, within the said seven years as before the passing of this Act, . . ."—(Here followed a clause saving diligence done within the seven years.)

"It is plain that the defender cannot be liable for the principal, or any part of it, except as an indirect consequence of his liability for the interest. If he is liable for the interest in perpetuity, he might desire to pay up the principal in order to escape from an interminable burden, but he cannot be compelled to do so. The important question is whether the statute applies to the obligation

No. 114.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Mar. 9, 1892.
Molleson v.
Hutchison.

In the course of the debate the pursuer proposed to add this plea;—

for interest. I am of opinion that it does, and that the defender is entitled to absolvitor.

"The statute, after narrating 'the great hurt and prejudice that hath befallen many persons and families, and oftentimes to their utter ruine and undoing, by men's facility to engage as cautioners for others,' ordains, in words which Lord Brougham described as more strong than he remembered to have seen in any statute, Scotch or English, with respect to anything in the nature of limitation or prescription (Scott v. Yuille, 5 W. & S. 436), 'that no man binding and engaging for hereafter, for and with another, conjunctly and severally, in any bond or contract for sums of money, shall be bound for the said sums for longer than seven years after the date of the bond, but that from and after the said seven years the said cautioner shall be eo ipso free of his caution.'

"Then follow some words defining more precisely the cautioners who are to have the benefit of the Act, including anyone who is bound for another 'as express cautioner.'

"Now, the defender here is an express cautioner, described as such in a bond for borrowed money, and therefore I think there can be no doubt that, if he had been bound for the principal, the Act would have entirely extinguished his obligation at the end of seven years from the date of the bond, that is to say, on 16th November 1888. For the Act is so peremptory in its terms that the practical effect of it is simply to write into every bond or contract to which it applies a declaration that the obligation of the cautioner shall endure for seven years from its date, and no longer.

"Can the case of the cautioner be worse when he undertakes liability, not for the principal, but for something which is accessory to the principal, viz, the interest? It would be a strange result if this were so, and certainly there is nothing on the face of the Act to lead to it, for it speaks of 'sums of money,' without distinction. It is a drastic Act in any view, but there is nothing more drastic in saying 'a man shall not be liable for interest for more than seven years,' than in saying the same of a capital sum.

"But the pursuer appeals to three cases which establish, in his view, the proposition that the Act has no application to any sum the term of payment of which is beyond the seven years. These cases are Balraird (1709), M. 11,100; Borthwick (1715), M. 11,008, and Miller (1762), M. 11,027. Balraird was the case of a cautioner for payment of a widow's jointure, and it was held that the Act did not apply, on the ground that no diligence could be used so long as the annuity was punctually paid, which was done during all the seven years; but the Court expressly distinguished this from a bond for borrowed money under which the creditor might call up his money within the septennium. Borthwick was the case of a bond payable after the death of the creditor's wife, who survived the seven years; and Miller was the case of a bond in which the principal was not to be paid till a fixed term—eight years after the date of the bond. In both the ground of judgment was that no sums fell due for which diligence could have been used within the seven years. In all three it may be that some violence was done to the express words of the statute. But at all events there was this justification for all of them, that the creditor was helpless as regards either calling up the money or doing diligence, whereas in the present case he had his remedy in his own hands, and it was only by his neglect in allowing the principal to lie that any sum of interest was due after the seven years had expired. I cannot therefore recognise in these cases any justification for refusing to give effect to the express words of the statute.

"If the pursuer's argument is sound, it follows that the Act can never be of any use to a cautioner for interest alone. There is certainly no good reason why the same should not apply to a man who is cautioner both for interest and principal. Yet the cases shew that where a charge was given within the seven years, and action was not raised till long afterwards, the cautioner was liable, not for interest during the whole period of the not payment, but

The defender's obligation under the said bond has not been extinguished by the operation of the Statute 1695, c. 5, in respect the sums sued for were not due or payable till after the lapse of seven years from the date of the bond.

Molleson v.
Hutchison.

The Second Division, after hearing argument, appointed the cause to be heard before seven Judges.

Argued for the pursuer;—The specialty of the case was that the defender was bound for the interest only and not the principal. The interest sued for all became due after seven years from the date of the bond. The question was whether that interest fell within the septennial limitation (which, it must be observed, was not a mere limitation of action, but affected the constitution of the contract itself).¹ It did not, for this reason, that the creditor could not sue for it till the seven years had expired. The Act implied that the creditor could recover in the seven years if he used due diligence. It did not therefore apply to a case where he could not sue during the seven years. The cases of Balvaird, Borthwick, and Miller, cited by the Lord Ordinary, shewed that. Upon them Erskine² founded his statement,—“Neither do obligations fall under this Act where the condition is not purified, nor the term of payment come within the seven years after the date of the obligation, because no diligence can be used upon these.” The same was Bell's doctrine in his Principles.³ The proviso at the end of the Act saving diligences done within the seven years shewed that that was its intention. It was clear that no action could be raised till a debt was actually due.⁴ The rule was recognised in *Kerr v. Bremner*⁵ (a case no doubt somewhat remote from the present, because it pertained to the bond of caution for a factor), and in Alexander's case,⁶ in for the principal and seven years' interest—(Reid v. Maxwell (1780), M. 11,043). So in Scott v. Yuille, cited above, where interest had been paid after the seven years, and this circumstance was pleaded as barring the cautioner from founding on the statute, it was held that there was no bar, because he was not bound to pay the interest (Lord Chancellor's opinion, 444). This can only have been on the ground that the interest was a mere accessory of the principal.

“It is right to add that I was referred to a passage in Bell's Comm. (i. 365), in which the learned author deals with obligations to pay interest on the sum in a bond, and says that while they look like obligations for interest only, they seem to ‘result in an obligation for the principal sum,’ and ‘must be ruled by the same principles which regulate annuities.’ He is not at the moment speaking of the septennial limitation, but it is difficult to account for his language, unless he thought that an obligation to pay interest was a perpetual obligation to which the Act did not apply. The passage, however, is too incidental to be invested with much authority; and if it involves the proposition that an obligation to pay interest alone carries with it a heavier liability than an obligation to pay principal alone, or principal and interest combined, I cannot assent to it.

“It may be that all parties intended and expected the money to lie for an indefinite time, and that the creditor's case is not without hardship. But there are no averments on record that the cautioner solicited delay, or prevented action being taken, or in any way barred himself from pleading prescription. The result might have been obviated, either at first by the creditor taking the bond in such a way as to exclude the Act (which is not difficult) or afterwards by his calling up the money within the septennium.”

which opinions were given that the statute did not apply to cash-credit bonds. The Lord Ordinary said that if the defender had been bound for the principal he would have escaped this claim, and asked, "Can the case of the cautioner be worse when he undertakes liability, not for the principal, but for something which is accessory to the principal, the interest?" But he failed to observe that the pursuer had no hold upon the defender during the seven years. His Lordship justified the case of Balvaird, because "the creditor was helpless as regards either calling up the money or doing diligence." That was the very reason the present pursuer should also succeed. If the defender had been bound for the principal he would have been sued for it within the seven years. The interest was damages for non-payment of the principal. It was not borrowed money, and in some of the cases it was thought the Act applied only to borrowed money. The interest here formed an annuity to the pursuer, and to any case of annuity or obligation ad factum præstandum the Act did not apply.

Argued for the defender;—It was not disputed that the Act was a limitation of the obligation, not merely of the remedy. It in effect read into the cautionary obligation, "but this obligation shall only endure for seven years." The case fell within its words. It would have been a clear case if the defender had been bound for the principal. The interest was an accessory of the principal. This was a bond for borrowed money. That borrowed money became due in six months. The interest ran from the date of that bond. These features distinguished the case from Balvaird: case, where the only debt was each term's annuity as it fell due. The test was not that the creditor was non valens agere, but if it were, inability to sue did not exist. The money obligation was expending itself from day to day from the date of the bond. That distinguished the case from cases of bonds for the performance of an office. The pursuer and his authors had six and a-half years in which to enforce the claim against the principal. [LORD M'LAREN.—Suppose he had tried, and the debtor and the security were worthless?] If the principal were worthless, that was the misfortune of the creditor. The class of cases like Balvaird, which Professor Bell¹ said had construed the Act "too strictly," might be sound, but such exceptions from the Act ought not to be extended.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The liability sought to be established against the defender is for a sum of money due at Martinmas 1890. It is admitted that, apart from the operation of the Act 1695, c. 5, the obligation to pay this money was validly undertaken by the defender in a bond dated in November 1881. The bond was primarily for a principal sum of £25,000 advanced to the Craiglockhart Hydro-pathic Company, Limited, and for this sum—the term of payment of which was Whitsunday 1882—the defender was not bound. The defender's obligation, which was, and was expressed to be, that of a cautioner, was to pay the interest of the principal sum at the rate of five per cent from the date of the bond to the said term of payment, and half-yearly, termly, and proportionally thereafter during the non-payment of the principal sum at Whitsunday and Martinmas.

The defender has pleaded that his obligation under the bond has been extinguished by the operation of the Statute 1695, c. 5, while the pursuer's answer is thus stated in what he has proposed to add as his third plea,—“The defender's obligation under the said bond has not been extinguished by the operation of the Statute 1695, c. 5, in respect the sums sued for were not due and payable till after the lapse of seven years from the date of the bond." My opinion No. 114 is that the latter plea is well founded in the law as now authoritatively settled.

Molleson v.
Hutchison.

If the terms of the statute be looked at, apart from all authority, there is much to be said for the view that it means that all cautionary obligations for the payment of money, no matter when prestable, last for seven years, and no longer. But then all this was said and was rejected by the Court within fifteen years after the passing of the statute, and the rule was laid down that the statute only extinguishes obligations prestable within the septennium. The case of Balvaird, which was decided in 1709, seems to me completely to cover the present question, the only difference being that the liability there was to pay an annual sum in name of annuity, and here it is to pay an annual sum in name of interest. There, as here, there was a liability to pay such annual sums within the septennium as well as beyond it. There, as here, the liability sought to be established was for annual payments due after the septennium had expired. The principle expressly laid down by the Court in Balvaird, that every year nata erat nova obligatio, supplies a rule which applies equally to this case as to that. The statute, according to Balvaird, does not cut down a liability to pay money in 1890 undertaken by a cautionary bond in 1881. The decision, therefore, definitely negatives the interpretation of the statute which, with much apparent plausibility, would make the date of performance immaterial; and the subsequent cases of Borthwick and Miller, the former decided in 1715 and the latter in 1762, directly follow, and confirm the rule thus established. In the former case the obligation of the cautioner was prestable at an uncertain date, in the latter at a fixed date outside the septennium, but both decisions are irreconcilable with what the defender holds to be the sound construction of the statute.

The law so laid down has been regarded as settled ever since. Erskine (iii. 7, 23) says,—“Neither do obligations fall under this Act where the condition is not purified nor the term of payment come within the seven years after the date of the obligation, because no diligence can be used upon these.” And he cites the case of Borthwick. Mr Bell, in his Principles, sec. 602, says,—“To give the benefit of the statute the obligation must be for a sum of money to be paid within the seven years,” and he cites the three cases of Balvaird, Borthwick, and Miller.

In Alexander v. Badenoch, 6 D. 322, the various decided questions as to the application of the statute are gone over, and this among others is treated as settled.

I have already indicated that, to my thinking, the question as to which interpretation of the statute is the better,—the narrower adopted by the Court in Balvaird or the more comprehensive preferred by the Lord Ordinary,—would be, apart from authority, entirely debateable. But both interpretations are tenable, and one, as I have shewn, has been deliberately adopted and adhered to from very near the time of the statute itself down to the present day. Indeed in stating the law of the septennial prescription,—among others the point now under consideration,—Erskine begins by observing that the Act “hath received a most limited interpretation,” and a parenthetical remark of Mr Bell in his Commentaries shews that he also was somewhat critically alive to this characteristic of the decisions which he proceeds to rehearse. But not the less significant is the fact that they treat the law as settled. The interval between Mr Bell's day and the present has passed without any challenge of what he legacy to them is a good legacy they would pay it to themselves and get the benefit of it. But they make no claim to administer the trust. They put in a separate substantive claim for a legacy as if it were a mere bequest in their favour, irrespective of their acceptance of the trust, and they ask to be preferred in the fund in medio to the extent of £500 each without saying anything as to what is to become of the rest of the fund. It does not appear to me that we can sustain that claim as it stands, but, if your Lordships agree with me, there can be no great difficulty in the trustees amending their claim.

LORD ADAM.—It appears from the marriage-contract here that in contemplation of his marriage Mr Hall disposed in favour of his promised spouse, in life-rent for her life-rent use alienably, subject to certain restrictions named in the contract, and to the child or children of the intended marriage and the issue of the bodies of such children, whom failing, to his own heirs and assignees whomsoever, all and sundry his estate, heritable and moveable, as at the time of his death. The question is, whether that destination to the issue of the bodies of such children gave the issue a jus crediti under the marriage-contract, or whether that was a testamentary provision only. As regards the children of the marriage, it is of course settled law that the provisions in their favour in a marriage-contract are contractual in the highest degree, and that the contracting parties, the husband and wife, cannot defeat the rights secured to the children by the marriage-contract. There is no doubt about the law on that subject. What the reason of the law may be is of very little consequence, although it probably originated in the claims which ex jure naturali children have against their parents. But the children of such children are in an entirely different position. They have no claim which the law recognises in the same sense as children. They have their own father and mother, and their own father and mother's marriage-contract with reference to any claims they may have, and as far as I recollect there is no case establishing that under such a destination this grandchildren have a jus crediti. No such case was quoted to us, and the only case which the Lord Ordinary refers to is the case of Mackie v. Glasgow. I agree with Lord Kinnear in thinking that that case is not an authority for such proposition. I am far from saying that a provision in a marriage-contract calling persons after the children of the marriage may not be contractual. If the question would depend on the construction of the whole settlement. It appears, construing the whole settlement, that it was the intention of the contracting parties that a benefit should be secured to such persons, that will be given effect to. But it must arise upon a consideration of the whole clause of the contract. The old case of Kinsman v. Scot, in the Dictionary, 12,984, is an example of that. There the destination of the husband's property after the children of the marriage was to the heirs of the wife, and the Court, considering the whole contract, came to the conclusion that the provision was contractual and not testamentary, and accordingly they preferred the heirs of the wife. In the case of Mackie, again, it was held, upon a construction of the whole contract, that the provision in favour of the children already procreated of a party to the marriage was meant to be contractual, and numerous cases of the kind may be instanced where the decision proceeded upon a construction of the whole contract. But there is nothing in this contract that I can find to show that it was the intention of the contracting parties here to give to the grandchildren a contractual right. There are clauses in the contract which I point exactly the other way, and particularly those to which Lord Kinnear No. 112. referred.

If that be so, and if the destination in this contract to children is a pure destination to children and nothing else, then the result is, that the objects of the trust having failed, the estate of the husband returns to him unaffected by anything unless in so far as he is restricted from dealing with it by the terms of the contract of marriage itself. If that destination is purely testamentary, the result must be that the husband acquires uncontrolled right to the estate except so far as he has restricted himself by the marriage-contract, for there is no other deed existing that I know of which restricts his power to any extent or effect. Now, by the clause in question he did restrict himself, because he left a liferent of his whole estate to his widow to be restricted in certain events, and in the event of no living child of the marriage being in existence at the dissolution of the marriage the widow was only to receive £150 a-year. If that event had not occurred, it is clear that as between the husband and wife he could not have defeated the right given to the wife. But that event has occurred, and the widow's right is now restricted to £150 a-year. But I do not see why the husband should not dispense with that restriction, for that is really all he has done in this case. He has simply dispensed with the restriction imposed in his own favour, and being unlimited proprietor of the estate, I cannot see why he might not do so. It was entirely a matter between him and his widow, no third parties being concerned in the matter. The grandchild has no jus crediti under the marriage-contract, and I cannot see what title he has to interfere. If he has no such jus crediti, what right has he to say to his grandfather and grandmother together, or to the grandfather alone, that he shall not dispose of his own estate without consulting him? Now, I think that is the whole case, and holding the proper construction of the marriage-contract to be as I have stated, I think the husband was quite entitled to dispense with the restriction of the annuity to £150, and that he had the right to dispose of his own estate. I therefore concur with Lord Kinnear.

Mar. 8, 1892.
Hall's Trustees v. Macdonald.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Kinnear. I would just say in a sentence that it appears to me that the cases in which a grantee under a marriage settlement can claim an indefeasible right may be referred to the three categories which Lord Kinnear has fully examined in his opinion. The indefeasible right must arise from the relation in which the grantee stands towards the parties to the contract, or it must arise from express obligation, or again from the circumstance that one of the parties at the time of the execution of the contract, or at some time during their joint lives, has put property into the hands of third parties, trustees for the benefit of the claimant amongst others. Now, the present case appears to me not to fall under any of those heads. A provision to grandchildren is not presumed to be obligatory in respect of relationship because the parents are not at least in the first instance bound to provide for their grandchildren. The primary duty of providing for them lies upon their own parents. Then I find in the clauses which have been examined by your Lordships no evidence of any obligation, and there is not even that inferential obligation which is sometimes held to exist where one spouse promises to do something for the heir or relative of the other spouse. Then again the case is distinguished from Mackie v. Gloag's Trustees by the absence of any deed of present gift delivered by the parties. The case therefore appears to me to fail entirely, and the result is that the spouses, subject to the right given to one another and to the immediate issue of the marriage, were in my opinion entirely unfettered in the disposal of their respective estates.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur. We shall allow the claim of the trustees to be amended to the effect of claiming the whole estate to be administered according to the trust, and then we shall rank them in terms thereof.

An amendment of the claim for John Scott and others, to the effect of making it a claim for them and Mrs Hall to be ranked and preferred to the fund that they might administer it as trustees, was then put in.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Repel the claim for Andrew Hall Macdonald and the Rev. Colin Macdonald, his administrator: Sustain the claim for the said Mrs Jane Chisholm Scott or Hall, and rank and prefer her on the fund in medio in terms thereof: Allow the condescendence and claim for John Scott, Hugh Ross, and Norman Reid to be amended at the bar, and sustain the said claim as amended, and rank and prefer the said claimants on the fund in medio in terms thereof, and decern."

Process—Appeal—Proof or jury trial—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV cap. 120), sec. 40.—In an action of damages for assault which had been appealed for jury trial under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, the defender moved the Court to send the case back to the Sheriff Court, on the ground that it was of such a trifling character as not to be suitable for jury trial. The Court, on the ground that if the cause had originated in the Court of Session it would have been sent to a jury, refused the defender's motion, and approved of issues.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.

MRS CRABB, Lilybank Road, Dundee, as curator and administrator-in-law of her pupil son, William Crabb, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Dundee against George Fraser, fruiterer, Craigiebank, Dundee, for payment of £150 as damages for an assault alleged to have been committed by the defender on her son.

The pursuer averred that her son having taken a turnip from a field on the defender's farm, the defender had set his dog upon him; that the dog had bitten him; that defender had struck him, and had drenched him with liquid manure.

The defender denied the more material of these averments, and stated that the whole affair was of the most trifling description, intended merely to frighten the lad from trespassing on the defender's farm.

The Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial, and having lodged issues, moved the Court to approve thereof.

The defender opposed and moved the Court to send the case back to the Sheriff, arguing that the Court had a discretion, in appeals under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, either to send the case to a jury or to remit it to the Sheriff. Here the case was of the most trivial character, which it would be absurd to send to a jury. The appropriated causes were not necessarily sent to a jury.¹

Argued for the pursuer;—The present case was in the class of cases appropriated for jury trial, which if the case had originated in the Court of Session would have been sent to a jury as of course, unless the parties consented to a proof. The circumstance that the case had come up under the 40th section of the Judicature Act made no difference, for it was now settled that such cases were to be treated in all respects as if they had originated in the Court of Session.¹

Crabb v.

Fraser.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Prima facie, the proposal of the defender and respondent, that this action should be tried in the Sheriff Court, cannot be said to be unfit or unreasonable. But we must determine upon it with a due regard to the 40th section of the Judicature Act, and so as to give fair play to the system thereby established. This action is now in the Court of Session, and the pursuer, who has taken the appeal for the purpose of jury trial, claims to have her case so disposed of. Now, while the power of the Court to send back for trial in the Sheriff Court cases appealed under this section cannot be disputed, this power has been exercised in view of the category to which the case under consideration belonged. This is an action of damages for assault, and, if it had originated in the Court of Session, it would for that reason unquestionably have gone to a jury. As it is now here, under this statutory power of appeal, I think we must proceed upon this same criterion of what is to be the mode of trial. We could only adopt the opposite course if we were to form some conjecture as to the substantiality of the pursuer's case in each action of damages for assault, and send back for trial before the Sheriff those cases which prima facie did not look well.

There is an obvious inconvenience in such a selection having to be made by the Court which might ultimately have to review the merits of the remitted cases; and it appears to me that the sound rule, and that most conformable to the statute as well as to the decisions, is to send for jury trial those cases which by the legal quality of their ground of action would be designated for jury trial if they had originated in the Court of Session. In all cases, of course, the rule is subject to the statutory condition if special cause be not shewn. But the class of assault is one in which this qualification requires to be stated rather as matter of theory than as of appreciable practical importance.

The pursuer and appellant having moved us to approve the issues proposed by her, I think our proper course is, on her motion, to do so.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT approved of the issues proposed by the pursuer, and remitted the case to a Lord Ordinary for trial by jury.

Cautioner—Septennial limitation of cautionary obligations—Act 1695, c. 5.—A bond for borrowed money dated in November 1881 contained an obligation by the borrower to repay the principal sum at Whitsunday 1882, and an obligation by the borrower, and by certain persons as cautioners, to pay at said term the interest then due and interest half-yearly thereafter during the non-payment of the principal sum. Molleson v.
Hutchison.

In an action against one of the cautioners for payment of his share of the interest from Martinmas 1890 the defender pleaded that the cautionary obligation had been extinguished by the Act 1695, c. 5.

Held by a majority of seven Judges (the Lord President, Lord Young, Lord Rutherford Clark, and Lord McLaren) (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth Darling) that as the interest sued for was not due till after the lapse of seven years from the date of the bond, the cautionary obligation to pay that interest was not affected by the Act.

Diss. the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Adam, and Lord Trayner, who were of opinion that as payment of the principal sum and interest might have been enforced at any time within seven years from the date of the bond, after which no interest would have been due, the cautionary obligation was extinguished by the lapse of that time.

Ld. Stormonth

IN November 1881 the Craiglockhart Hydropathic Company, Limited, granted a bond and disposition in security to Ralph E. Scott and others, trustees of the English and Scottish Law Life Assurance Association, for a loan of £25,000, which the company bound itself to repay at Whitsunday 1882. The bond contained the following obligation as to interest:—"We, the said" company, "and we Robert Hutchison, Esquire of Carlisle . . ." (and six other persons) "hereby bind ourselves, jointly and severally, and our respective heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, as cautioners and sureties for and with the said Craiglockhart Hydropathic Company, Limited, to pay to the said Ralph Erskine Scott, &c., as trustees foresaid, and their foresaids, the interest of the said principal sum, at the rate of 5 per centum per annum, from the date hereof to the said term of payment, and half-yearly, termly, and proportionally thereafter during the not payment of the principal sum, and that at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment of the said interest at the said term of Whitsunday next to come for the interest due preceding that date, and the next term's payment thereof at Martinmas following and so forth half-yearly, termly, and proportionally thereafter during the not payment of the principal sum, with a fifth part more of the interest due at each term of liquidate penalty in case of failure in the punctual payment thereof."

In May 1884 the bond was assigned to James Alexander Molleson, C.

In July 1884 the Court pronounced an order for winding up the company.

The subjects conveyed in security were sold for £13,800, on 12th March 1890, by Mr Molleson. After deducting that price from £25,000, there remained a balance of principal of £11,200.

On 16th December 1890 Molleson raised against Robert Hutchison an action, concluding for £1600, with interest at 5 per cent from Whitsunday 1890, or otherwise,—“(First) The defender ought and should be decreed and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £40, with interest on said sum of £40 at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date of citation to follow hereon until payment; and (second) the defender ought and should be decreed and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuer, and his executors and assignees, (1) of the interest of the said principal sum of £1600, at the rate of 5 per centum per annum, from and after the term of Martinmas 1890, and in all time coming, and that half-yearly, termly, and proportionally during the not payment of the said principal sum, and that at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment of the said interest, at the sum of £40, at the term of Whitsunday 1891, for the interest due preceding that date, and the next term's payment thereof, being the sum of £40, at Martinmas following, and so forth half-yearly, termly, and proportionally thereafter during the not payment of the said principal sum; the same terms of payment respectively being always first come and bygone, with the interest of each of the said sums at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the time when the same falls due until payment; or otherwise (2) of the sum of £40 at each term of Whitsunday and Martinmas in all time coming, beginning the first payment at Whitsunday 1891, with interest on each term's payment at 5 per centum per annum from each term when the same becomes due till paid."

Molleson v.
Hutchison.

The pursuer stated that "the rateable proportion" of the sum of £11,200 remaining due to him, "for which the defender is liable under the obligation in the said bond to the pursuer as now in right of the said bond, is one-seventh, viz., £1600, with interest thereon at 5 per cent from the term of Whitsunday 1890 till payment, or failing such liability he is liable under the said obligation for interest since said term in perpetuity on the said amount. As the defender has failed to pay the said £1600, and arrears of interest due, the present action has been rendered necessary."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer is entitled to decree against the defender, in respect of the obligation undertaken by the latter in the said bond and disposition in security, for the proportion due by him and still remaining unpaid of the balance of the principal sum therein contained, with interest thereon as concluded for, with expenses. (2) Or otherwise, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the alternative conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The obligation of the defender under the said bond and disposition in security having been extinguished by the operation of the Statute 1695, cap. 5,* the defender should be assolizied.

The pursuer did not insist on his conclusion for payment of the principal. The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling), on 2d June 1891, sustained the defender's second plea in law, and assolizied him.†

* The Act 1695, c. 5, enacts that "considering the great hurt and prejudice that hath befallen many persons and families, and oftentimes to their utter ruine and undoing, by men's facility to engage as cautioners for others, who afterwards failing have left a growing burden on their cautioners without relief, therefore and for remeied thereof . . . no man binding and ingaging for hereafter for and with another, conjunctly and severally, in any bond or contract for sums of money shall be bound for the said sums for longer than seven years after the date of the bond, but that from and after the said seven years the said cautioner shall be eo ipso free of his caution; and that whoever is bound for another, either as express cautioner or as principal or as co-principal, shall be understood to be a cautioner, to have the benefite of this Act; provided that he have either clause of relief in the bond, or a bond of relief apart, intimat personally to the creditor at his receiving of the bond, without prejudice always to the true principals being bound in the whole contents of the bond or contract; and also of the said cautioners being still bound, conform to the terms of the bond, within the said seven years as before the passing of this Act, . . ."—(Here followed a clause saving diligence done within the seven years.)

"It is plain that the defender cannot be liable for the principal, or any part of it, except as an indirect consequence of his liability for the interest. If he be liable for the interest in perpetuity, he might desire to pay up the principal in order to escape from an interminable burden, but he cannot be compelled to do so. The important question is whether the statute applies to the obligation

THIS interlocutor was pronounced in Second Division :—"The Lords . . . in terms of the opinion of a majority of the Judges present at the hearing, recall the said interlocutor; repel the second plea in law for the defender; decern and ordain the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £40 sterling, with interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date of citation on the summons until payment: Find that the defender is liable to the pursuer in interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum on the principal sum of £1600 mentioned in the summons from and after the term of Martinmas 1890, and that half-yearly, termly, and proportionally during the not payment of the said principal sum, and that at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment of the said interest at the term of Whitsunday 1891 for the interest due preceding that date, and the next term's payment at Martinmas following, and so forth half-yearly, termly, and proportionally thereafter during the not payment of the said principal sum, the said term of payment respectively being always first come and bygone with the interest of such of the said sums at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the time when the same falls due until payment," &c.

JOHN CRIGHTON AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Balfour—Dundas.

School—School Board—Election—Scotch Education Department—35 and 36 Vict. c. 62, and 41 and 42 Vict. c. 78 (Education Acts 1872 and 1878)—Tid to sue.—Sec. 13 of the Education Act, 1872, provides with regard to the election of school boards, "should any election not take place as required by this Act the Scotch Education Department may" (1) issue an order for an election. (2) may allow the existing school board to continue in office; or (3) may nominate a school board.

Sec. 15 provides, that "in case the election of any person or persons shall be declared to be invalid, and the full number of members shall not without such person or persons have been validly elected, the school board, if a quorum exists, shall make the appointments necessary to fill up the vacancy, "and if a quorum do not exist, or if the school board fail for three weeks to make such nomination and appointment as aforesaid, the Board of Education may order a new election of as many members of the school board as shall be necessary to make up the full number of members."

Schedule B, rule 4, as amended in the schedule to the Act of 1878, provides that an election shall be held "in accordance with such regulations as the Scotch Education Department may from time to time by order prescribe." and the Department "may by order appoint . . . and make regulations as to the duties . . . of any officers requisite for the purpose of such election, and make regulations" for all necessary things "preliminary or incidental to an election.

Held (diss. Lord Young) that it was ultra vires of the Scotch Education Department to issue a General Order to the effect that "if the number of candidates nominated and not withdrawn . . . shall be less than the number of members to be elected but sufficient to constitute a quorum of the school board . . . they shall at their first meeting nominate and appoint as many persons to be members of the school board as shall be necessary to make up the full number of members." No. 115.

Duncan v.
Crichton.

The number of the school board of a burgh was fixed under the statutes at nine. On the occasion of the election in 1891 six persons only were nominated. The returning officer declared them duly elected, and they then met and elected three others. The declaration of election was made, and the meeting was held in compliance with a General Order of the Scotch Education Department of 1st October 1890 which dealt with cases such as had occurred, and bore to be issued under the schedule annexed to the Education Act of 1878. Certain ratepayers in the burgh brought a reduction of the return and of the minute of meeting, calling as defenders the returning officer and the nine persons concerned. Held (1) that the pursuers as ratepayers had a title to sue, and (2) that they were entitled to decree in respect that no election had taken place under the statute, and that the schedule of the Act of 1878 did not warrant the General Order of the Department, which was therefore ultra vires and illegal. Diss. Lord Young, who was of opinion that the case could not be disposed of in the absence of the Department, the question at issue being one of public interest and involving an interference between a public department and one of its officers, and further, that the order was in accordance with the Education Acts.

THE number of members of the School Board of Port-Glasgow was fixed under the statutes at nine. At the triennial election on 26th March 1891 there were only six candidates. These six candidates were declared duly elected by the returning officer, and intimation of the election was sent to the Scotch Education Department. These six members appointed three other persons to be members along with them, so as to complete the number of the board. This was done on 2d April 1891. 2D DIVISION
cairney.

Archibald Duncan and others, twelve persons who were entitled to vote in the election of the school board, and some of whom had children in attendance at the public schools of Port-Glasgow, raised an action against the six persons who had been nominated, and the three persons who had been selected by them as members of the board, to test the validity of the election. Mr James Grieve, who acted as returning officer, was also called as a defender. The pursuers averred that they were "members of a ratepayers' committee, whose action has been unanimously approved of at two large public meetings of ratepayers in the town hall of Port-Glasgow." This was not admitted. It was the fact that one of the pursuers was provost, and another one of the magistrates of Port-Glasgow.

The conclusions of the action were for reduction of (1) the declaration of the result of the election by which the first six defenders were declared to have been elected, and (2) the minutes of these six persons recording the election of the other three pretended members of the board. There were also conclusions for declarator that there was no valid election on the 26th March of the six persons nominated, and no valid election of the persons subsequently selected by them.

The pursuers stated that the 13th section of the Education Act of 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62)* made provision for the case that had occurred.

* Sec. 13.— . . . "and should any election not take place as required by this Act, and at the times hereinbefore specified, the Scotch Education Department may issue an order for the election at such time and place as the said Department shall determine, or may allow the existing school board to continue in office, or may nominate a school board . . . in the manner hereinafter provided" [viz., by sec. 20, which allows an interim nomination of a board for a year] . . . "and should a vacancy occur in any board during the currency of its period of office, such vacancy shall be supplied by the board itself nominating a person to supply such vacancy."

No. 115. They also stated that the proceedings of which they now complained had been taken in pursuance of a General Order dated 1st October 1890 by the Scotch Education Department.* For this order they stated that there was no warrant in the Statutes of 1872 or 1878, that it was ultra vires of the Department, and illegal.

Duncan v.
Crichton.

The defenders maintained the validity of the Order, upon which they admitted that these proceedings had taken place, by referring to the schedule appended to the Act of 1878,† and to the undernoted sections of the Education Acts.‡

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The pursuers are entitled to decree of reduction and declarator as concluded for, in respect there was no valid election on 26th March, nor any effectual appointment on 2d April 1891. 2. There having been no election on 26th March 1891, and none of the

* That General Order ran thus:—13—“If the number of candidates nominated and not withdrawn as aforesaid shall be less than the number to be elected, but sufficient to constitute a quorum of the school board, the returning officer shall, on the day fixed for the election, declare such candidates to be duly elected, and shall publish a list of the names, with the places of abode and designation of the persons so elected, and a copy of such list certified by the returning officer shall be conclusive evidence of the election of the persons therein named: and they shall at their first meeting nominate and appoint as many persons to be members of the school board as shall be necessary to make up the full number of members, and shall give notice of such appointment to the Scotch Education Department. If the number of candidates so nominated and not withdrawn shall not be sufficient to constitute a quorum, the returning officer shall report to the Scotch Education Department that no election has taken place. Three members constitute a quorum of a school board.”

† “The triennial election of a school board for any parish or burgh shall be held at such time, and in such manner, and in accordance with such regulations as the Scotch Education Department may from time to time by order prescribe, and the Scotch Education Department may by order appoint or direct the appointment, and make regulations as to the duties, remuneration, and expenses of any officers requisite for the purpose of such election, and make regulations respecting all other necessary things preliminary or incidental to such election, and revoke or alter any previous order.”

‡ Sec. 15 of the Act of 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 78) provides that in the event of a vacancy caused by resignation the vacancy “shall, where a quorum remain, be supplied by the school board in the manner provided in sec. 13 of the principal Act, and if the school board fail for eight weeks to fill up the vacancy the Scotch Education Department may nominate a person to fill up such vacancy, or may issue an order for an election of a person to fill such vacancy, at such time and place and in such manner as the said Department shall determine.”

Sec. 16 of the Act of 1878 provides for the case of a vacancy arising from non-attendance of a member of the board.

Sec. 15 of the Act of 1872 provides that “in case the election of any person or persons shall be declared to be invalid, and the full number of persons shall not without such person or persons have been validly elected, the school board, if a quorum exist,” shall make the appointments necessary to fill up the vacancy, “and if a quorum do not exist, or if the school board fail for three weeks to make such nomination and appointment as aforesaid, the Board of Education may order a new election of as many members of the school board as shall be necessary to make up the full number of members.”

Sec. 17 of the Act of 1878 provides that “if by the death, resignation, or disqualification of any member or members of a school board there shall be a vacancy, and the full number of persons shall not without such person or persons be a quorum, the Scotch Education Department may nominate as many persons as shall be necessary to make up the full number of members, or may issue an order for an election of such number of members, at such time and place and in such manner as the said Department shall determine.”

courses prescribed by section 13 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, No. 115. having been adopted, the said pretended school board was never validly constituted.

Mar. 10, 1892.
Duncan v.
Crichton.

The defenders pleaded;—1. The action is incompetent . . . (2) in respect that it is an attempt to review in the Court of Session an Order of a Committee of the Lords of the Privy Council. 2. All parties interested are not called. 4. The defenders having been duly and validly elected and appointed as the School Board of Port-Glasgow, ought to be assoilzied.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), on 12th December 1891, of consent dismissed the action as against three of the defenders, viz., the returning officer, one of the nominated persons who did not defend, and one who had retired from the pretended board, and, as against the others, reduced, declared, and decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.— . . . I have come to be of opinion that the present is a case to which section 13 applies. I think that it cannot be maintained that an election of a number of candidates under the fixed number is an election of a school board; and that therefore, when such an election takes place, it is the fact that 'an election has not taken place as required by the statute.' Further, there is no other clause of the Acts or schedules which applies to the case of a deficiency of candidates, and it is not to be easily assumed that that case was overlooked.

"It has not been overlooked, it may be remarked, in the English Education Acts, for there is a provision in article 6 of the second schedule of the Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 75, which meets the case expressly.

"The General Order issued by the Education Department purports to introduce in regard to school board elections in Scotland a provision substantially the same as that contained in the English Act, and it purports to extend the provisions of the 15th section of the Scotch Act of 1872 to circumstances different from those mentioned in that section.

"I have no doubt that the Order is a very salutary one indeed, and I see nothing in it inconsistent with the general scope or spirit of the Education Statutes, but if it be true that the case in question is provided for by the 13th section of the Act of 1872, it appears to me that the Order is nothing but an amendment of the statutes, and is of the character of an act of legislation. That is, I apprehend, ultra vires of the Education Department.

"My view is that section 13 of the Act of 1872 covers the case of a deficiency of candidates at a school board election, and that section 15 does not apply, and I do not need to determine whether the Order would be ultra vires if the 13th section did not apply, and if a deficiency of candidates were a casus imprevistus. But I do not think that in that case I could come to a different conclusion. I think that the powers conferred by the schedule relate to matters of form and detail, and not to the persons entitled to elect. That appears to be the true construction of the words, having regard to the special and detailed provisions of the Act in relation to the circumstances in which the intervention of the Department in a school board election is authorised. As illustrative of this point, the pursuers referred to Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon, 15th January 1875, 2 R. 299.

"But the defenders have stated certain prejudicial pleas which it is necessary to notice. . . . But it is further pleaded that the action is incompetent because it is an attempt to review an Order of a Committee of the Lords of the Privy Council. But no authority was referred to which appeared to support this plea, which, indeed, is plainly untenable; for the Education Department has no powers but statutory powers, and the Court is bound to consider, when necessary in order to decide any question between two litigants, whether an act of the Department is within its powers or is beyond them, and, therefore, without authority or validity.—See Macfarlane v. Mochrum School Board, 9th November 1875, 3 R. 88, and see, per Lord President, p. 98; School Board of Lochgilphead v. School Board of South Knapdale, 30th June 1877, 4 R. 389; *Denny & Brothers v. Duncan v.
Crighton.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—The Lord Ordinary's view hinged upon the idea that here there had been no election, but that was a mistake. The electors had done their part, or all that they cared to do, and had elected a quorum. It was for that quorum, under the direction of the Department, to supplement the action of the electors. The pursuers relied on the case of Kidd,¹ in which it had been held that where a set of fifteen magistrates was to be elected, and one of the persons so elected was in minority, the whole election was bad. But a statute² had at once been passed to correct, as regarded municipalities, the evils pointed out by that decision, and it was clearly not the law of the present statutes, for section 15 of the Act of 1872 would prevent any such miscarriage. That section was the section which truly ruled the present case, and which the Department had by their Order called into operation ; or at least the spirit of that section justified the action of the Department. It must be conceded that the 15th section would apply if three unqualified persons—imaginary beings—had been returned ; but in that event there would have been a defective election from the beginning, a “non-election” as the pursuers said there had been here. If section 15 might be used in such a case, it was plain that the return of six in place of nine members could not be said, as the pursuers contended, to be no election. The words of the schedule of 1878 were broad enough to cover this case. It was plain that it was not required that every member of a board should owe his election to the voice of the people, and if that were so this was just a thing “incidental” to the election which the Department might put right. It certainly was well qualified to do so.

Argued for the pursuers ;—There was here no case of hardship and no casus improvisus. The 13th section covered the case, and gave a wealth of remedies. Why not take one of them ? There was no election on 26th March. That that was so at common law was settled by Kidd's case, which did not stand alone.³ The common law remained, except in so far as it was altered by section 15 of the Act of 1872, and that section only applied where a full board had been prima facie returned. No power could make the six members returned on 26th March into nine and without nine members there could be no school board in Port Glasgow. No board, no quorum. There must be an election before section 15 could come into play, and here there was no election. The Department's powers were only such as Parliament gave it,⁴ for it was

“It was further pleaded that this action involved in reality, although not in form, a reduction of the Order of the Education Department, and that it ought therefore, to have been directed against the Department. The pursuers, however, declined to call the Department. They considered that they had no question with the Department, and no title to conclude for the reduction of the Order ; that they had no concern except with the particular election of the School Board of Port-Glasgow, which they challenged ; and that they required only to establish that an act, otherwise without authority, was not legalised by the Order.

“I do not see that the Department is a necessary party in this case, or that there are any equitable considerations which make it proper to call it. Nor does it appear to be necessary to make any formal intimation of the dependence of this action, of which I understand the Department is aware.”

creature of statute, and by statute it had no power to delegate to the six candidates the powers delegated to itself by section 13. The Department had no power to declare that which the statute said was no board to be a board, and to make it do the work of a board.

Duncan v.
Crichton.

The Court, after considering the arguments, desired further argument on the question of the pursuers' title to raise the present action.

Argued for the defenders;—The important consideration in determining this question was that the proceedings were instituted in the public interest, and did not touch any patrimonial right of the pursuers. Without an allegation of injury to a patrimonial right, no such action could be sustained.¹ [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—But my difficulty is here. A school board can assess, a body of persons who are not a school board cannot. Are ratepayers not entitled to test the validity of an election of persons who will or will not have that power according as the election is good or bad?] A board de facto returned could assess until their election was set aside, and the proper way of setting it aside was by an appeal to the Government Department.

Argued for the pursuers;—The question here was, whether this board had any right to administer educational affairs in the burgh. That fact differentiated the present case from Ewing's case, for there the Magistrates had undoubtedly a right to administer, the question being as to their method of administration. In municipal matters it had been held² that every ratepayer had a right to see that the burgh was "legally governed." That proposition had not been questioned on appeal in the House of Lords, the judgment being reversed on the ground of personal bar. The principle had been reaffirmed in subsequent cases.³

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question in this case is, whether a school board has been properly elected for the burgh of Port-Glasgow. The Scotch Education Department is empowered to fix the number of a school board according to the requirements of the district, and the number which was fixed in this case was nine. At the recent election there were only six candidates nominated, and the course which was then taken was taken under a deliverance of the Scotch Education Department by which it was directed that if the number of candidates nominated be less than the number to be elected, but sufficient to form a quorum, the returning officer shall declare such candidates duly elected, "and they shall at their first meeting nominate and appoint as many persons to be members of the school board as shall be necessary to make up the full number of members." That was done here, and it is now impugned.

The contention of the pursuers is that there was no election at all, and that there could be no good election of the three members subsequently named, there being no board, and therefore no quorum, to elect them. I need not state my reasons at length, for I concur in the opinion of Lord Rutherford Clark, which I have seen. But I also concur in that of the Lord Ordinary, and I may state shortly the grounds on which I proceed.

I think that the Scotch Education Department had no power to make any such order as that, if a number is elected which would be a quorum if the full board were elected, that number may elect the rest, so as to make up the full number. I think that is not covered by the schedule to which reference has been made. That schedule provides that the election of a school board "shall be held at such time and in such manner, and in accordance with such regulations as the Scotch Education Department may from time to time by order prescribe," and that the Department may "make regulations respecting all other necessary things preliminary or incidental to such election, and revoke or alter any previous order."

I take that to be merely a power to make rules or regulations to carry out the statute, but not a power to render the statute nugatory, or to substitute some new procedure for the procedure prescribed by the statute.

Now, the case which has occurred is otherwise provided for, for if the returning officer had returned "no election," then the 13th section affords three methods of dealing with the matter. The Department should have proceeded under that section.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—In March 1891 the burgh of Port-Glasgow had to elect a school board. The purpose of this action is to declare that the election was not validly and legally made.

The pursuers are ratepayers in the burgh, and among the electors of the school board. It is maintained that they have no title to sue, because the election which is challenged was made in the manner directed by the Education Department of the Privy Council, and therefore with their sanction.

In my opinion this argument is not well founded. The sanction of the Department cannot validate an election which is not in terms of the statutes, nor is the Department entrusted with the duty of determining whether the election has been validly made. The decision of that question rests, I think, entirely with this Court.

Again, a school board which has not been duly elected is no school board at all, and the ratepayers are not bound to submit to its authority. The pursuers, therefore, seem to me to have a good title to try the question whether a school board was duly elected in 1891. Of course it will be understood that I am giving no opinion with respect to the validity of the acts done by the school board before the legality of their election was challenged, or before that question has been finally determined. In such matters other and different considerations are involved than those with which we have to deal in the present action.

I have now to consider the merits of the question. I may say at once that I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I have very little to add to what his Lordship has said.

It seems to me that the 13th section of the Act applies to the case which has occurred. The School Board of Port-Glasgow must consist of nine persons. In March 1891 there were only six candidates, therefore, in my judgment, there could be no election. With six nominees only it was impossible to proceed to the election of a board which must consist of nine. Nor, in my opinion, can any person be returned as a member of a school board which does not exist.

I do not think that the 15th section applies. It deals with the case where the election of any person or persons is declared to be invalid. It assumes, therefore, that there was an election of a board in apparent compliance with the provisions of the Act. It is said that there is no difference between this case

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) Assuming that the fire had been caused by a spark from engine No. 85, the defenders, nevertheless, were not liable. Railway companies having statutory authority to bring fire into the neighbourhood of combustible articles were not liable for any damage caused by the exercise of this authority, unless it was proved that they had neglected some reasonable precaution. The precautions thus demanded of a railway company must be consistent with the carrying on of their business in a reasonable way. Railway companies were to use the best means of carrying on their business known to practical science at the time, and they were not to refuse to use new inventions merely because some slight increase of danger might result, if, as a whole, the effect that the engine in question was of the newest and best construction . . . I confess I am not satisfied on the evidence that the engine No. 85 and the other engines of its class are so constructed as to contain the best known and practicable arrangements for preventing the emission of sparks. Differing in this respect from the older class of engines, they contain no 'spark arrester' in their smoke-box; and assuming in their favour (what, however, is matter of dispute) that their vortex blast arrangement does not tend to increase the risk of sparks, or even that its associated arrangements tend to diminish that risk,—still the sparks ex hypothesi issue, and issue of such size as to be dangerous; and that being so, I am not, I confess, satisfied upon the evidence that the spark arrester if used would not at least have reduced that risk. Neither have I been convinced that its introduction would have materially interfered with the working of the engine or been in any other respect injurious. It is true that a majority of the great railway companies in England have ceased to use 'spark arresters.' But they are still largely used; and having given my best attention to the views of the defenders' witnesses, I have been unable to see sufficient reason why they should not continue to be used, or why, if used, they should not go at least a considerable way to obviate the risk of fire.

"It only remains to consider the question of contributory negligence, and here I am bound to say that the situation of the pursuers' store, and the arrangements of the building, were certainly not such as to minimise the risks arising from sparks thrown by passing engines. The store was only 29 feet from the railway. There were doors on the side next the railway, and there being no window in the roof (as there might have been), it was sometimes necessary (as on the occasion in question) to open one of these doors for the purpose of obtaining light. All this was certainly the reverse of cautious. But, on the other hand, I do not know that the pursuers were bound—because of the risk of the negligent discharge of sparks from the defenders' engines—to forego the full use of their ground, or to depart from what they considered the most convenient arrangements for obtaining access to, and for lighting their flax store. In other words, I doubt whether it can be imputed to them as fault that they took their chance of the defenders doing their duty. But in any case, the law—as I understand it—is, that in questions of contributory negligence causa proxima et non remota spectatur, and it is impossible to say that the position or arrangements of the pursuers' store formed in any proper sense the direct or proximate cause of this fire. The defenders could certainly, if I am right, have by ordinary care avoided inflicting the injury to which the pursuers, perhaps somewhat rashly, exposed themselves, and, according to the authorities, that is sufficient. See Rulley v. L. and N.-W. Railway Co., L. R., 1 App. Cases, 754, 759; Rooney v. Allans, 10 R. 1224; Florence v. Mann, 18 R. 247.

"On the whole, therefore, I consider that my judgment must be for the pursuers, and I have only to add that I am not able to see that the fact of the pursuers being covered, or nearly covered, by insurance makes any difference in their position. It may be that they are really suing on behalf of the insurance companies, but that is after all merely matter of process, and in the present case, where there is no question of responsibility for costs, I do not see that anything could be gained by sisting the insurance companies as pursuers."

Mar. 10, 1892.
Duncan v.
Crichton.

We are asked to declare this election illegal. The Lord Ordinary, as I understand, is of opinion that the Department had no authority to issue this order to its officer. It is a curious announcement for the Court to make to the officer of a Government Department: "You cannot rely on your instructions got from the Department, you must have declarator that you are entitled to obey the orders of your superior officers."

The schedule of the Act of 1878 is worthy of attention. Does it include instructions to a returning officer? He is appointed by the Department, his duties, the rules for the discharge of his duties, are prescribed by the Department. We are asked to tell him and others that these rules are illegal. All that is contrary to my notions of the functions of a Court of law, and I think it may be attended with serious prejudice to the public interest.

The question is whether, there having been a nomination of six only, it was not the duty of the returning officer to refuse to proceed with the election, or to refuse to declare that there had been an election. It is said it is a case for sec. 13. It never occurred to me to doubt that that section was applicable to a case of contumacious abstention, on the part of persons who object to the school board system, from nominating a school board. It never occurred to anyone, till this moment, that its provisions were applicable to the case of a number short of the full number being nominated and elected.

Sec. 15 applies to the case of a number short of the proper number being elected. That section is admitted to come very near the present case. Now, there can be no such thing as an invalid election. There may be an improper declaration of an election which has not taken place. But that is no election at all. Suppose you have eight persons duly nominated and elected—I say duly, without any intention of affecting the argument—it is said that there is no election at all. If the declaration had been of nine persons, and one of them had died—died the evening before the declaration—but the returning officer had declared them all, the whole nine, elected; what would be the proper course then? The eight survivors are permitted by sec. 15 to act. But if the man who dies is not declared to have been elected, then the case is different. Can anyone in his senses say so? In the one case the returning officer knows that the man is dead and gives effect to his knowledge, in the other case he does not. These are two separate cases, to be determined on different principles in a matter of public interest. I think the cases are identical, and I think that the Department was justified in declaring them to be identical.

What is all this to lead to? What is the result of this interference with public Department instructing its own officer in accordance with the meaning and spirit of the Education Statutes?

The case falls within sec. 13—suppose that. Then there is an absolute power in the Scotch Education Department to choose a school board. The Department is of opinion that the six persons who were the choice of the constituents should be members; they nominate them; they will certainly do so. The six name three others; they have done so; the Scotch Education Department will nominate them. In all good sense and reason they will do so. That is the result of all this matter.

I am of opinion that if we were to have any debate in the public interest to the powers of the Department they should have been here, to explain it.

views which they have expressed in their order to their officer. I am of opinion No. 115.
that all parties are not called.

But further, I am of opinion that this order is in accordance not only with Mar. 10, 1892.
the spirit and scope of the Education Act, but also the letter, and I think that Duncan v.
we should assoilzie the defenders. Crighton.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of opinion that the judgment which the Court is about to pronounce in no way interferes with or impinges upon the authority confided to the Scotch Education Department by the statutes. I am further of opinion that the matter is not to be determined on any considerations of expediency. The only question for our decision is, Has the election been carried out in terms of the Education Acts? On that question I entirely agree with Lord Rutherford Clark.

Building society—Instrument of dissolution—Consent of members—The Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 42), sec. 32, subsec. 2.—The 32d section of the Building Societies Act, 1874, enacts,—“A society under this Act may terminate or be dissolved . . . (2) By dissolution with the consent of three-fourths of the members, holding not less than two-thirds of the number of shares in the society, testified by their signatures to the instrument of dissolution.”

Held that the word “signatures” in this enactment means signatures of the members themselves, and that signatures adhibited by the mandataries of members cannot be reckoned in calculating whether the instrument was signed by the requisite number of members.

In March 1891 the Second Edinburgh and Leith 493d Starr-Bowkett 1st Division.
Building Society, incorporated under the Building Societies Act, 1874, Ld. Kyllachy. and Peter Ronaldson, as its trustee under an instrument of dissolution, brought an action against Thomas Aitken, a member of the society, for payment of £33, 10s. 6d., as the balance due by him in respect of advances which he had received from the society.

The defender pleaded ;—(1) No title to sue,—stating that the names of certain of the members adhibited to the instrument of dissolution had not been written by the members themselves but by mandataries, and that if these names were not counted the number of consents required by the Act of Parliament to an instrument of dissolution had not been obtained.*

A proof was allowed. The evidence established the defender's averments in point of fact.

On 1st December 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), sustained the first plea in law stated for the defender, and dismissed the action.†

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The signatures adhibited by the mandataries must be held to be the signatures of the members, who had given the mandates, and such members had accordingly testified their consent to the instrument of dissolution in terms of the Act.

The defender was not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question is whether the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that as regards eleven of the shareholders said to consent to dissolution, the instrument of dissolution is defective in the statutory requisite of signature. Now, it appears to me that the objection is well founded and fatal. The company purports to be dissolved by the instrument of dissolution, and in order to make the dissolution valid it is necessary that a certain proportion of the shareholders should have consented to the dissolution and expressed their consent on the face of the deed, the statute providing that the consent of the necessary number of the shareholders shall be obtained “as testified by their signatures to the instrument of dissolution.” In order to bring the number of consenting shareholders up to the required proportion, it is necessary for the reclaimers to rely on signatures, not of shareholders but of mandataries of shareholders, or at least of persons who may for the present purpose be assumed to be mandataries.

I do not think such an attestation meets the requirements of the statute. It was pressed on us that the members of a society of this kind being generally working people, it would be reasonable to expect special provision to be made by the Legislature for relaxing the formalities of execution where their signatures are required; but it appears to me that the Legislature has allowed a relaxation of the usual formalities, because the statute does not demand that there should be instrumentary witnesses to the signatures of the shareholders. It is enough if the necessary consents are testified by the signatures of the shareholders themselves. It is all the more necessary, therefore, to see that the formalities required by the Legislature have been complied with; and in a word I think that to maintain that the signatures of mandataries are the signatures of the shareholders themselves in the sense of the statute is a hopeless contention.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur with your Lordship, and at the same time I pay, a considerable sum of money to the society. But the question is, whether I have any option in the matter . . . There are, it appears, eleven signatures to the deed which were not adhibited by the members themselves, but by certain persons alleged to be their mandataries. I shall assume that these persons had good mandates at the time they signed, although I am afraid I cannot hold that proved. But assuming that that is so, I am afraid that the terms of the 32d section of the Act make it really too clear for argument that a member cannot under this statute testify his consent to a dissolution otherwise than by his own signature. The words of the statute are ‘as testified by their signature to the instrument of dissolution.’ I think that contemplates that the member’s own signature, and not his signature through a mandatary, must be adhibited. If that be so, I am afraid it is fatal, because, taking the shareholders on the register at May as 164, and adding the 39 shareholders who became members in August, the total number of members on the register when the deed of dissolution took effect was 203. I think these must all be taken as members, and that being so, how many signed this deed of dissolution? There are 158 signatures in all, taking everything most favourably for the pursuers. But if eleven mandates are to be deducted, as the signatures of mandataries, that leaves only 147 good and genuine signatures. Now, I am afraid that 147 is not three-fourths of 203, and therefore this deed was not well executed, and the procedure was irregular.”

sympathise with the observations made by the Lord Ordinary as to the difficulties that may be caused to the society by our deciding that it is not possible to carry out the winding-up under the present administration. But I cannot help adding that the liquidator might have perfected his title, if he really has, as he professes to have, mandates from a sufficient number of shareholders, because, if these mandates were granted by the shareholders in full knowledge of the purpose for which they were to be used, I can hardly doubt that the shareholders would, on a proper representation, be willing to sign the instrument of dissolution. Therefore, it rather appears that there may be substance in this objection, and that it is impossible at present to obtain the requisite consents to a dissolution under the present management.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE TRUSTEES OF CARNEGIE PARK ORPHANAGE, Petitioners.—James Reid. No. 117.

Trust—Cy près—Nobile officium.—A testator left lands and the residue of his estate to trustees to found an orphanage for orphans belonging to a certain district between the ages of eight and fourteen, so soon as the residue and accumulations of rent amounted to £6000, directing that accommodation should be provided for as many children as the revenue would support. The residue, at the date of the testator's death, greatly exceeded that sum, and the trustees erected an orphanage with accommodation for sixty children. As few applications for admission were received, the trustees presented a petition to the Court for authority to reduce the limit of age from eight to five that the homes might be filled, a preference, however, being given to children of the age of eight and upwards.

The Court granted the prayer of the petition.

JAMES MOFFAT, of Carnegie Park, in the county of Renfrew, died on 1st Division. 16th February 1884.

By his settlement dated in 1870, on the narrative that he had determined to found an institution "for the education and upbringing of orphan children of the age after mentioned belonging to or resident in the lower ward of Renfrewshire, and who are not chargeable to the parochial board," he directed his trustees to convey to the Provost and Bailies of Port-Glasgow, the Provost and Senior Bailie of Greenock, and the Sheriff-substitute of the lower ward of Renfrewshire, and their successors in office, as trustees, to be known as the Trustees of Carnegie Park Orphanage, his lands of Carnegie Park, and the residue of his estate.

The orphanage trustees were directed to hold the lands of Carnegie Park, and to accumulate the rents till the accumulations along with the residue of the estate amounted to £6000, and then to erect on the estate an orphanage sufficient to accommodate as many orphans between the ages of eight and fourteen as the yearly proceeds of the trust could maintain.*

* The provisions as to the class of orphans and the education to be given were,—“Quarto, The orphans to be admitted shall be natives of or residents for the period of not less than twelve calendar months in the lower ward of Renfrewshire previous to their application for admission, who have not been chargeable on any parochial board, whose parents were Protestants, and who have been brought up as such, . . . and such orphans shall not be admitted under eight years of age, and shall not be allowed to remain in the orphanage after they have attained fourteen years of age. The residue of the testator's estate at his death greatly exceeded £6000, and the trustees erected an orphanage.

On 23d February 1892 the trustees of the orphanage presented a petition to the Court, in which they made the following statements:—“The funds at the disposal of the trustees were much larger than the testator had contemplated, and were amply sufficient for the support of a large number of orphans. The trustees accordingly erected two Cottage Homes, one to contain about thirty orphan boys and the other the same number of orphan girls. The present income of the trust is about £1250, and the expenditure last year was about £800. The homes were opened for the reception of orphans in January 1889, and every means taken of making known to the public the advantages of the institution. Notwithstanding the publicity given to the objects of the institution, the accommodation of the homes and the resources of the trust have not been taken advantage of to anything like the full extent. The number of orphan boys admitted since the opening of the homes is only thirteen and the number of orphan girls six. There are at present only ten boys and five girls in the homes. The homes are capable of accommodating about sixty boys and girls, and as the fixed expenses are nearly the same whether the homes are fully occupied or not, a largely increased number of children could be supported with the present income.

“The petitioners are satisfied that the present position of the charity is largely due to the fact that they are not entitled to receive orphans under the age of eight, or those who have been chargeable to any parochial board. It is found that in many cases where the relatives of orphan children have taken charge of them until they are eight years of age they are unwilling to allow them to enter the institution. Also, where children are left orphans under the age of eight they very generally become objects of parochial relief, and thereby become ineligible for the benefits of the institution. The age limit has thus been found to lead to the breaking up of families, which the friends and relatives are unwilling to do, and to the entire exclusion of the younger members from the benefits of the charity. The trustees have experienced the further difficulty in connection with the age of admission being fixed at so high a limit, viz., that the children in many cases having been neglected in their infancy have formed objectionable habits, of which it is very difficult to cure them, and which are apt to be communicated to the other children in the homes.

admitted to the orphanage shall be boarded, lodged, clothed, and educated in a plain and simple manner, such education to be confined to reading, writing, and arithmetic, but with regard to the boys, they shall be taught the cultivation of the kitchen garden in connection with the orphanage, and if thought prudent and for their advantage, they, or any of them, might be allowed to leave the house during the day for the purpose of learning a trade, . . . and as to girls, they shall, in addition to the ordinary education, be taught to sew, knit, and spin, and to cultivate a flower garden in connection with the orphanage, and such other branches as may make them honourable and useful in the world.”

"The petitioners are of opinion that were the age of admission reduced so that children of five years and upwards would be eligible for admission, the trustees at all times giving a preference to orphans of eight years of age and upwards, so long as they can be found in such numbers as to fill the homes, the institution would be much more largely taken advantage of, and the aims and wishes of the testator still efficiently carried out."

The petitioners therefore craved the Court "to reduce the limit of age of orphans for admission to said institution from eight years to five years, and to authorise the trustees to receive into said institution children of the age of five years and upwards, the trustees at all times giving a preference to children of the age of eight years and upwards in the event of children of the latter age being found in sufficient numbers to fill said institution."

The petitioners referred to the following authorities—University of Aberdeen v. Irvine, July 20, 1869, 7 Macph. 1087, 41 Scot. Jur. 609; McDougall, July 29, 1878, 5 R. 1014.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the case made out by the petitioners is abundantly sufficient to justify us in doing what the petitioners propose. The truster directed his trustees to accumulate the funds left by him until they reached the sum of £6000, and then on that basis he proceeded to deal with these funds and appointed the trustees to put up an institution for the accommodation of children of a specified class between the ages of eight and fourteen. Now it has turned out that the truster's estate amounts not to £6000 but £40,000, and the trustees have erected a building capable of accommodating sixty children, and it is perhaps not surprising to find that, there being this redundancy of money over the estimated amount, it is now discovered that there are not a sufficient number of children of the specified ages to exhaust the benefit provided by the testator for their particular class. The trustees, we find, have from the opening of the institution admitted thirteen boys and six girls, and there are at present ten boys and five girls in the homes. It is therefore plain that to a large extent the intended benefaction has been unused. The trustees state that they have done their best to make known the benefits of the institution to the class for whom they were intended, and that they are not able, owing to the age limit imposed by the testator, to make full use of the estate made over to them. They therefore propose that the Court should reduce the age limit, and authorise them to receive into the institution children between the ages of five and eight years, but with the restriction that they shall only apply for the benefit of such children the surplus funds remaining after provision has been made for all children between eight and fourteen, as directed by the testator. Now, this appears to me to be a legitimate proposal, because it will merely lead to the application of the scheme to a larger number of the same class as the truster desired to benefit, and the restriction prevents any violence being done to the intentions of the testator. Mr Reid has also shewn that advantageous results may be expected from having the younger as well as the older children in the institution, but the salient feature of the petitioners' proposal, in my view, is that it only applies to the surplus funds remaining after the testator's intentions, as these are specifically expressed, have been fully carried out.

LORD ADAM.—I have no doubt that the proposal made by the petitioners is a very excellent one, and that, looking to the cases, especially the case of The University of Aberdeen v. Irvine, it is competent for the Court to do what is asked.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is a general principle of charity law and administration that, where it is not possible to carry out the intentions of a testator in the precise manner directed by him, either from a failure in the objects of the charity, or from an increase in the trust-funds beyond the sum required for the prescribed purpose, it is within the power of the Court to direct that the funds shall be applied to other purposes as near as possible to those prescribed by the testator. There are traces of the application of this principle in some of the older cases, but in recent times it has been applied unequivocally in more than one important case. In addition to the cases cited to us, I may mention the case of the Trinity Hospital. That case was twice appealed to the House of Lords, and it was under a remit from the House of Lords on disposing of the first appeal that the Court of Session adjusted a scheme for the administration of the charity. Now, this scheme so far altered the purposes of the charity that the hospital was suppressed, and the pensioners instead of being maintained in an hospital received outdoor relief in the shape of annual pensions. This was a strong assertion of the principle of “cy près” administration, and as we may term it, the principle of approximation. The scheme adjusted by the Court of Session was taken to the House of Lords and was approved there—Magistrates of Edinburgh v. M'Laren, 8 R. (H. L.) 140.

I have no doubt in the present case that the power sought will be beneficially exercised, and substantially in accordance with the intentions of the testator. The removal of an age limit will in general be doing the least possible violence to the testator's intentions, because we are at liberty to suppose that if the funds available had been greater, the testator would have extended the limit.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have no doubt as to the expediency of the proposal made, or the power of the Court to give it effect.

THE COURT granted the prayer of the petition.

THE PORT-GLASGOW AND NEWARK SAILCLOTH COMPANY, Pursuers

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—
D.-F. Balfour—C. J. Guthrie.

Reparation—Railway—Fire caused by spark from engine—New type of engine in which old means of arresting sparks omitted.—The owners of a flax store near the line of the Caledonian Railway Company brought an action against the company for damages on account of the destruction of the store, which had been set on fire by a spark from one of the company's engines. The pursuers alleged that the engine was improperly constructed in respect that it had no “spark arrester.” The evidence shewed that spark arresters were in common use at that time, but in the case of engines of a modern type, such as the engine which caused the fire was, they had been discontinued, both because they impaired the efficiency of the engine and because other means were adopted of preventing the emission of sparks, which, as the defenders' witnesses—a number of locomotive engineers—alleged, were as efficacious as spark arresters; and it was proved that the use of spark arresters had been given up by most of the large English railway companies. The pursuers, on the other hand, adduced witnesses, who deposed that in their opinion spark arresters ought to be used in modern engines.

Held that it had not been proved that the defenders were negligent in using an engine which had no spark arrester, and therefore that they fell to be absolved.

Observed, per Lord President, that it is a rule fixed by a series of decisions that:

railway company is not liable in damages for a fire caused by one of its engines, No. 118. unless it is proved that the company was negligent.

Opinion, per Lord M'Laren, that railway companies are not under a legal disability to improve the efficiency of their engines, merely because such improvement may tend in some small degree to increase the risk of setting fire to adjacent property.

v. Caledonian
Railway Co.

Reparation—Railway—Contributory negligence.—A flax store was built near a railway, with no window or other means of lighting except a door facing the railway. The flax was set on fire by a spark from a passing train, when the door was open. Held that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the owner of the store.

Title to sue—Insurance.—A person whose property is injured by fire through the fault of another is not deprived of his title to sue by having his property fully insured.

On 7th October 1890 the Port-Glasgow and Newark Sailcloth Company raised an action against the Caledonian Railway Company, concluding for £12,000 as damages for the destruction by fire, on 5th June 1890, of a flax store belonging to the pursuers, and situated close to the defenders' Greenock line. The pursuers averred that the fire had been caused by a spark or cinder from one of the defenders' engines, and that the engine was not of proper construction, in respect that it was not fitted with what was commonly known as a "spark arrester," or with any efficient mechanical contrivance to prevent sparks from being emitted.

The pursuers pleaded ;—(2) The fire in question having been occasioned by the failure on the part of the defenders to use reasonable and proper appliances, precaution, and skill, in the use of their railway, the defenders are liable for the loss, injury, and damage thereby sustained.

The defenders denied the pursuers' averments, and stated further that pursuers were fully insured and consequently had no interest to maintain the action, and also that they had failed to take proper precautions to prevent damage to their works from the sparks of passing engines.

The defenders pleaded ;—(1) The said insurance companies having the chief interest in the subject-matter of this action and control over the proceedings therein ought to be ordered to sist themselves as pursuers. (4) Any loss which the pursuers may have sustained not having been occasioned by the fault of the defenders, they are not liable in any portion of the sum concluded for. (5) The said fire having been caused or materially contributed to by the negligence of the pursuers, they are not entitled to recover damages from the defenders.

On 6th December 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled the first plea in law for the defenders and allowed a proof.

The evidence established, in the opinion of the Court and the Lord Ordinary, that the fire had been caused by a spark from the defenders' engine No. 85, which passed the pursuers' store on the day in question with the 11.20 A.M. passenger express from Glasgow to Greenock. Engine No. 85 was an engine of a new type, having been built in 1888 from designs adopted by the company in 1885. The pursuers did not dispute that No. 85 was a very powerful engine, and in every respect efficient except in the single particular that it had no spark arrester. The spark arrester is a netting of iron which is placed in the smoke-box of the locomotive, with the effect of preventing the emission of sparks to a greater or less extent according to the size of the meshes and of the sparks. Spark arresters were in common use in engines of older types, but they were discarded by the defenders in their modern engines, including those of the type of No. 85, and most of the large English railway companies had likewise given up the use of spark arresters. Mr Drummond, formerly

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

No. 118. the defenders' locomotive engineer, deposed that spark arresters impaired the efficiency of the engine by interfering with the force of the blast, and that consequently what is called the "vortex blast" was devised, which was not only more powerful than the old "solid" blast, increasing the power of the engine, but was also much more equable and continuous, so that it had little or no tendency to stir up the fuel in the furnace and thereby cause cinders to be emitted. There was thus in Mr Drummond's opinion no need for a spark arrester when the vortex blast was used, as it was in No. 85, seeing that few if any cinders were stirred out of the furnace. This view was corroborated by the evidence of the locomotive engineers of several of the large English railway companies. None of these witnesses had ever seen or heard of an engine like No. 85 having a spark arrester, and they all thought that to fit one into it would impair its power and speed.

Mar. 15, 1892.
Port-Glasgow and Newark Sailcloth Co.
v. Caledonian
Railway Co.

The pursuers adduced several engineers who spoke to experiments they had made several years before. They were of opinion that the vortex blast made the use of a spark arrester more necessary than when the old form of blast was used, the vortex blast being so much more powerful. These witnesses were of opinion that a spark arrester might be fitted on to an engine like No. 85 without in any way impairing its efficiency, but they had never seen or heard of such a thing being done. The pursuers also adduced some witnesses, engine-drivers and others, who stated that they had seen No. 85 or sister engines emitting a large number of sparks.

The evidence bearing on the defenders' plea of contributory negligence was to this effect:—The pursuers' store was about 29 feet from the defenders' line of rails; it had no window, and the only means of lighting it was by opening doors, one of which was on the side next the railway. On the day in question one of the pursuers' servants went into the store to sort flax, leaving that door open; while so engaged a train passed, and shortly afterwards he observed the flax on fire.

On 13th August 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the fire in question was due to the fault of the defenders, and that the defenders are liable for the damage thereby caused. And in respect that parties are agreed that the amount of damage shall be assessed by an accountant, to be named by the Lord Ordinary, remits . . . and grants leave to reclaim."*

* "OPINION.— . . . The parties were not at issue as to the law. Assuming that the damage was caused by sparks discharged from one of the defenders' engines, it was agreed that the defenders were liable, unless it appeared that they had used the best means known and practicable for obviating the danger, or, otherwise, that the pursuers were (in the requisite sense) guilty of contributory negligence.

"The first question, accordingly, is, whether the pursuers have proved that the fire was, as they allege, kindled by a spark from one of the defenders' engines. I am of opinion that they have. The evidence, I think, leaves little doubt that the flax in the pursuers' store was ignited by a spark from the defenders' engine No. 85, which passed the store about 11.51 A.M. on the morning in question drawing the 11.20 express from Glasgow to Greenock.—(His Lordship then examined the evidence on this point.)

"I must therefore hold it proved that the engine No. 85 did, on the occasion in question, discharge dangerous sparks, which reached the flax in the pursuers' store at a distance of about 29 feet from the rails; and I am further obliged to hold, upon the evidence, that that engine was and is in the habit of discharging dangerous sparks. There is a concurrence of testimony to that effect which, I think, is explained away.

"Now, that being so, a considerable onus is thrown on the defenders, and I am afraid they hardly discharge themselves of that onus by leading evidence.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) Assuming that the fire had been caused by a spark from engine No. 85, the defenders, nevertheless, were not liable. Railway companies having statutory authority to bring fire into the neighbourhood of combustible articles were not liable for any damage caused by the exercise of this authority, unless it was proved that they had neglected some reasonable precaution. The precautions thus demanded of a railway company must be consistent with the carrying on of their business in a reasonable way. Railway companies were to use the best means of carrying on their business known to practical science at the time, and they were not to refuse to use new inventions merely because some slight increase of danger might result, if, as a whole, the effect that the engine in question was of the newest and best construction . . . I confess I am not satisfied on the evidence that the engine No. 85 and the other engines of its class are so constructed as to contain the best known and practicable arrangements for preventing the emission of sparks. Differing in this respect from the older class of engines, they contain no 'spark arrester' in their smoke-box; and assuming in their favour (what, however, is matter of dispute) that their vortex blast arrangement does not tend to increase the risk of sparks, or even that its associated arrangements tend to diminish that risk,—still the sparks ex hypothesi issue, and issue of such size as to be dangerous; and that being so, I am not, I confess, satisfied upon the evidence that the spark arrester if used would not at least have reduced that risk. Neither have I been convinced that its introduction would have materially interfered with the working of the engine or been in any other respect injurious. It is true that a majority of the great railway companies in England have ceased to use 'spark arresters.' But they are still largely used; and having given my best attention to the views of the defenders' witnesses, I have been unable to see sufficient reason why they should not continue to be used, or why, if used, they should not go at least a considerable way to obviate the risk of fire.

"It only remains to consider the question of contributory negligence, and here I am bound to say that the situation of the pursuers' store, and the arrangements of the building, were certainly not such as to minimise the risks arising from sparks thrown by passing engines. The store was only 29 feet from the railway. There were doors on the side next the railway, and there being no window in the roof (as there might have been), it was sometimes necessary (as on the occasion in question) to open one of these doors for the purpose of obtaining light. All this was certainly the reverse of cautious. But, on the other hand, I do not know that the pursuers were bound—because of the risk of the negligent discharge of sparks from the defenders' engines—to forego the full use of their ground, or to depart from what they considered the most convenient arrangements for obtaining access to, and for lighting their flax store. In other words, I doubt whether it can be imputed to them as fault that they took their chance of the defenders doing their duty. But in any case, the law—as I understand it—is, that in questions of contributory negligence causa proxima et non remota spectatur, and it is impossible to say that the position or arrangements of the pursuers' store formed in any proper sense the direct or proximate cause of this fire. The defenders could certainly, if I am right, have by ordinary care avoided inflicting the injury to which the pursuers, perhaps somewhat rashly, exposed themselves, and, according to the authorities, that is sufficient. See Ridley v. L. and N.-W. Railway Co., L. R., 1 App. Cases, 754, 759; Rooney v. Allans, 10 R. 1224; Florence v. Mann, 18 R. 247.

"On the whole, therefore, I consider that my judgment must be for the pursuers, and I have only to add that I am not able to see that the fact of the pursuers being covered, or nearly covered, by insurance makes any difference in their position. It may be that they are really suing on behalf of the insurance companies, but that is after all merely matter of process, and in the present case, where there is no question of responsibility for costs, I do not see that anything could be gained by sisting the insurance companies as pursuers."

the invention conduced to the more efficient working of the railway.¹ In the present case, the evidence shewed that engines like No. 85 did not require a spark arrester, and that to fit them with one would impede their power and speed. (2) The pursuers were guilty of contributory negligence in keeping such a combustible material as flax so near a railway under the circumstances disclosed in the proof. (3) The pursuers had no title to sue, because they had no interest.

Argued for the pursuers ;—In not using a spark arrester in No. 85, the defenders were not neglecting to take advantage of a new, and it might be comparatively untried invention ; they were throwing aside a precaution which had for twenty years been regarded as essential. The onus was upon them to shew that it was not necessary, or that they had substituted something equally efficient.² This they had failed to do. It was nothing to the point to say that the absence of a spark arrester increased the power and speed of the engine. That was all a matter of money, and if, for the sake of increased power and speed, the defenders chose to dispense with spark arresters, they must pay the penalty. (2) The pursuers were not guilty of contributory negligence.³ (3) They had a title to sue. The authorities shewed this.⁴

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an action instituted for the recovery of damages from the railway company on the alleged ground that the pursuers' flax store was destroyed by fire caused by a spark from a locomotive engine. Two questions were argued ; the first, whether the fire was in fact caused by a spark from the defenders' engine, and secondly, whether in the circumstances the defenders are liable to make compensation for the damage caused by their involuntary act.

On the first question I believe that your Lordships are in agreement with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuers' store was set on fire by a spark from the engine No. 85, which passed the store about 11.51 on the morning of 5th June 1890, drawing the 11.20 passenger express from Glasgow to Greenock.—(His Lordship then considered the evidence on this point.)

The next question in the case is the criterion of liability or responsibility on the part of the company. The Lord Ordinary puts it that the defenders are liable, unless it appears that they had used the best means known and practicable for obviating the danger. This definition is in accordance with the authorities on this subject, but like many legal propositions it needs explanation and reference to the facts of the case which I am about to state. It is in evidence No. 118. that with the view of lessening the risk of fire it was at one time usual to put into the smoke-box of the locomotive below the chimney a netting or "grid" of iron, which was called a spark arrester, and in engines of the older type this appliance is still in use. The spark arrester would of course have the effect of intercepting such sparks or cinders (I shall term them) as were too large to pass through the grating. It was not a complete protection against fire, and it is the case of the company that the ejection of sparks is more effectually prevented by improved methods of regulating the draught from the furnace than by the cruder mechanical method formerly in use. There can be no doubt that very great attention and skill have been directed to the object of the production of an equable draught in the engine, and there is a very strong body of evidence to the effect that while the chief object of such improvements is the attainment of high speed, they also have the effect of leaving the furnace comparatively undisturbed, and thereby reducing the quantity of solid material which is carried up the chimney. It is also the opinion of all the witnesses who have experience in the construction of engines of the best modern construction, that the introduction of a grid into the chimney or smoke-box would nullify or most seriously interfere with the efficiency of the draught arrangements. For this reason it appears that in engines of the new type the grid has been discarded, not only by the Caledonian, but by all the great railway companies of England. The opinion of the companies' engineers is that the arresting of sparks is better accomplished by providing an equable draught through the engine than by trying to stop the cinders in their passage, and they all agreed that the old spark arrester cannot be applied to engines of the new type. Their opinion is so far verified by this consideration that while it is the fact that the so-called "spark arrester" has for some years gone almost entirely out of use, there is no evidence, and no suggestion, that in consequence of its disuse fires have become more frequent.

I shall consider the evidence on this subject a little more in detail, but before doing so, let me ask, supposing the case of the company on this head to be well founded, what is the bearing of these facts and opinions on the liability of the Caledonian Company? Is the company, these facts and opinions notwithstanding, bound to go on using the old spark arrester, or to pay for the fire damage which it may be supposed will sometimes occur when even all practicable means are used to prevent it?

The argument for the pursuers was to this effect: Admitting that by the new construction of furnaces, and the introduction of the vortex blast, the engines are greatly improved as engines, and their speed and efficiency increased, they say that one effect of these improvements is to increase the quantity of sparks ejected by the engine, and therefore the company is liable. One difficulty which the argument immediately suggests consists in the absence of any standard frequency of spark emission to which the company is to conform. It is tacitly assumed that under no circumstances of speed, or weight to be carried, is an engine to be permitted to send out a greater quantity of sparks than were emitted by the smaller and slower and less efficient engines that were in use in the infancy of the railway system. But then the theory of the decisions is that the Legislature by authorising the use of steam-power without limitation as to the power of the engines or the speed of locomotion has impliedly indemnified the company against the consequences of the use of such engines, provided they are of the best construction, and that the proper safeguards are used for minimising the risk of fire-damage. These safeguards may be different according to the type of engine in question, and I cannot hold, consistently with the decisions, that railway companies are under a legal disability to improve the efficiency of their engines, because such improvement may in some small degree tend to increase the risk of setting fire to adjacent property. Nor would a company, in my opinion, be bound to reduce the speed of its trains if someone should discover a better mode of arresting sparks, which could only be used with a speed of say twenty miles an hour. On the other hand, it may be fairly enough maintained that considerations of safety to landowners are not to be sacrificed altogether to the demand of the travelling public for express speed. The question is one of degree, in which common sense rather than legal refinement must be the guide. It is certainly most legitimate to refer to past experience, and to known appliances such as the old spark arrester, but not as constituting an absolute standard to which the railway companies are bound to conform. It has not been shewn that the quantity of sparks emitted by engines of the new type is sensibly greater, or that the risk of fire from them is of a different order of magnitude from the risk which existed when engines of the old type were alone used. If such a case could be established it might be necessary to consider what are the limits of the exemption from pecuniary responsibility which is claimed by railway companies under the decisions referred to by the Lord Ordinary. But for the purposes of the present case it may be sufficient to say that the company is within the exemption where these two conditions concur—first, that the means used for preventing the communication of fire are the best known and attainable with reference to the class of engine in use; second, that the risk of fire from such engines is not of a different order from that attending the use of engines of the class employed when the railway companies got authority from Parliament to use locomotive power.

I will now briefly indicate what I understand to be the means used in the engine No. 85 for obviating the emission of sparks. These, as I collect from the evidence, are substantially identical with the means and construction which are used by the leading railway companies in England. The furnace is surmounted by a brick arch, and the supply of air which feeds the furnace is regulated by a deflector. The gases or fumes from the furnace are led through a very large number of tubes, which are all kept clean and efficient throughout the journey, and the exhaust steam passes into a wide chamber, and is there sent into the chimney through an annular opening, while the products of combustion are led into the centre of the chimney by a tube placed inside the annular tube, which carries away the exhaust steam. It is explained by Mr Drummond, formerly the locomotive superintendent of the Caledonian Company and the designer of this engine, that each and all of these mechanical arrangements tend to lessen the production of sparks. The object in view is, as far as possible, to avoid disturbing the cinders in the furnace by the effect of pulsations or an intermitting draught. The air is supplied to the furnace through a regulated opening, and is partially heated before mixing with the flame. The brick arch stops and throws down the larger cinders that may be carried up in the flame, and attracts and burns up the smaller ones. By the combined effect of the wide chamber for the reception of the exhaust steam, and of the various blast arrangement, by which the steam and the gases are carried in separate currents into the chimney, the flame is said to be carried through the tubes and up the chimney in a continuous equable current, and the cinders in the furnace are not disturbed by the pulsations attending the escape of steam, as was the case in the engines of the old pattern. In engines of the old pattern by the effect of these pulsations such a quantity of ash was driven through the tubes that at the end of a long journey as many as one-fourth of the tubes of the tubular boiler were found to be completely choked by the accumulation of ash, and this irregularity again rendered necessary a sharper blast, thereby increasing the emission of sparks. In the new engines the tubes do not get choked with ashes. The pursuers say that this is because the ashes are carried up the chimney; but it is not easy to see why this should be the result of the more equable blast which is admittedly obtained in engines of the improved construction. The corroborative evidence includes that of the locomotive superintendents of the London and South-Western, the Midland, the Great Western, the London and North-Western, the Caledonian, and the North British Railways. These are men the business of whose lives is the designing and working of locomotives. The improvements to which they speak were not made for the special purpose of lessening the risk of fire, but it is impossible to read their evidence without seeing that the means which have been devised for ensuring more perfect combustion and more equable draught with a view to efficiency of speed and economy of fuel, are also the best known and practicable means of preventing the discharge of solid particles through the chimney of the engine. These gentlemen are all of opinion that the grid cannot be used with the present type of engine because of its tending to interfere with the regular and steady current of flame, which is a necessary accompaniment of the new system. Against such evidence there is the opinion of more than one witness of ability and science, but on such a subject I think the opinion of practical engineers is the best opinion. It may be said that the practical witnesses are all railway men, but then it is their interest to make these engines as perfect as possible; they say that the escape of sparks cannot be altogether prevented, and that their way is the best way. No one has come forward to shew a better way; and while the pursuers' witnesses say that there is no mechanical difficulty in introducing a grid into the new type of engine, they do not satisfactorily meet the defenders' evidence, which is to the effect that the grid would render useless the other arrangements which in a different way tend to the same result of preventing sparks.

My opinion on this engineering question is, that the defenders have proved that they use the best known and practicable means available in engines of the type of No. 85 for preventing the emission of sparks. I am satisfied that in fact the engine 85 was not so constructed as to send forth sparks in excess of what are usually and unavoidably produced by engines running at a high speed. For these reasons I propose that the interlocutor should be recalled, and the defenders absolved from the action.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Were it not for the importance of this case and the anxiety with which it has been argued, I should have said no more than to express my concurrence, being well content with Lord M'Laren's exposition of our judgment.

On the more generally important question which arises, assuming engine No. 85 to have caused the fire, the Lord Ordinary has not explicitly formulated what he takes to be the issue to be tried, but he says several things which indicate that he has considered the question from a standpoint different from that which is adopted by your Lordships.

He begins by holding, upon the evidence, that No. 85 "was and is in the habit of discharging dangerous sparks," and goes on to say, "Now that being so, a considerable onus is thrown on the defenders." If this means that this particular engine differs for the worse from other engines in regard to the sparks it throws, I think this is not made out. There is nothing substantial to shew that the observers who noted the proceedings of No. 85 would not have seen just the same things if they had watched any other engine with or without a spark arrester. If, on the other hand, the Lord Ordinary means that if any engine or all engines be in the habit of discharging dangerous sparks (meaning thereby sparks which do not go out on the way to the ground), then the onus is on the company,—I think that proposition is irreconcilable with the law as it is now settled.

The question of onus is highly important to the stability of the interlocutor, for the Lord Ordinary ultimately decides against the defenders on the ground that they have not convinced him that the type of engine which is prevalent on most of the principal English and Scottish railways is so constructed as to contain the best known and practicable arrangements for preventing the emission of sparks. And what this means is made more manifest when his Lordship says in the last sentence relating to this subject,—“I have been unable to see sufficient reason why spark arresters should not continue to be used, or why if used they should not go at least a considerable way to obviate the risk of fire.” From this I gather that the Lord Ordinary does not pronounce either upon the question (unsolved by experience) whether the spark arrester is practicable in the new engines or on the other question (which is equally problematical) whether, if it could be so combined, it would do much or any good. Nothing therefore but the initial onus has led to his Lordship's decision.

Now, I must say that I cannot see how this can be supported. I do not think that our duty is to discuss these complicated questions of mechanism as if we had now to construct a safe engine, and to conjecture whether combinations, hitherto untried, would or would not be better than those in use. We have got to say whether the pursuers have proved that the defenders are negligent because they use this type of engine.

I take the broad facts of the case. This type of engine (of which No. 85 is simply a specimen) is, as I have said, prevalent on most of the principal lines. It has been in use for many years, and there has been abundant opportunity of judging whether more fires occur where it is used than where the spark arrester is in vogue. There is no evidence whatever of the affirmative. Therefore, when the defenders got this engine, they were simply getting the best engine to be had without anything to suggest that it was dangerous. If, going further back, we ask whether the question of safety was considered by the constructors of these engines, I say the evidence shews that it was considered and decided in favour of the new system, and we find that the skilful mechanics who advised the company and are examined as witnesses give strong reasons for their choice. It may be that ingenuity may in the future combine the spark arrester with the new system without spoiling the efficiency of engine all I can say is that this has not yet been done, and it forms no part of the existing knowledge available to railway companies. At present it is, to say the least, a moot point whether the thing is practicable. Because the defenders have not demonstrated it to be impracticable, the Lord Ordinary has found them liable.

I deem this quite inconsistent with the series of decisions, of which *The King v. Pease*¹ and *Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Company*² are leading instances, approved by the House of Lords in Hammersmith v. Brand.³ The consequences of these decisions are no doubt serious and striking, but the rule fixed by them is that if locomotives set fire to property, the railway company are not liable unless they are proved to have been negligent. It is true that such negligence may be in the construction of the furniture or the conduct of the engine—Freemantle v. London and North-Western Railway Company,⁴ and this opens responsibilities which would not be discharged by a facile acceptance of any engine proposed by advisers who necessarily are not stimulated by any independent regard to the safety of the property of third parties. Still, negligence there must be, in a fair sense of the term. The facts of this case seem to me to disclose none.

I have only to add that I understand we all agree with the Lord Ordinary in rejecting the arguments founded on account of contributory negligence and on the insurance of the premises which were destroyed.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and assoilzied the defenders.

The Inland Revenue having refused to repay the £80, the County Council, on 18th November, brought an action against the Lord Advocate, as representing the Board of Inland Revenue, concluding for decree for £80, with interest from 27th August 1891.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The Surveyors of Taxes for the county of Lanark, as Lands Valuation Assessors for said county, being bound, in terms of the Acts 17 and 18 Vict. c. 91, and 20 and 21 Vict. c. 58, to make up the Valuation-roll of the county, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue were not entitled to require payment of the sum sued for as a condition of their doing so. (2) The pursuers having resolved that the Valuation-roll should be printed, the surveyors, as assessors

sec. 12—which was substituted for the Lands Valuation Amendment Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 80), sec. 10—it was enacted,—“It shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Supply of any county, or the magistrates of any burgh, to resolve at any meeting of their number, ordinary or special, duly called, and by a majority of those attending and voting, that the Valuation-roll of such county or burgh shall be printed for any period of years not exceeding ten, and it shall be lawful for such commissioners or magistrates to enter into contracts for printing the same, and the expenses of such printing shall be deemed to be part of the expenses of making up such roll, and shall be assessed for and levied accordingly.”

* By the third section of the Valuation Act of 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), sec. 3, the Commissioners of Supply are empowered to appoint one or more fit persons to be assessors or assessor for the purposes of the Act, and by section 18 to defray the costs and expenses of making up Valuation-rolls by levying assessments for the same.

By the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 58), sec. 1, it is enacted,—“1. It shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Supply of each county, and the magistrates of each burgh in Scotland respectively, if they shall think fit, to appoint the officer or officers of Inland Revenue having the survey of the income-tax and assessed taxes within such county or burgh, to be the assessors or assessor for the purpose of the said Act, and such officer or officers when so appointed, as long as such appointments remain unrecalled, shall in all respects and for the purposes stand in the place of, and shall have, use, exercise, and perform all the powers and duties of the person or persons who the said commissioners and magistrates respectively are authorised to appoint for the like purposes, under or by virtue of the third section of the said Act; and in such case the expense attending the making up of Valuation-rolls by such officer or officers shall be defrayed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, or as the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury shall direct in the behalf.”

foresaid, were bound to supply a MS. copy of the roll for the use of the printer, and to revise the proof print, without requiring from the pursuers the payment of the said sum. No. 119.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The printing of the Valuation-roll and the work connected therewith being no part of the duty of surveyors of taxes as assessors in making up the roll, the payment required for their services on that account was properly and legally charged. (3) The direction given by the pursuers to print the roll is subject to the approval of the Treasury,* and in respect that the Treasury would insist on remuneration as a condition of their approval, the claim which is now made is untenable.

Mar. 15, 1892.
County
Council of Lanarkshire v.
Lord Advocate.

On 12th February 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced an interlocutor repelling the defences, and decerning against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons.†

* By the Local Government Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50), sec. 83, subsec. 3, it is provided that, "where the assessor is an officer of Inland Revenue, any regulations made by the County Council with respect to his duties shall be subject to the approval of the Treasury."

† "OPINION.—(After stating the circumstances and quoting the first section of the Valuation Act, 1857)—It will be observed that this section contains important and clear provisions in regard to the duties of an officer of Inland Revenue when appointed Valuation Assessor, and the mode in which the expense of making up Valuation-rolls shall in such a case be defrayed. The officer of Inland Revenue is to perform without qualification all the duties incumbent on any other assessor appointed by the Commissioners of Supply; and the whole expense of his making up the Valuation-roll, which would otherwise have been defrayed by assessment, is, without qualification, to be defrayed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or the Treasury. The arrangement thus made was advantageous to both departments, and I think it may safely be assumed that the Treasury obtained a sufficient equivalent for the expenses which they undertook.

"Two views may be taken of the expenses represented by the £80 now sued for. They may be regarded (1) as part of the expense of printing, or (2) as representing additional expense and trouble caused by the pursuers resolving that the roll should be printed. The latter view is the more favourable to the defender, because it does not necessarily involve liability for the printer's account. I shall consider it first.

"1. If the sum sued for is not held to be part of the expense of printing, then it is simply a part of the expense of making up the Valuation-roll, which, if the assessors had not been officers of Inland Revenue, the pursuers would have had power to defray by assessment, apart from the provisions of the Act of 1867 and the Act of 1885. Having statutory authority to print the roll, they would have been entitled to order their assessors to make it up on that footing, and, if necessary, they could have assessed for the additional expense, if any.

"If that be so, then under the first section of the Valuation Act of 1857 the officer of Inland Revenue, acting as and charged with all the duties of an assessor, would have been bound to obey such lawful orders given to him by the Commissioners of Supply, and the additional expense, if any, would have fallen upon the Inland Revenue Department.

"2. This may perhaps be a narrow ground of judgment. I am prepared however to hold, if necessary, that even if this additional expense is to be considered part of the expense of printing the roll, that expense must be borne, not by the pursuers, but by the Department of Inland Revenue or the Treasury. This is in accordance with the express words of the statutes. Under the Act of 1854 the Commissioners were empowered to defray the expenses of making up Valuation-rolls by assessment. The Act of 1857 throws that on the Commissioners of Inland Revenue where their officer is assessor. By the Acts of

Council of Lanarkshire v.
Lord Advocate.

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) The present action did not directly raise any question of liability for the printer's account, but the defender maintained that neither the cost of actual printing nor the extra trouble caused to the assessors by the printing fell to be paid for by the Inland Revenue Department. The duty of the assessors, as representing the Inland Revenue, ended when they supplied a manuscript Valuation-roll, which was all that the Valuation Act of 1857 contemplated. It was true that the Registration Act of 1885, in empowering the Commissioners of Supply to print the roll, provided that the expenses of the printing should be deemed to be part of the expenses of making up the roll; but that could not be construed to impose the liability for the expenses of the printing, or in connection with the printing, on the Crown, for a statute was not to be held to impose a burden on the Crown unless it imposed it expressly, and here the statute expressly said that the cost of printing was to be raised by assessment. The case for the pursuers would have been stronger under the Act of 1867, for that Act did not empower the Commissioners of Supply to enter into contracts for printing, and the 1867 and 1885 it is provided that the expense of printing shall be deemed to be part of the expenses of making up such roll. No doubt it is added that the expense of printing shall be assessed for and levied accordingly, and it is also true that the latter enactments do not refer to the Act of 1857. But this is not material, because the first section of that Act, as I read it, simply provides that if the Commissioners appoint an officer of Inland Revenue as assessor, he shall come in the place of and perform all the duties which at the time any other assessor would have had to perform, and that the 'expense attending the making up of Valuation-rolls by such officer,' whatever it may be, shall be defrayed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or the Treasury. That enactment not having been repealed or modified must, I think, receive effect.

"If the defender's contention were correct it would involve a double account. The department of Inland Revenue would have to pay the expenses of making up the Valuation-roll, in so far as they could be distinguished from the expense of printing and the additional labour rendered necessary in connection with printing, while the pursuers would have to levy an assessment for the rest. I find no warrant in the statutes for any such division of the accounts. On the contrary, the statutes contemplate that the expenses of making the Valuation-roll shall be indivisible, and shall fall to be defrayed, either wholly by assessment or wholly by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or the Treasury.

"The defender also founded upon section 83, subsection 3, of the Local Government Act, 1889, 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50, which provides that any regulations made by the County Council with respect to the duties of the assessor when he is an officer of Inland Revenue shall be subject to the approval of the Treasury. I do not think, however, that the orders given by the pursuers in connection with the preparation of the printed roll can be regarded as a regulation in the sense of this clause. They had statutory authority to order the Valuation-roll to be made up and printed, and in instructing their assessors to prepare the roll and revise the proofs they were not, I think, issuing regulations but giving orders for the performance of certain new, it may be additional, duties, which they were empowered by statute to impose on the assessors.

"If this defence were well founded the preparation of the roll might be stopped at any moment, until the County Council succeeded in satisfying the Treasury as to terms.

"In conclusion, I would only say that I hope the matter in dispute, which is really a small one, may in the public interest be adjusted. Although the expense of printing the roll for the first time may be considerable, the advantage in future years to all concerned will be great, and will no doubt compensate for any additional work and expense which may have been rendered necessary during the first year."

expense of printing was there declared to be part of the expense of No. 119. making up the roll, in terms of the 18th section of the Act of 1854. (2) The resolution of the County Council to print the roll, in so far as it imposed a duty on the assessors, was a "regulation" in the sense of the 83d section of the Local Government Act of 1889, and required the sanction of the Treasury, which had not been obtained.

Council of Lanarkshire v.
Lord Advocate.

The pursuers were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this is a perfectly clear case.

By the Valuation Act of 1854 the duty of making up the Valuation-roll in each county or burgh is imposed upon the local authority for the county or burgh. They are authorised, for the purpose of making up the roll, to appoint an assessor whom they are to remunerate, and for whose remuneration, along with the expense of making up the roll, they are authorised to impose a rate, half on owners and half on occupiers. That Valuation-roll, as has been declared by judgment of this Court, was available for local taxation, and accordingly being a roll for local taxation, it was prepared by the local authority and the cost borne by local rates. But as experience grew, it was observed by the Legislature that there was an inconveniency in there being imperial rates on owners and occupiers, and local rates on owners and occupiers, while the machinery for the assessments was different in the one case from the other; and accordingly—there being a double method in existence causing double cost and creating some of the embarrassments which necessarily would arise from want of uniformity in the standard of valuation for local rates on the one hand and imperial taxes on the other—in 1857 it was provided that if any local authority thought good to appoint as their assessor the Surveyor of Taxes for the district, then by way of return for their, to a certain extent, parting with the complete latitude of their choice, they should have the expense of making up the roll borne by the Inland Revenue. The plain English of the Act of 1857 is, that if any local authority did not exercise its right of selecting a different assessor—for it was still in their power to exercise that option—and appointed the Surveyor of Taxes for the district, they should be relieved of the expense of the roll. But that was optional, and accordingly, as a matter of course, the Act of 1857 left standing the whole machinery by which the local authority was provided with the power of levying rates to meet the expense of what was the primary type of case—the case where they had an assessor of their own.

Now, as time went on, some counties and some burghs exercised this power and others did not. We have heard I think to-day—at least it is matter of common knowledge—that now that the system has developed, and the advantages of combining the offices are sufficiently seen, the great majority of the local bodies have the surveyors of taxes for their assessors, and in 1867 it was found that it was convenient and desirable that the local authorities should be authorised to have the Valuation-roll printed, and accordingly they are authorised by the statute to which we have been referred, in 1867, to print the Valuation-roll, and the expense of such printing was to form part of the expenses of making up the roll. I pause at the Act of 1867 to observe that I should have thought it perfectly clear that the expense of printing the Valuation-roll, being declared to form part of the expenses of making up the roll, was to be assessed for and defrayed in the same way as the rest of the expenses, and that in the case where the office of assessor was combined with that of surveyor of taxes it was to be defrayed by the Inland Revenue. In 1885 an Act was passed which enabled

No. 119. local authorities to resolve that the Valuation-roll should be printed for a series of years, and there is, as I think the Lord Ordinary rightly points out, a specific re-enactment of the provisions arranging for the cost of the printing whether for a period of years or not. Mr Mackay has very properly called attention to the differences between the Act of 1867 and the Act of 1885. They are appreciable, but I do not think that they affect the net result, which was that in 1885, as in 1867, the expense of printing was declared to be part of the expense of making up the roll.

Mar. 15, 1892.
County Council of Lanarkshire v.
Lord Advocate.

Now, it seems to me that, so standing the legislation, the process of reasoning by which the pursuer is entitled to prevail in this action is of the simplest possible description. The expense of printing is said to be part of the expense of making up the roll which by statute is to be defrayed, in the case in hand, by the Inland Revenue. As printing is part of the expense, it of course is to be defrayed by the Inland Revenue. But Mr Mackay has pointed out that in the Acts which authorise printing there is a reference to the power of assessment because these words are added, declaring that the expense of printing is to be deemed to be part of the expenses of making up the roll, and "shall be assessed for and levied accordingly." Well, that is a most natural provision, but it really adds nothing to the argument when it is considered that when relief was given under the Act of 1857, as regards the general expenses of the roll, there was the abrogation of the power of assessing on the part of local bodies. And so here there is not only no abrogation, but there is a confirmation of the existing powers which of course were necessary for the cases where there was not a combination of the two offices, and where the county had to meet the expense itself. It is quite conceivable that, as printers' bills must be paid, a question might arise as to payment, and it was necessary that that should be provided for.

A second argument has been advanced which I think is more untenable. It is founded on the Local Government Act of 1889. In the 83d section there are provisions which deal with the cases of local authorities exercising the power conferred on them of appointing as their assessor the surveyor of taxes. Such cases had become pretty frequent, and it cannot be doubted that in 1889 the burden thus imposed on the Treasury, owing to the growth of business at the assessor's office and the various purposes which the assessor's roll performs, had made the bargain, so to speak, of 1857 less beneficial to the Inland Revenue than it was at that date. I discover traces of that in the enactment. There is a provision that, unless with the consent of the Inland Revenue, the assessor shall not be appointed. There is another to the effect that where the offices are combined, the amount of salary or allowance shall be subject to the approval of the Treasury. That is quite natural, because there was a danger that the new local authority might starve the office of assessor looking for his being remunerated by the Treasury. Those were inconveniences which were very natural, and apparently they were suitably provided against. Then there is a third provision to the effect that where the assessor is an officer of the Inland Revenue, any regulations made by a county council with respect to his duties shall be subject to the approval of the Treasury. Now, can it be said that because the County Council of Lanark, in the exercise of its powers under the Act of 1885, resolves to print the roll, its instruction to the assessor to get it printed is to be regarded as a regulation in the sense of this Act, and to shift the burden which that statute had declared should go along with the other expense wherever that went? It appears to me that that is an impossible construction of the word "regulation," or rather that to force the word "regulation" into service to this extent would have the effect of defeating the direct provision of the statute of 1857. No. 119.

I do not think there is any difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary is right.

County
Council of Lanarkshire v.
Lord Advocate.

LORD ADAM and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am also of the same opinion. The 12th section of the Act of 1885, on which the argument of the reclaimer is rested, provides that the expense of printing shall be deemed part of the expenses of making up the roll, and shall be assessed for and levied accordingly. Now, that gives no specific power to assess irrespective of previous enactments, because we are referred back to previous legislation which authorises assessment for the expenses of making up the roll. When we go back to previous legislation we find that in the case where an officer of Inland Revenue, having the survey of the income-tax, is assessor, the expense of making up is not to be levied by assessment, but is to be defrayed by the Treasury. Therefore, when those statutes are read together, it appears that the argument of the reclaimer involves this, that a reference to an existing rule of assessment implies a power to commissioners of supply, or county councils in their place, to levy an assessment for a purpose for which they were not entitled to levy any such assessment prior to the passing of the Act. It may be that in particular cases a county council may be entitled to levy assessments, as in cases existing, which would cover this expense, but they are certainly not entitled to levy assessments for the purpose of defraying expenses which the Legislature has put upon the Treasury, and that is the purpose for which the reclaimer maintains they ought to have been made. Mr Mackay said there might be circumstances involved in making contracts with printers which would not necessarily or properly fall within the enactment in the Statute of 1857, which requires that the expenses attending the making up of the valuation-roll by such officer or officers shall be defrayed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or by the Treasury. I cannot say that I was satisfied with the illustrations that Mr Mackay gave us that such questions were likely to arise upon any such contracts as he indicated. It appears to me that it is sufficient for the purposes of this case that we have no such question involved, because the averment of the defenders upon which our judgment is challenged is, that the pursuer, while repudiating liability, paid the sum of £80 in respect of the services rendered by the assessor in printing the roll. Therefore the question that we have to consider in this case, and the only question is, whether the cost of the assessor's services in making up the roll is to fall upon the Treasury or upon the County Council? Upon that I have no doubt whatever, and I agree with your Lordship that the Lord Ordinary is right. The second point that has been put forward is also, I think, untenable for the reasons which your Lordship has indicated.

THE COURT adhered.

Duthie.

C. & A. JOHNSTONE, Pursuers (Appellants).—Comrie Thomson—Shaw.
JAMES DUTHIE, Defender (Respondent).—C. J. Guthrie—Crabb Watt.

Cautioner—Liberation—Bill—Giving time.—A cautioner granted a letter guaranteeing to see A “duly paid for all goods you may supply from and after this date to the order of B.” After the account had been closed—a considerable balance being due to A, an arrangement was made between A and B for payment of the balance by instalments. This arrangement was made known to the cautioner, who repudiated all liability. Some months thereafter A, without the cautioner’s knowledge, drew two bills on B at three months’ date for the whole balance of the debt. B having become bankrupt before the bills were met, A sued the cautioner for the balance.

Held that the cautioner was liberated by A’s action in taking the bills and thereby giving B time,—diss. Lord M’Laren, who held that, as the cautioner had repudiated liability, A was entitled to make the best terms he could with B.

Question, whether the arrangement to take payment by instalments liberated the cautioner.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeenshire.

IN March 1888 James Duthie, provision merchant, Aberdeen, disposed of his business to John Reid Cormack, his brother-in-law, who had been his manager.

At the time of the transfer of his business to Cormack, Duthie owed Messrs C. & A. Johnstone, wholesale merchants in Aberdeen, £50 for goods supplied to him, and on 2d April 1888 he granted the following letter of guarantee to the Messrs Johnstone:—“2d April 1888.—To Messrs C. & A. Johnstone, merchants, Aberdeen.—Gentlemen,—In addition to the account of £50 pounds due by me to you for goods supplied to my shop at 50 Summerfield Terrace, I hereby guarantee and undertake to see you duly paid for all goods you may supply from and after this date to the order of J. R. Cormack, to whom I have made over my business there.—Yours truly, JAMES DUTHIE.”

Goods were supplied to Cormack under the guarantee after that date and down to April 1890 when the account was closed. Cormack became bankrupt on 19th November 1890.

Messrs Johnstone then brought an action against Duthie for payment of £137, 15s., the balance then admittedly due under the account.

Duthie, the defender, stated, that prior to March 1888 the grocery goods for the shop were obtained mainly from the pursuers, on the usual terms between wholesale and retail grocers in Aberdeen, namely, that the goods supplied during one month should be paid for at latest before the end of next month, and that the pursuers were bound by the arrangement with the defender by the custom of trade not to allow Cormack credit beyond this, but that instead of this, and outwith the defender’s knowledge, they took bills at currencies of three and six months, and even renewed these bills when they fell due. In particular, on 26th September 1890, they took two bills, at three months’ date, one for £99, 17s. 4d., and the other for £70, 18s. 4d. (Stat. 4) “By taking the bill and renewals of bills before specified, and by agreeing to accept payment of Cormack’s debt by instalments, the pursuers precluded themselves from using proper measures to compel payment of the sums due to them and for which the credit allowed by the trade had expired, and thereby and by otherways granting time to Cormack in the knowledge that his affairs were insolvent, they materially prejudiced the defender in his recourse against the principal debtor.”

In answer to the defender’s statement the pursuers averred that there was no fixed rule or custom of trade as to the extent or period of credit given by wholesale merchants to retail grocers in Aberdeen. They admitted that they “occasionally took bills from Cormack at two or three months' date, for their own convenience, and on a few occasions they took partial renewals from him for a like period, as they were entitled to do under an open guarantee where no mention was made of dates or payments, and in accordance with the usual practice in such cases. The account annexed to the petition contains the whole of these bills, with the exception of the two last bills for £99, 17s. 4d. and £70, 18s. 4d. respectively, which were drawn by them on Cormack on 26th September 1890 in order to constitute and settle the amount then due by him to pursuers, and also to enable the pursuers to have the use of the money by discounting said bills with their bankers, as is usual and customary in such cases. The defender, even if unaware of the bills, was in no way prejudiced by the taking of them. They are now past due and unpaid, are in the pursuers' custody, and will be delivered up to the defender on the balance sued for being paid."

C. & A. Johnstone v.
Duthie.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender being bound by the terms of his said letter of guarantee for goods supplied by the pursuers to himself and the said John Reid Cormack, as specified in the account herewith produced, decree should be pronounced as craved. (2) The defender having ratified, approved of, and adopted the course of dealings between the pursuers and Cormack, and the amount due under said letter of guarantee, and having agreed that time should be given to Cormack as condescended on, is now barred personali exceptione from objecting to the account libelled, or the length and extent of the credit allowed, or the nature of the dealings between the said parties.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having given time to Cormack for payment of his accounts beyond the usual period allowed in the trade, and in breach of the understanding between the parties, the defender was thereby liberated from liability under his guarantee. (2) Separatim, The pursuers having allowed Cormack unreasonable terms and an excessive period of credit, outwith the ordinary custom and conduct of trade, and without communication to the defender, he is not liable under the guarantee.

From the proof it appeared that the usual terms in Aberdeen between wholesale grocers and retail dealers were one month's credit beyond the month of supply, the accounts being rendered at the beginning of each month for that immediately preceding, and being paid at the beginning of the month following that on which they were rendered. Sometimes bills at two or even three months' date were taken, and it was proved that in Cormack's case this had been done, and the bills sometimes renewed for a further period, all without the defender's knowledge. The monthly dealings varied from about £50 to £100, the whole indebtedness rising from £105 in August 1888 to £290 in February 1890. When the guarantee was originally arranged, the defender had warned the pursuers that Cormack was occasionally unsteady, and in April 1890, owing to his habits and neglect to settle his monthly accounts, his debt then amounting to £264, 5s. 3d., the pursuers made an arrangement with him that he was to pay £10 a-week to account of his debt and cash for whatever goods he got, the credit thus coming to an end. The arrangement was communicated to the defender, who denied liability for the debt. On 13th August following, as Cormack had failed to pay the £10 per week, it was agreed that he should pay £5 per week instead. On 26th September the pursuers took two bills from Cormack for £70, 18s. 4d. and £99, 17s. 4d. at three months' date, so as to constitute their debt and enable them to have the use of their money. The bills were never met, and the balance still due when Cormack's bankruptcy occurred on 19th November following was £137, 15s.

C. & A. John-
stone v.
Duthie.

On 27th October 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Grierson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds . . . (3) that their ordinary period of credit allowed by the pursuers in the ordinary course of business with persons such as Cormack was about three months, and that there was nothing in Cormack's position to operate any change in their ordinary practice; (4) that they allowed Cormack credit to such extents as five, seven, and twelve months, and that such extensions were granted in respect of the sums now alleged to be due to the pursuers by Cormack; and (5) that the defender was in ignorance of these extensions of Cormack's credit: Finds in law that by their extending Cormack's credit far beyond the period usual in their ordinary business, in the circumstances of Cormack, and in the trade in which they were engaged, the pursuers have liberated the defender from his obligations under the letter of guarantee: Therefore assoilzies the defender, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The letter of guarantee was quite unlimited in its terms. There was no reference to the course of business or of dealing either in Aberdeen or elsewhere. Custom of trade was a matter which was capable of precise proof, and none had been offered. Neither had any unreasonable credit been given. That was a relative term, and must be interpreted to mean what might fairly be regarded as within the contemplation of parties. But there was really no fixed period of credit proved in the trading in question. If there was it had not been exceeded, for it could not be said that the taking of bills at three months' date was at all exceptional or unreasonable. The case of Calder,¹ and Lord Shand's opinion there, were therefore in point. So far, at anyrate, as April 1890, when the account was closed, and the letter of guarantee came to an end, nothing had occurred which could be said to liberate the cautioner.² After that date it was to the interest of the cautioner that the creditor should take the best means he could of getting payment from the principal debtor, and of satisfying his debt. The taking of the two bills on the 26th September 1890 was designed with that intention. The creditor thereby constituted his debt, and was enabled to have the use of his money. In point of fact the bills were far extinguished when the bankruptcy occurred. Further, in order to succeed in his defence the cautioner must shew that in point of fact he was prejudiced by the action of the creditor, and he had not done so.

Argued for the defender;—Where as here there was no term of credit mentioned in the guarantee, the custom of trade must be imported to interpret the contract. The words "duly paid" clearly implied that. The appellants must prove, therefore, that they had not extended more than "the utmost credit allowed in ordinary circumstances."³ In the present case, the proof shewed that that meant, in the case of a customer who was not known, cash payments in one month,—if he was well known, three months' credit. But the creditor here had given a wholly unusual term of credit, because even admitting that the taking of bills prior to the closing of the account at three months was not an unreasonable extension of credit, the renewal of these bills certainly was. The case of Bingham and the *Croydon Gas Company*² were not in point, because in each of these the transactions which were the subject of the guarantee were held to be separable. But whether the defender was freed or not by the course taken by the pursuers prior to the closing of the account, the taking of the two bills on 26th September without his knowledge certainly released him. He was thereby prevented from taking action against the principal debtor, and it was not necessary that he should prove prejudice.¹ There was an Irish case² which appeared to be an authority against the defender, but the ground of judgment there appeared to be that the position of the surety was not wholly altered by the action of the creditor in taking bills from the principal debtor.

C. & A. Johnstone v.
Duthie.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The pursuers are wholesale merchants in Aberdeen, and the defender is a retail grocer there to whom they were in use to supply goods. He had two shops in Aberdeen, and in April 1888 he sold his business in one of them to his brother-in-law Cormack, who had been his manager in that shop.

In order to start Cormack in business, on 2d April 1888 the defender granted to the pursuers a letter of guarantee in the following terms:—"Gentlemen,—In addition to the account of £50 due by me to you for goods supplied to my shop at 50 Summerfield Terrace, I hereby guarantee and undertake to see you duly paid for all goods you may supply from and after this date to the order of J. R. Cormack, to whom I have made over my business there."

The pursuers supplied goods to Cormack under this letter of guarantee until the end of April 1890.

The usual course of dealing was that the account for supplies was rendered monthly, at the beginning of the next month, and squared at the beginning of the next succeeding month by a payment in cash, the balance being carried forward to the next month's account—thus, for example, the account for goods supplied in May was rendered in June, and settled, as I have stated, in July—Cormack, thus in all cases, getting a month's credit. Sometimes, however, bills generally at two months' date, but occasionally at three, were taken for the monthly balance due, and these bills were sometimes renewed, thus extending the credit to five or six months.

It appears that Cormack had become unsteady, and at the end of April 1890 the supplies to him under the letter of guarantee came to an end. The account was closed, and the defender was under no further liability under the guarantee, except for the balance due and unpaid upon that account.

The position which the defender took up at this time as to his liability under the guarantee is material, and is to be found in the correspondence between him and the pursuers, from which it appears clear that the defender at this time denied his liability under the guarantee, although upon a different ground from what now insisted in, and left it to the pursuers to take their own course for recovery of the amount. So far as I see he never departed from this position.

What followed was that Cormack paid for some time £10 a-week, and afterwards £5 a-week, towards reduction of the amount until 10th November 1890, leaving a balance then due of £137, 15s., which is the sum sued for.

On the 26th September, however, the pursuers took from Cormack two bills of three months' date for £99, 17s. 4d. and £70, 18s. 4d. respectively, in order, they say on record, to constitute and settle the amount then due by him to

No. 120. the pursuers, and also to enable the pursuers to have the use of the money by discounting said bills with their bankers.
Mar. 15, 1892. That that was so, there is no doubt, because Mr Alexander Johnstone, one of the pursuers, says,—“The payments went on till November 1890, when Cormack became bankrupt. The amount due by the defender is £137, 15s. At the date of Cormack's failure we had a claim for £12, 9s. 4d. for goods supplied after the arrangement had been made. There are two bills dated 26th September 1890 for £170 odds. These were taken to square up the account, and to make the account operative, so that we could have the use of our money from the bank by discounting the bills.”

C. & A. Johnstone v. Duthie.

It is in these circumstances that the present action has arisen.

The defender denies liability on the ground that it was an implied condition of the agreement that the pursuers should not allow Cormack credit exceeding one month beyond the month of supply, in accordance with custom in the grocery trade, but that, on the contrary, they had allowed him an unreasonable and excessive period of credit outwith the ordinary conduct of that trade.

The Sheriff-substitute has, in effect, sustained that contention and absolved the defender. He finds in point of fact that the ordinary period of credit allowed by the pursuers in the ordinary course of business with persons such as Cormack was about three months, and that they allowed him credit to such extent as five, seven, and twelve months, and he finds, in point of law, that by extending Cormack's credit far beyond the period usual in their ordinary business, they have liberated the defender from his obligations under the letter of guarantee.

It appears to me that the ground of judgment thus adopted by the Sheriff-substitute raises questions of doubt and difficulty, and while I do not say that I differ from him, I prefer to rest the judgment on another, and I think a clear ground of judgment also pleaded by the defender.

As I have already pointed out all transactions under the letter of guarantee came to an end in April 1890.

The account was closed, and the amount alleged to be due by the defender was then ascertained. It is true that the pursuers agreed that Cormack should make certain cash payments to account of the balance due. Whether this was with or without the consent of the defender does not appear to be material, because so far as I can see they did not thereby bar themselves from proceeding at any time to recover the amount due.

But the case is different with regard to the two bills at three months' date taken by them on 26th September 1890 for the balance of the debt then due. They could not have sued Cormack, the principal debtor, during the currency of these bills, and so they gave him time. It is not averred, and is not the fact that the defender consented to their taking these bills. He all along denied liability under the guarantee, and left the pursuers to take their own course.

But it is quite settled law that if the creditor gives time to the principal debtor the cautioner is free. Neither is it necessary for the cautioner to show that he has been thereby de facto prejudiced. The case of Samuel v. Horne, 1817, 3 Merivale, 272, is an example of that.

It is suggested, however, that where, as in this case, the cautioner denies liability, the creditor is free to take what steps he thinks best for recovery of his debt from the principal debtor, and may give him time without releasing the cautioner. But I know no authority for that proposition.

The creditor can only enforce the obligation he has received from the cautioner.

I do not see that the fact that the debtor in an obligation denies liability can at all alter or affect the extent of his obligation whatever that may be. No. 120.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the pursuers by taking the two bills of 27th September 1890 freed the cautioner from his obligations under the letter of guarantee, and that he should be assoilized.

Mar. 15, 1892.
C. & A. John-
stone v.
Duthie.

LORD M'LAREN.—I take a different view of the case, and the ground of my difference admits of being very briefly stated.

When a creditor supplies goods, or (as in the case of a bank credit) advances money, on a continuing guarantee, and the account is eventually closed, the creditor is neither bound to proceed according to the order of discussion, nor to make immediate intimation of his claim to the guarantor. If after the account is closed, and before intimation is made to the guarantor, the creditor grants indulgence, as by taking a bill from the debtor, this is held to be a proceeding contrary to the good faith of the contract of indemnity, and in respect of such breach of faith the guarantor is discharged.

But if the creditor while matters are entire intimates his claim to the guarantor, and the guarantor either repudiates his obligation, or refuses or delays to make payment, then I think that the creditor may make the best terms he can with his debtor, and by doing so does not lose his recourse against the guarantor. This exception, I think, results from the consideration that the defence founded on indulgence given to the debtor is not the effect of a condition of the contract of indemnity, but is a purely equitable defence, and one which, I think, cannot be maintained by a co-obligant who is refusing to perform his obligation. For these reasons, my opinion is, that the pursuers by taking a bill have not discharged their claim under the guarantee.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord Adam. I think it is settled law that a creditor who gives his debtor time without reserving his right against the cautioner, thereby discharges the latter. I do not think it is necessary to consider in the present case whether the cautioner was discharged by anything which occurred in the relations between the creditor and debtor prior to 26th September 1890, because I am of opinion that, by taking the bills he did on that date, the creditor gave time, which discharged the debtor. I agree with Lord Adam in thinking that a cautioner cannot be deprived of his right to found upon such a defence merely because he has been reluctant to admit liability under his guarantee, or has refused to pay when called upon. The reason why the giving of time discharges the cautioner is because he is thereby deprived of the chance of considering whether he will have recourse to his remedy against the principal debtor or not, and because it is then out of his power in point of fact to operate the same remedy against him as he would have had under the original contract. This right in the cautioner is one which in its origin perhaps may be founded upon equity, but I think it is strictly legal in its effect, and it is as clearly and effectually a condition of the contract of guarantee as if it was expressed in terms. I am unable to see why the cautioner should be subjected to a different liability from that for which he contracted. If he had done anything to deprive himself of his strict legal rights, the case might be different. But all he did here was to repudiate liability, and that upon a ground on which your Lordships have not, I think, finally decided against him. But whether that ground is good or bad, the effect of the denial of liability is merely to leave the creditor in the same position in which he was

- No. 120. before he intimated his claim against the cautioner. The latter has done nothing to prevent the creditor enforcing the claim. The only result which would follow from the denial of liability is that when the creditor comes to enforce his claim, the cautioner would have to submit to the consequences of putting the creditor to the expense of bringing an action. I am not aware of any ground by which, because of the refusal to admit the claim, he should be subjected to any different kind of liability from that for which he contracted.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred with LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal; recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff, dated 27th October 1891: Find that the defender, of date 22d April 1888, granted to the pursuers the letter of guarantee . . . by which he undertook to see them duly paid for all goods they might supply from and after that date to the order of J. R. Cormack: Find that the pursuers supplied goods to Cormack under the said letter of guarantee until the end of April 1890: Find that at that date all dealings under the guarantee came to an end, leaving a balance of account due by Cormack to the pursuers: Find that Cormack made to the pursuers various payments on account of the said balance due by him until the 10th of November 1890, at which date there remained a balance due by him of £137, 15s., which is now sued for: Find that on the 26th of September preceding the pursuers took from Cormack two bills at three months' each for £70, 18s. 4d. and £99, 17s. 4d. respectively for the balance of the account then due by him to them: Find in law that by doing so the pursuers barred themselves from enforcing payment of the debt due to them by Cormack during the currency of the said bills: Find that the pursuers thereby discharged the defender from his obligations under the said letter of guarantee, and therefore assoilzie him from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

MRS ELIZABETH DALYELL OR CORNWALL AND OTHERS, Defenders.

Succession—Condition—Real burden—Repugnancy—Process—Declaration.—The proprietrix of a heritable estate died leaving a mortis causa disposition of the estate to A and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to B and the heirs of her body, whom failing, &c., "under this declaration, burden, and condition that in the event of any part of the said lands and estate . . . that may remain unsold at my death being thereafter sold or disposed of or exchanged by any proprietor or possessor of the same, or adjudged, or attempted to be adjudged or carried away in any manner of way for his or her debt, that then and in any of these events there shall be paid out of the price of the lands . . . and when sold, or created a real lien and burden upon the same if they shall remain unsold, to and in favour of such of the children of F as may then be in existence, or to their heirs, equally to and among them, the sum of £10,000."

A, the institute, after succeeding under the destination, died, without heirs of his body, leaving a disposition of the estate to B for her liferent alimentary use only, and the heirs of her body in fee, whom failing, to C, a stranger to the original destination, and the heirs of his body, also strangers.

When B, who was a married woman, and had no heirs of her body, &c.

sixty-three years of age, one of the children of F brought an action against C for declarator that in consequence of A's disposition the provision in the original settlement in favour of the children of F had come into operation.

Held (1) that the action was not premature; (2) that the provision in favour of the children of F was effectual as a condition of the gift to A; (3) on a construction of the whole deed of the testatrix, that A had "disposed of" the estate and so had come under an obligation to create a real burden over it for £10,000 in favour of the children of F; and (4) that C and his heirs, as A's gratuitous disponees, were, on succeeding to the estate, under the same obligation.

MISS ELIZABETH DALYELL, daughter of Sir James Dalzell, Baronet, of 1ST DIVISION.
Binns, died in 1861, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 21ST Ld. Kyllachy.
November 1855, and codicils thereto, dated 12TH March 1860 and 3^D

By the trust-disposition and settlement Miss Dalzell, inter alia, directed her trustees to hold the estate of Binns for behoof of her brother, Sir William Cunningham Dalzell, in liferent, and on his death to dispoise, convey, and make over the said estate to and in favour of Robert Dalzell (a son of Sir William Cunningham Dalzell, and afterwards Sir Robert Dalzell), and his heirs, whom failing, to and in favour of Osborne Dalzell (another son of Sir William), and his heirs, but with and under this "declaration, burden, and condition, that in the event of any part of the said lands and estate of Binns and others that may remain unsold at the time of my death being thereafter sold or disposed of or exchanged by any proprietor or possessor of the same, or adjudged, or attempted to be adjudged, or carried away in any manner of way for his or her debt, that then and in any of these events there shall be paid out of the price of the lands . . . if and when sold, or created a real lien and burden upon the same if they shall remain unsold, to and in favour of such of the children of George Falconar of Carlowrie "as may then be in existence, or to their heirs, equally to and among them, the sum of £10,000 sterling; . . . and with this declaration, that in the event of a sale or exchange of any part of the said lands and estate of Binns and others that may remain unsold at the time of my death, or of the same being adjudged or attempted to be adjudged as aforesaid, the said bequest to the children of the said George Falconar, and their heirs, . . . shall then be real and preferable liens and burdens upon such parts and portions of the said lands and estate, . . . or upon the price thereof if sold: And all these burdens, conditions, and declarations shall be inserted in any conveyance whatever of the same to be made and granted by my said trustees or their foresaids, as above directed, and shall be appointed by them to be inserted in all future transmissions and investitures of the said lands and estate for ever, and shall be inserted in the instrument of sasine to follow upon said conveyance by my said trustees or their foresaids, which instrument of sasine shall forthwith be expedited, completed, and recorded by and at the sight of my said trustees or their foresaids, it being my most earnest wish and desire that the said lands and estate of Binns shall be preserved and maintained whole and entire, in lineal descent in my family, in all time to come, and my full intention to do all in my power to effect that object."

By her first codicil Miss Dalzell revoked the destination of the fee of the estate to Osborne Dalzell and his heirs, and, after declaring that the destination to the heirs of Robert Dalzell was to be understood to mean heirs of the body of Robert Dalzell, she called in succession to them Maria Christina Dalzell or Du Plat, a daughter of Sir William Cunningham Dalzell, and therefore a sister of Robert and Osborne Dalzell, and the heirs of her body, whom failing, Elizabeth Dalzell (afterwards Mrs

No. 121. Cornwall), another daughter of Sir William, and her heirs whatsoever, other than Osborne Dalyell, and his heirs, whom she expressly excluded from the succession.

Stewart v.
Wilkie.

By her second codicil Miss Dalyell revoked the foregoing ultimate destination to the heirs whatsoever of Mrs Cornwall, and in lieu thereof called the heirs of the body of Mrs Cornwall, whom failing, George Falconar of Carlowrie, and the heirs of his body.

After her brother, Sir William Cunningham Dalyell, Miss Dalyell's nearest heirs were his four children just mentioned, and their respective heirs of the body, and failing heirs of the body of the youngest of these children, Mrs Cornwall, the next in order of legal succession to Miss Dalyell was John Wilkie of Foulden, and the heirs of his body, and failing the Wilkies came George Falconar of Carlowrie, and the heirs of his body. The practical effect therefore of the two codicils was, that: whereas the original destination in the trust-disposition followed the legal order of succession to the testatrix, the destination provided by the codicils deviated from that order, in the first place, by excluding Osborne Dalyell and the heirs of his body, and, secondly, by preferring the Falconars to the Wilkies; and in the second codicil the testatrix explained that her reason for excluding Osborne Dalyell was her fear that, if he succeeded to the estate, it would be immediately dissipated, and that she had excluded Wilkie of Foulden because he had intimated his intention, should he succeed to the estate, of at once making it over to Osborne Dalyell, if alive.

Sir William Cunningham Dalyell, the liferenter under Miss Dalyell's settlement, died in 1865, and in April 1872 her surviving trustees, Mr Wilkie of Foulden and Sir Robert Dalyell, executed and recorded a disposition of the estate of Binns, in the terms and under the declarations and conditions of her settlement and codicils.

Sir Robert Dalyell, the institute under the destination, died unmarried in January 1886, having survived his brother Osborne and his sister Mrs Du Plat (both of whom died without issue), but being survived by his sister Mrs Cornwall. He left a disposition of the estate of Binns (dated in 1872, and recorded June 1886), in favour of himself and the heirs of his body, whom failing to Mrs Cornwall in liferent for her liferent alimentary use only, and the heirs of her body in fee, whom failing to John Wilkie of Foulden and the heirs of his body.

On 12th June 1891 G. M. Falconar Stewart of Binny the son and eldest child of George Falconar of Carlowrie (who had died in 1870), raised an action to have it determined whether this disposition by Sir Robert brought into operation the provision in favour of the children of George Falconar in Miss Dalyell's settlement.

The pursuer did not insist that Sir Robert's disposition in so far as it gave the estate to Mrs Cornwall in liferent and the heirs of her body in fee, had any such effect, but he maintained that the ulterior destination to John Wilkie and the heirs of his body was a disposal of the estate within the meaning of Miss Dalyell's settlement and codicils, seeing that under that settlement and codicils the estate was destined to the pursuer's father and the heirs of his body on the failure of Mrs Cornwall and the heirs of her body.

It was further not disputed by the parties that the case was to be taken on the assumption that the destination to the heirs of the body of Mrs Cornwall had failed, she being sixty-three years of age at the date of the action, and childless.

The persons called as defenders were James Wilkie of Foulden the eldest son of John Wilkie of Foulden (who had died in 1884), and John Dalyell Wilkie and his sisters, the other children of John Wilkie, together with Mr and Mrs Cornwall, and Frances Falconar and Helen Falconar or Collyer, the pursuer's sisters. No. 121.

The primary conclusions of the summons were, briefly, for declarator that the provision in Miss Dalyell's settlement relating to the £10,000 constituted a contingent real burden on the estate of Binns, which became absolute by the recording of Sir Robert Dalyell's disposition in 1886, although not exigible during Mrs Cornwall's lifetime. The Lord Ordinary and the Judges of the Inner-House were unanimously of opinion that there was no substance in this branch of the pursuer's case. The pursuer further concluded alternatively for declarator "that the defenders the said James Wilkie, John Dalyell Wilkie, Henrietta Eleanor Marie Wilkie, Harriet Charlotte Wilkie, and Eleanor Bruce Wilkie, or their heirs, are not, nor any of them, entitled to take possession of the said lands and estate of Binns and others, or any part thereof, or in any way to dispose thereof, or to burden the same, or take benefit under the said last mentioned disposition and settlement, without making payment to the children of the said deceased George Falconar, or to their heirs, of the sum of £10,000 sterling." Stewart v.
Wilkie.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The pursuer, as one of the heirs of the body of George Falconar, is, in virtue of the disposition of 1872 granted by Miss Dalyell's trustees, entitled to decree of declarator in terms of the first conclusion of the summons. 3. Sir Robert Dalyell having by the said disposition granted by him, recorded in 1886, disposed of the estate of Binns within the meaning of the said disposition by Miss Dalyell's trustees, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the remaining declaratory conclusions of the summons, or one or more of them. 4. The defenders the children of the deceased John Wilkie are not entitled to take benefit under the said disposition by the said Sir Robert Dalyell without making payment of the sum of £10,000.

The Wilkies alone lodged defences. They pleaded;—3. The pursuer is not entitled to decree in terms of any of the conclusions of the summons, in respect,—(1) That Miss Dalyell was not entitled to burden her estate with the provisions in favour of the children of George Falconar founded on by the pursuer; (2) esto that Miss Dalyell was entitled to burden her estate with the said provisions, they are not so expressed as effectually to burden the estate; and (4) that in any event the disposition, recorded on 23d June 1886, did not constitute a disposal of the estate of Binns within the meaning of Miss Dalyell's settlement and the disposition by her trustees dated 10th and 12th April 1872.

On 5th December 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that on the just construction of the trust-disposition and settlement and codicils of the deceased Miss Elizabeth Dalyell, and of the disposition by the trustees of the said deceased Miss Elizabeth Dalyell, both mentioned on record, the defenders James Wilkie, John Dalyell Wilkie, Henrietta Eleanor Marie Wilkie, Harriet Charlotte Wilkie, and Eleanor Bruce Wilkie, and each of them, and their respective heirs, are bound, on succeeding to the estate of Binns under the disposition and settlement of the late Sir Robert Alexander Osborne Dalyell, mentioned in the summons, to make payment to the pursuer, and the other children of the deceased George Falconar of Carlowrie, or to their heirs, of the sum of £10,000 sterling, or otherwise, in the defenders' option, to create over the said estate a valid real burden for that amount in favour of the said children of the said deceased George Falconar and their heirs: Therefore finds, declares, and decerns, in terms of the alternative conclusion of the summons, subject to the qualification that the defenders' obligation will be satisfied by their creating a valid real burden upon the estate in favour of the pursuer and the other children of the said deceased George Falconar for the said sum of £10,000: Quoad ultra assilizes the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns.”*

* “OPINION.— . . . In the first place, I do not consider that the pursuer has succeeded in shewing either that any real burden exists in his favour, or that there was any intention on the part of Miss Elizabeth that such real burden should be created. Miss Elizabeth does appear to have intended that, in certain events, the disponent or heirs-substitute succeeding to the estate should be bound to create certain real burdens over it, and particularly one in favour of the pursuer and his sisters. She appears also to have contemplated that her trustees should in some way make provision for certain real burdens emerging so as to affect the estate in certain events,—not including, however, any event which has yet occurred. But it is, I think, quite impossible to hold that any real burden was in fact constituted, or that Miss Elizabeth’s trustees would have been justified in constituting any real burden operative in the pursuer’s favour, in the event which has happened, of a gratuitous disposition of the estate to a stranger to the destination.

“Taking this view, I do not find it necessary to consider how far there is anything in the defenders’ point that a real burden cannot competently be constituted in connection with a contingent debt. Neither do I think it necessary to decide—what might be a question of more difficulty—how far it would be competent to disponent an estate under a real burden, which was not to be a real burden from the first, but only to come into existence on such a contingency as a sale or alienation of the estate. These are points more difficult than any with which I have to deal. Real burdens have, as we know, rules of their own. They require to be not only definite, but to be expressed in the most clear and perspicuous language; and while it may be, as the pursuer argues, that in a question inter heredes the intention of the truster, and not the language which her trustees have used, must form the rule, still, I cannot but feel that, even assuming the intention here to be in the pursuer’s favour, there would have been grave difficulties in his way if his case depended on establishing the existence of a real burden, such as would affect the estate on the defenders’ succession, and be good, e.g., in bankruptcy, and in a question with the defenders’ creditors or onerous disponents.

“But while against the pursuer on this part of his case, I have not been able to see a good answer to his second and alternative contention, viz., that the defenders, as gratuitous disponents of Sir Robert Dalrymple, must take the estate subject to the conditions and obligations to which he was subject, and are therefore bound, so soon as his disposition in their favour becomes operative, either to pay the pursuer and his sisters the £10,000 in question, or to execute such deeds as will constitute over the estate a real burden for that amount in their favour. That contention is quite apart from that with which I have been dealing. It is one thing to create a real burden; it is another thing to impose on the heirs of a gratuitous investiture a personal obligation to create such a burden, or pay a sum of money as the alternative of not doing so. There is here (I mean in the latter case) no technical difficulties. There is, so far as I know, no difficulty in imposing on a gratuitous disponent or his gratuitous successors any obligation which the granter may think fit to impose. Nor can I make any difference whether such an obligation is absolute or contingent, whether the contingency is a certain or uncertain event, or whether it depends on some act of the granter or on some outside occurrence. The obligation, if of course become valueless. It may become so by the grantee’s bankruptcy. But it cannot be defeated otherwise by any act of the grantee; and if imposed, I know no principle on which it should be denied effect according to its terms. The only question is whether, on the just construction of the grant, it was intended to be imposed.

“Now I do not think there is much room for doubt that, according to the just construction of Miss Elizabeth Dalrymple’s trust-deed, her brother (the de-

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) On the question whether No. 121.
 Miss Dalyell's settlement by itself created or imposed on her trustees the duty of creating a real burden in the pursuer's favour on the estate of Mar. 15, 1892.
 Binns the Lord Ordinary's judgment was well founded. What she con- Falconer templated was that in a certain event what she described as a real burden Stewart v.
 should be created; she did not contemplate a burden which should affect Wilkie.
 the lands from the first. Further, even if she did contemplate a burden which should affect the lands from the first it was a burden of a contin-gent nature, to come into operation only in a certain event, and a contingent obligation could not be constituted a real burden.¹ But (2) the ponsee) and his heirs-substitute after him were, in the event of their disposing of the estate, put under the obligation to pay £10,000 to the pursuer's family, or, what comes practically to the same thing, to create a real burden for that amount over the estate in their favour. It was not indeed suggested that the deed could bear any other construction. The only points made by the defenders on this part of the case were two; and I am not sure that they were pressed with much confidence.

"It was said, in the first place, that the word 'disposed,' occurring in connection with the words 'sold and excambied,' must be read as applying only to sales and excambions, and not as applying to gratuitous dispositions. I confess I see no reason for this restriction, which would plainly be inconsistent with, and indeed destructive of, the whole scheme and object of the truster. The word 'disposed' is, I think, really used as in contrast to 'sale,' and I see no meaning it could have except as applying to gratuitous dispositions. Moreover, the obligation which follows, viz., that £10,000 'shall be paid out of the lands if sold, or created a real burden on the lands if they should remain unsold,' while quite appropriate if directed against a gratuitous disponent representing the supposed disponent, would be quite meaningless if the only thing in view was sale or excambion. I put it to the defenders' counsel if they could suggest any meaning in that view, and they could suggest none.

"It was, however, said further, and this was really the defenders' main contention, that—it being the truster's declared object, as expressed in her trust-disposition, 'that the said lands and estate of Binns shall be preserved and maintained whole and entire in lineal descent in my family in all time to come,' and the defenders' family being nearer in the legal order of succession than the pur-suer's family, and being excluded from the succession, not by Miss Dalyell's trust-deed, but only by her second codicil—the disposition to the defenders by Sir Robert Dalyell was not a 'disposition' in the sense of Miss Dalyell's trust-deed, and did not carry with it the obligation to provide £10,000 to the pur-suer's family.

"In my opinion, this is not a sound view of the truster's settlement. The trust-disposition and codicils must, I think, be read together; and being so read, they prescribe a certain order of succession, which must be held to be the order of succession which it was the truster's ultimate intention to maintain.
 That being so, I do not think it possible to treat a disposition which carries the estate to persons outside that order of succession as being at all different in the sense of the settlement from a disposition in favour of a stranger.

"Altogether, I think the pursuer may obtain decree substantially in the terms of his second alternative conclusion. But I shall so express the interlocutor that the defenders' obligation will be satisfied either by payment of the money or by the creation of an effectual real burden over the estate for the amount.

"I should perhaps add that no objection was taken to the—in some views—hypothetical character of the declarator which the pursuer asks. Both parties concurred in asking a judgment defining their rights; and in the view that the defenders are probably at present fiars of the estate, subject merely to defeasance of their title on a practically impossible event, I see on the whole no sufficient reason why I should refuse to deal with the question which they have submitted for decision."

No. 121. Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding that the defenders, in succeeding to Binns, would come under an obligation to pay £10,000 to the pursuer and his sisters. In the first place, the condition which Miss Dalyell sought to impose on her disposition of the estate was void for repugnancy.¹ She had attempted to give a right of fee, and yet to prevent the fiars from exercising their ordinary rights as such. The only effectual way of accomplishing that was by a regular deed of strict entail. Miss Dalyell's settlement was really a device for entailing the estate without complying with the Entail Acts, the device being that of imposing a pecuniary penalty for the violation of the prohibitions against the sale of the estate and (as the pursuer maintained) the alteration of the succession to it. It was obvious that if such a device were sanctioned the prohibitions might be made absolute by fixing as the penalty a sum which exceeded the value of the estate. But, in the next place, the pursuer was in error in saying that Miss Dalyell's settlement prohibited the alteration of the succession to the estate. The term "disposed of" was synonymous with "sold," or at least was intended to cover the case of part of the estate being sold, or, if it referred to the alteration of the succession, it was meant to prohibit only the succession of Osborne Dalyell, which was the main object of the testator. It was said that it must mean alteration of the succession generally, because Miss Dalyell contemplated the condition being violated and yet that the estate should remain unsold, but what she provided for that event was the creation of a real burden, and, in that view, the person who was to create the real burden was the person who should alter the succession, i.e. Sir Robert Dalyell in the case which had occurred, and as he was dead, it was too late to enforce the condition. The defenders were under no obligation to create the real burden. What the pursuer contended for was a reserved obligation to burden, which was to be construed in the way most favourable to liberty, whereas a reserved faculty to burden was to be construed in the way most favourable for carrying out the power. In the cases cited on the other side in which obligations to burden had been enforced, it was clear who the persons intended to be bound were; that intention could not be said to be clear here. But further, assuming that Miss Dalyell in her original settlement intended to prohibit the alteration of the succession, that prohibition was to be read with reference to the reason assigned for making it, viz., her desire to preserve the estate in the line of the family descent, and as she herself had in her codicils deviated from that line, the prohibition against altering the succession was to be read out of the deed. At all events deviations from the succession ultimately provided by her were not to be held as alterations within the meaning of the prohibition, unless they brought in strangers to the family; but, so far from doing that, Sir Robert's disposition restored the succession to the proper line of the family descent.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The trustees in making the conveyance which they were directed to make on the death of Sir William Dalyell, the liferenter, ought to have created a real burden for £10,000 in favour of the children of George Falconar, and ought now to create such a burden. The language of the testator might not be perfectly appropriate, but in carrying out a testator's obvious intention trustees were bound to deviate from his language in order to carry out the end in view. Thus it was settled that while trustees who were directed to entail were not entitled to insert in the deed of entail a destination which could be protected under the Entail Acts, when the actual destination provided by the testator could not be so protected, they were bound in the deed of entail to use the appropriate clauses, although the testator's direction might be defective in that respect. It was not an objection to the efficacy of a real burden that it was only to come into operation on a certain contingency.¹ (2) But assuming that no real burden was intended to be created ab initio, the defenders were not entitled to take the estate except on condition of paying £10,000 to the pursuer and his sisters (as the Lord Ordinary had held), or at all events the obligation to create a real burden passed with the lands in the same way as a reserved faculty to burden passed, or being an obligation incumbent on Sir Robert, who had contravened the prohibition, passed to the defenders, his gratuitous disponees.² Such a condition was not void for repugnancy or as being a device to evade the Entail Acts. The condition was a condition of the gift, so that a person was not entitled to take the estate and not fulfil the condition. Nor was it easy to see what the Entail Acts had to do with the matter. If they prohibited what Miss Dalzell had directed to be done (but that was not maintained) then of course her direction would be ineffectual; but if they did not so prohibit, then there could be no question of a device to evade them. It was said, however, that Miss Dalzell did not intend to prohibit the alteration of the succession. But the words "disposed of" were presumably intended to have some independent meaning, and what the whole context suggested was that these words referred to the alteration of the succession, for she expressly contemplated the case of the prohibition being violated although the estate remained unsold, and it was difficult to believe that she did not intend to prohibit alteration of the succession when her declared object was to keep the estate in the line of the family descent. Nor did it make any difference that she herself subsequently provided a destination which did not wholly correspond with that of the strict line of the family descent, for her motive in making the alteration in the destination was truly ancillary to her main object of keeping the estate in the family, seeing that she believed that if it came into the possession of a particular member of the family it would have been at once sold, and hence she took measures to exclude that individual.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is implied in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and it is fully expressed in his Lordship's opinion that, in his judgment, no real burden at present exists in favour of the pursuer over the estate of Binns. The contention that Miss Elizabeth Dalzell by her trust-disposition and settlement either created such a real burden or intended that her trustees in their conveyance to Sir Robert Dalzell should create such a real burden, seems to me to be hopeless. I mention it now because this argument was revived in the debate before us; but the observations of the Lord Ordinary are very adequate for its disposal.

The Lord Ordinary has decided the case in favour of the pursuer upon his second or alternative contention, and I substantially agree in that conclusion. I

No. 121. think that under Miss Dalyell's settlement and her trustees' conveyance, Sir Robert Dalyell took the estate subject to the condition that in a certain event he should create a real burden for £10,000 in favour of the children of George Falconar. The title and interest to insist for fulfilment of that condition was conferred on those children; it was enforceable primarily against Sir Robert, but equally against his gratuitous disponees. The plain reading of Miss Dalyell's settlement is, that in the event of Sir Robert disposing of the lands (in the sense of the deed) he shall, at the same time that he disposes, burden them. Such an obligation, if incumbent on him, is prestable by his gratuitous disponees. No adequate objection was stated to the legal efficacy of such an obligation so imposed, and when enforced by the persons in whose favour it is imposed.

Stewart v.
Wilkie.

The question remains, whether the event has occurred in which Sir Robert became bound to create the real burden. Have the lands been "disposed of"? Here I entirely adopt the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary. The learned counsel for the defenders suggested several constructions of the words "disposed of" as satisfying them. But even assuming—what, in at least some instances, is doubtful—that the cases so put may fall under the words, that by no means supplies good ground for refusing to apply them also to a case to which they are applicable in their natural sense.

The conclusion therefore to which I come is that the event did occur of Sir Robert Dalyell disposing of the lands; that he was bound, in disposing of them, to create this real burden upon them; and that the obligation to create such burden is incumbent on the defenders as Sir Robert's gratuitous disponees, if and when they are vested in the lands.

The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor however does not seem to me precisely to meet this result; nor do I find in the summons, as it stands, any conclusion which accurately asserts this right of the pursuer. The summons (and of course I refer to the alternative conclusion) proceeds on the theory that the obligation incumbent on the defenders is to make payment of £10,000, instead of what it truly is, to create a real burden for that sum; and the Lord Ordinary has given a declaratory decree in terms of that conclusion, only qualifying it by declaring that the defenders may, if they like, create a real burden. In the finding by the Lord Ordinary, which precedes this decree, his Lordship makes the primary obligation to pay, and the optional alternative to create a burden. But the only obligation stated in the deeds mentioned in the interlocutor is to create a real burden, and although it is true that a solution of the obligation may be found in payment, that does not make payment the right of the creditor in the obligation. I do not think it is necessary to express this mode of solution in the declarator, and certainly not to make it the primary obligation declared.

I am afraid therefore that unless the pursuer amends his summons so as to ask a declarator that in the event stated the defenders are bound to create a real burden, we cannot give him a decree. But probably a proposal to amend will readily be made.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with your Lordship. The first deed which here requires examination is the trust-disposition and settlement of Miss Elizabeth Dalyell to Binns. By it Miss Dalyell directed her trustees to dispose and convey the lands and estate of Binns to and in favour of Sir Robert Dalyell and his heirs, who, failing, to Osborne Dalyell and his heirs, and the conditions under which the conveyance was to be made were that in the event of the lands being sold or disposed of, or excambed, or adjudged, or attempted to be adjudged, or carried away, then there should be paid out of the price of the lands if sold, or created "a real lien and burden upon the same if they shall remain unsold, to and in favour of such of the children of the said George Falconar as may then be in existence, or to their heirs, equally to and among them, the sum of £10,000 sterling." It is this clause which raises the question between the parties. The children now in existence of George Falconar claim in the circumstances either payment of £10,000 or that a real burden shall be created upon the estate by those who have succeeded to it, or who will be entitled to succeed to it.

No. 121.

Falconar
Stewart v.
Wilkie.

I concur with your Lordship that the meaning of the clause is that if the estates are sold, or if not sold, disposed of or excambed, that the seller, if they are sold, shall pay the sum of £10,000 to the children in existence of Mr George Falconar, but if they are not sold and remain unsold then the condition is that in that case the disposer who personally disposes of them shall create a real burden to that extent over the estates.

Miss Dalyell then goes on to give this reason why she made that provision,—
"It being my most earnest wish and desire that the said lands and estate of Binns shall be preserved and maintained whole and entire in lineal descent in my family." Her intention therefore was to prevent if possible the estates being sold or disposed of, and so taken out of the family, by laying that burden upon the party who should either sell or dispose of them.

Now, the destination in the trust-disposition was, as I understand, a destination in favour of the nearest heirs of Miss Dalyell who would have taken by law, but then by two codicils she makes this change. She desires her trustees to convey the estate in favour of Robert Dalyell—that was her eldest nephew—whom failing, to his sister Mrs Du Plat and the heirs of her body, whom failing to Elizabeth Dalyell, afterwards Mrs Cornwall, and the heirs of her body, and then comes "whom failing to and in favour of the within designed George Falconar of Carlowrie and the heirs of his body." The alteration of the destination was this, that there was an exclusion of Osborne Dalyell, the immediate younger brother of Robert, and the heirs of Osborne, and there was also an exclusion of Mr Wilkie of Foulden and the heirs of his body, although not by name. Mr Wilkie happened to be the next heir after Mrs Cornwall and the heirs of her body, so that the effect of the codicil was to bring in George Falconar of Carlowrie and the heirs of his body before Mr Wilkie and the heirs of his body. These were the changes operated by the codicils, and the reason why Miss Dalyell excluded Osborne Dalyell was this, as she tells us in the end of her codicil, that she thought that if the estate came to Osborne it would have been immediately dissipated. That was also her reason for excluding Mr Wilkie, and not any dislike or anything of that sort to Mr Wilkie himself, Mr Wilkie having intimated to her that if ever the estate came to him under the original destination he would take care that Osborne's family should get it. Therefore, to secure her intention of preserving the estate, she displaces the heir who she thought would, in point of fact, have dissipated it and the heir who, in point of fact, she thought would have enabled that heir to have dissipated it if he had come into it. I advert to this, because Miss Dalyell expressed as her reason for imposing the conditions which she did in her original settlement that she wished to preserve the estate in the lineal descent in the family, and it was said that the alteration subsequently made by Sir Robert Dalyell, which I shall afterwards consider, had not the effect of defeat-

No. 121. ing that intention, but on the contrary of fulfilling it, because the effect of the subsequent change was to replace Mr Wilkie where he was before, and so to that extent to carry out Miss Dalyell's intention by restoring the succession to the estate more in the line of lineal descent.

Mar. 15, 1892.
Falconar
Stewart v.
Wilkie.

Now, what followed upon that was, that after the death of Sir William Dalyell, who was entitled to the liferent of the estate, Miss Dalyell's trustees executed a conveyance of the estate in terms of her directions. Sir Robert had thus become vested in the estate, and what Sir Robert did, and what raises this question, was this,—By disposition and settlement dated in 1872 he conveyed the estate with a destination in these terms,—“I dispoñe to myself and the heirs of my body”—so far that was quite right—“whom failing to my sister Elizabeth Grace Dalyell, wife of Gustavus Charles Cornwall, secretary to the General Post Office, Dublin, in liferent for her liferent alimentary use only, and to the heirs of the body of the said Elizabeth Grace Dalyell or Cornwall in fee, whom failing to and in favour of my cousin John Wilkie of Foulden, in the county of Berwick, Esq., and the heirs of his body.”

Therefore the alteration upon the destination under which Sir Robert himself held the estate was that he deprived his sister Mrs Cornwall of the fee which was given to her, leaving her only a liferent, and he introduced Mr Wilkie into the destination, thereby cutting out Mr Falconar and his heirs from the succession. That accordingly was a destination not in terms of the destination which Miss Dalyell had provided by her trust-disposition and settlement and codicil.

Now, the question is—was that or was it not a disposition by Sir Robert of that estate contrary to the directions of Miss Dalyell? I think that it was anything but in the words of Miss Dalyell's settlement. It was a disposition not in terms of the disposition in her deed, and therefore it was a disposition with reference to which the condition was attached of paying £10,000, or creating a real burden upon the property therefor. The deed being a gratuitous disposition, which it was, it appears to me that the event which Miss Dalyell had provided for arose. That is my view of the case, and I think that is the only point in the case.

I am accordingly of opinion that the event has occurred, that Sir Robert did dispoñe the estate gratuitously, and that having done so he was bound to have created a real lien upon the estate. And I think it necessarily follows that Mr Wilkie and his children, if they shall ever succeed to this estate, which is not quite certain yet, as gratuitous dispoñees, are bound to fulfil the obligation which was imposed upon the party who dispoñed to them.

It was said that this was not a violation of Miss Dalyell's directions and intentions, because it was not a violation of the destination in the lineal descent. That is quite true, but I do not think that is the proper construction of the deed notwithstanding that the disposition of the estate was made to parties who were perhaps nearer in lineal descent. The question is, whether it was a disposition against the destination which Miss Dalyell had herself prescribed by the deed. I need not point out that Miss Dalyell was herself the first party to call Mr Falconar's heirs before Mr Wilkie, and so was the first party who violated her own wish and intention.

Upon these grounds I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree also with your Lordship. I do not think it at all doubtful that Sir Robert Dalyell has disposed of the estate by his conveyance:

the defenders in a different way from that in which Miss Elizabeth Dalyell's No. 121. trust-deed disposed of it; and I think it follows that the provision for that contingency which is contained in the latter deed has taken effect. I quite agree with your Lordship as to the meaning and legal effect of that provision. If the estate had been sold either by Sir Robert Dalyell or by any gratuitous disponee of his, the pursuer and the other children of Mr George Falconar would have been entitled to £10,000 of the price. So long as it remains unsold they have no immediate claim for payment of the money, but they have a right to require that, so soon as the estate comes into the hands of a disponee other than the heir who would have taken under Miss Dalyell's destination the sum of £10,000 shall be created a real burden upon the lands in their favour. I think a good deal of apparent difficulty which was introduced into the argument, and probably also the error which your Lordship has pointed out in the construction of the summons, has arisen from a failure to advert to the distinction between those two entirely different rights which the children of Mr Falconar are to acquire in different circumstances. The Lord Ordinary has observed that the obligation to pay £10,000, and also the obligation to create a real burden upon the lands to that amount come practically to the same thing. It may be that the distinction is of no practical importance so long as the lands on the one hand, and the debtor on the other, are equally good for the money, but the legal character and consequences of the two obligations are altogether different. There can be no doubt that personal obligations may be made real burdens, because all the conditions of a feudal grant which are so conceived as to affect not only the original grantee and his heirs but also all singular successors into whose hands accordingly the lands may come are quite properly called real burdens, inasmuch as they are carried with the conveyance of the lands themselves whether voluntary or judicial, so that no purchaser or creditor could take the lands except under burden of the conditions. But a real burden does not of itself import any personal obligation whatever, although it may be combined with a personal obligation if the granter so intends to secure it. The law is very clearly stated and laid down by Lord Stair, and has been illustrated by a series of very familiar decisions. Therefore when we find that under a mortis causa testament the disponee is directed in a certain event to make a real burden on the lands, we have to look to the terms in which that obligation is laid upon him in order to see whether they impose any personal obligation upon him or upon his successors. It appears to me quite impossible to read the clause here without seeing that there are no words that can possibly be construed into such an obligation in this case. On the contrary, there is to be a distinction very clearly indeed between the two different rights which are to arise to Mr Falconar's children in two different events. In the one case they are to have right to payment of the money, in the other case they are to have a security created in their favour over the lands. Now, if Sir Robert Dalyell had created such a burden upon the lands, or if his disponees when they come into their hands create it, the effect will be that their infestment will be so burdened that no voluntary deed granted by the proprietor so infest, and no real diligence by any creditor, could possibly come into competition with the claim of the creditors in the real burden; but these creditors have no personal action for payment of a sum of money against the proprietor of the lands. I therefore agree with your Lordship that it is impossible to give effect to the conclusion of the summons as it now stands. I think that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is substantially sound, and that if the

Mar. 15, 1892. I have only to add, with reference to an observation of the Lord Ordinary at Falconar the conclusion of his opinion, that I entirely agree with it, as I understand Stewart v. your Lordships also do, that there is nothing in what the Lord Ordinary de-Wilkie. scribes as being the hypothetical character of the declarator which the pursuer asks which ought to prevent the Court determining the rights in the present action. So long as the estate remains in the possession of Mrs Cornwall, no right can arise to the pursuer, because she takes the right which Miss Dalyell intended for her, subject only to the limitation to a liferent which the pursuer of course does not complain of. Until her death it cannot be known whether the destination of which they do complain, and of which under Miss Dalyell's deed I think they are entitled to complain, will take effect or not. But we are told that although that presents a difficulty, still practically the event upon which they will be excluded from the succession under Miss Dalyell's deed is not likely to occur. If that be so, and if it appears upon the death of Mrs Cornwall that there are no heirs of her body to take the lands, and that no such persons have ever existed, then it will appear also that there has never been anything to stand between the estate and Mr Wilkie and his heirs, and therefore it will follow that they are now in the position in which the deed of Sir Robert Dalyell placed them, although we cannot tell at this moment whether they are so or not. Therefore, as pointed out by your Lordship, there is no difficulty in giving the pursuer decree of declarator, if he can frame the conclusion in such a way as to square with his legal right.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

The following amendment was thereafter allowed to be made and was inserted as the first alternative conclusion of the summons, viz. :—"Or otherwise it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid that on a just construction of the trust-disposition and settlement and codicils by the said Miss Elizabeth Dalyell, dated respectively 21st November 1855, 12th March 1860, and 3d May 1860, and all recorded in the books of our Council and Session 26th April 1861, and of the said disposition by the said John Wilkie and Sir Robert Alexander Osborn Dalyell, as trustees foresaid, the defenders the said James Wilkie, John Dalyell Wilkie, Henrietta Eleanor Marie Wilkie, Harriet Charlotte Wilkie and Eleanor Bruce Wilkie, and each of them and their respective heirs on succeeding to the said lands and estate of Binns and others under the said disposition and settlement by the said Sir Robert Alexander Osborn Dalyell, or such one or more of them as shall so succeed, are bound to create as at and from the date of such succession over the said lands and estate a valid real burden for the sum of £10,000 sterling in favour of the pursuer and the defenders Miss Frances Henrietta Falconar and Mrs Helen Jane Falconar or Collyer, equally, and their heirs."

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the reclaiming note for the defenders against the interlocutor of Lord Kyllachy, dated 5th December 1891, and heard counsel for the parties, Recall the said interlocutor. Find that, on a just construction of the trust-disposition and settlement and codicils of the deceased Miss Elizabeth Dalyell and of the disposition by the trustees of the said Miss Elizabeth Dalyell both mentioned upon record, the defenders James Wilkie, John Dalyell Wilkie, Henrietta Eleanor Marie Wilkie, Harriet Charlotte Wilkie, and Eleanor Bruce Wilkie, and each of them and their respective heirs on succeeding to the said lands and estate of Binns and others under the disposition and settlement of Sir Robert Osborne Dalryell, recorded 23d June 1886, or such one or more of them as shall so succeed, are bound to create as at and from the date of such succession over the said lands and estate a valid real burden for the sum of £10,000 sterling in favour of the pursuer and the defenders Miss Frances Henrietta Falconar and Mrs Helen Jane Falconar or Collyer, children of the deceased George Falconar of Carlowrie, equally, and their heirs: Therefore find, declare, and decern, in terms of the first alternative conclusion of the summons as amended: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons as amended, and decern," &c.

PRESBYTERY OF GREENOCK, Defenders.

Burgh—Church—Minister—Stipend—Obligation to provide a "competent and legal stipend not under" a certain sum.—In 1741 the feuars of Greenock, then a burgh of barony, raised by a voluntary tax on malt a sum of £1000 as part of an endowment for the minister of a new parish they proposed to have erected. The managers of this fund lent it to the baron on heritable security, taking the bond payable to themselves in trust for the whole feuars and householders of the burgh, and of the new parish when erected, "for the special effect and purpose of being part of the benefice, and in trust that such erection being once legally made they shall denude themselves by assigning the bond in favour of the minister first settled and his successors in office" to the intent that the minister and his successors in office may receive the profits thereof. About the same time a contract was entered into between the baron and the feuars and inhabitants of the burgh by which the latter voluntarily assessed themselves in a certain duty on malt for fifteen years for the purposes of the new erection. The managers, as directed by the written instructions of the feuars and inhabitants, raised a summons of disjunction and erection in the Teind Court, setting forth that the erection of a new church was necessary, and was "desired by all the inhabitants, who have provided a sufficient fund for building a new kirk, and endowing a minister with a competent stipend not less than 950 merks of stipend, and 50 merks of communion elements" (together equal to £55 sterling), "towards which the pursuers have already laid out upon heritable security" the sum of £1000, "and have bound themselves by contract to pay a certain contribution yearly for fifteen years, which will be sufficient to complete a fund for the stipend, and to defray the expense of building a church," and setting forth, inter alia, the said deeds, and concluding for disjunction of a certain part of the old parish, and for declarator that a new church be erected, and that the managers of the fund and the feuars and elders of the new parish should have the patronage and power of disposing of the seats and uplifting the rents, "with this provision and condition always" that the heritors of the parish should not be liable for the stipend or the erection of the church, "but also that the baillie, feuars, and inhabitants of the burgh be bound and obliged not only to defray the expense of erecting" the church, "but also to provide the minister of the kirk" "with a competent and legal stipend not under 950 merks, with 50 merks for communion elements." On 15th July 1741 the Teind Court pronounced decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, the decree setting forth the comparance of and the consents of the heritors, and "that the pursuers' procurator for satisfying the Court that there was a suffi-

No. 122. cient sum for building and endowing the church," "as also for a competent stipend to the minister to be settled at the new church, produced" the bond for £1000, and the contract of assessment for fifteen years.

Peters v.
Magistrates of
Greenock.

By a charter of 1751 granted by the baron, the managers of the burgh funds, including those above mentioned, were erected magistrates and council of the burgh, with power to manage its funds and common good, and the set of the burgh was fixed and so continued till the passing of the Municipal Reform Act, 1833.

In 1767 the magistrates and council resolved to take payment of the £1000 in the bond, and to apply it towards payment of the town's debt, and to grant security to the minister of the new parish and his successors "for payment of the legal interest thereof in part of the modified stipend."

The magistrates and council continued to let the seats, and received the revenue thence derived. They paid the minister's stipend, which was originally £80, and which they from time to time raised by "gratuities" personal to individual ministers, till it reached a sum of £320, a sum of £120 being described as "legal stipend," and the remainder as "gratuity." In 1873 the magistrates and council adopted a resolution under which the minister was remunerated as follows, viz., he was to receive out of the seat rents (a) £120, and (b) the balance of the seat-rents after deducting so much of the cost of maintaining the church and manse as exceeded £50, the burgh paying such cost up to that limit.

In an action raised in 1891 by the minister against the Magistrates and Councillors of Greenock, held (1) that the decree of disjunction and erection embodied a judicial contract, to which the predecessors of the defenders were parties, and that it fell to be construed according to its terms; and (2) that on a just construction thereof the defenders were bound to provide the pursuer and his successors in office with a "legal and competent stipend suited to the circumstances of the time and the position and duties of the benefice," dis. Lord Young, who was of opinion that the pursuers of the action of disjunction were merely trustees holding certain funds for the benefice, and had no power to undertake any obligation except in regard to these funds, and that the magistrates had no liability beyond the trust-funds; and (2) that if there had been an obligation on the burgh ex contractu to provide a competent stipend not under 950 merks, a Court of law could not fix or enforce payment of a stipend beyond that sum.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

THE REV. DAVID SMITH PETERS, minister of the New or Mid Parish Greenock, raised an action against the Provost and Magistrates of the burgh of Greenock (calling also the Presbytery of Greenock for any right or interest they might have) for declarator "that the pursuer, as the minister serving the cure of the New or Mid Parish Church and district thereof, within the burgh of Greenock, was and is entitled to be furnished and provided by the defenders, and that the defenders were and are bound to furnish and provide the pursuer with a competent and legal stipend, to be paid out of the revenue of the burgh, or out of the other funds, property, and revenues held and enjoyed by the said Magistrates and Town-Council for the special use and behoof of the minister serving the cure of the said church and district, from the date of his ordination and induction to the said cure, and in all time coming, during his lifetime and serving the said cure."

The pursuer also concluded for payment to him, as minister serving the cure, of £320 per annum, from Whitsunday 1880 to Martinmas 1890 under deduction of all payments to account, and decree for payment to him, as such minister, "of the sum of £400 sterling per annum, as a competent and legal stipend from and after the said term of Martinmas 1890, or of such other sum, less or more, as in the circumstances shall appear to our said Lords a competent and legal stipend from and after said term, . . . beginning the first half-yearly payment at the term of Whitsunday 1891, . . . and so forth yearly and termly thereafter (but reserving the right of the pursuer and his successors in the said cure to apply for an increase of said stipend in the event of the stipend to be decerned for in the process to follow hereon at any time ceasing to be a competent and legal stipend).”

Peters v.
Magistrates of
Greenock.

There was also a conclusion for reduction, if necessary, of a minute of meeting of the Town-Council of Greenock relative to the pursuer's stipend, dated 2d September 1873, which is afterwards referred to.

The Mid Parish of Greenock was erected by decree of the Court of Teinds on 15th July 1741, and the pursuer's ground of action was that, according to the terms and meaning of the decree of erection and the prescriptive usage following thereon, the Magistrates of Greenock were liable in payment to the minister of a competent and legal stipend, and that the sums sued for were such stipend.

The facts relative to the erection and history of the church, as they appeared from the documents produced, were as follow :—

Prior to 1741 there was only one church and parish in Greenock—the old or West Parish. The village or town of Greenock was the burgh of the barony of Greenock, which barony was erected in favour of Sir John Schaw, of Greenock, by charter under the Great Seal, dated 11th July 1670.

By a charter granted by Sir John Schaw, his grandson, dated 30th January 1741, Sir John, on the narrative, inter alia, that “for the better government and management of the public funds allenarly that has arisen or may arise from any assessment laid on by the inhabitants of the said burgh, with my consent, on themselves upon all malt grounded at the milns of Westward Greenock, it seems just, necessary, and expedient that a certain number of proper persons with necessary power should be appointed for the management and administration of the said funds,” the baillie of the barony being always of their number, granted power to the feuars of Greenock to elect managers of the public funds belonging or which should thereafter belong to the burgh and barony from the voluntary assessment on malt, or other voluntary assessment consented to by him and his successors.

On 7th February 1741 Sir John, on the narrative that he had borrowed £1000 at Candlemas preceding, from the managers so elected, granted to them a heritable bond and disposition in security for the sum of £1000, to be paid to them “in trust for themselves and the whole other feuars and householders of the said burgh of barony, and of the new parish of Greenock, when the same shall be erected, in order to be applied for the special effect and purpose of being part of the benefice of the said parish, when, or in case it shall be erected, and in trust that such erection being once legally made the foresaid persons, or survivor of them, shall denude themselves by assigning and disposing the said bond in security to and in favour of the minister who shall be first settled in the said new erected parish, and to his successors in office in all time coming during the not redemption or until payment, to the intent that such minister and his successors in office may receive the rents and profits thereof during their respective incumbencies, and that the said rents thereof in time of vacancy may be uplifted and applied as accords of the law, and that the minister for the time being shall not have power to uplift or receive the principal sum above written without the consent of the persons above named, or major part of them, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the major part of the said survivors, and failing of them all, without the consent of the Procurator for the Church for the time being, and failing of him, without the consent of the Lord President of Session, or the King's Advocate or Solicitor, or the Dean of the Faculty of Advocates, for the time being, to the end that the said principal sum so uplifted and received may forthwith, or as soon as possible, be employed upon land or annualrent for the same uses . . .” together with the annualrent from Candlemas preceding. Sir John bound himself, in security of said principal sum and annualrent, to infest the grantees or the minister first settled in the parish to be erected, or his successors in office, in certain lands, and in an annualrent of £50, or such sum as should correspond to the said principal of £1000.

In May 1741 written instructions were given by the feuars, and sub-feuars and inhabitants of the burgh, to the managers, to prosecute a process of disjunction and erection of the new parish.

In June 1741 a contract was entered into between Sir John Schaw and the feuars and inhabitants of the burgh of Greenock whereby they voluntarily assessed themselves in a certain duty on malt for fifteen years to come, for the erection of the new parish.

Subsequent proceedings were narrated in the decree of erection which was obtained on 15th July 1741. The decree bore that an action had been brought in the Teind Court at the instance of nine persons (being the persons mentioned in the bond), “all feuars, for themselves and in name of the whole other feuars and inhabitants of the town of Greenock,” with concurrence of the Presbytery and of the Procurator of the Church of Scotland, against Sir John Schaw and other heritors and the minister of the old parish. That the summons set forth, that “whereas by the great increase of the town of Greenock of late years, in trade and people, and consequently of the paroch of Greenock, whereof the town is a part, the erection of the new kirk is become absolutely necessary for the greater success of the Gospell in that place, and is much desired by all the inhabitants thereof, who have provided a sufficient fund for building a new kirk and endowing a minister with a competent stipend, not less than nine hundred and fifty merks of stipend, and fifty merks for communion elements, towards which the pursuers have already laid out upon heritable security on the lands of Kirkmachaeall the sum of one thousand pounds sterling, and have bound themselves by contract to pay a certain contribution yearly for fifteen years, which will be sufficient to complete a fund for the stipend, and to defray the expense of building a church.” Further, that the summons narrated that the written consent of the whole heritors and feuars, and of the Presbytery, had been obtained, and concluded that the Commissioners should disjoin from the parish of Greenock part of the parish described in the summons to be called the New Church and Parish of Greenock, and that it should be found and declared that a new church be erected and a minister settled as the minister of the proposed new parish, and “that the baillie of Greenock and managers of the fund for building and endowing the said kirk, and the feuars and elders of the said new erected paroch for the time being, shall have in all time coming the sole and undoubted right of patronage of the said new kirk and the right of presentation and calling a minister to serve the cure thereat how soon the said kirk should be erected and accommodated for publick worship, and as oft in all time coming thereafter as any vacancy should happen, and of moddling and disposing the said church and hall seats thereof, and bounds within the same, and of setting and uplifting rents for the said seats, and of naming and appointing the beadies, &c. from time to time as they should think fitt, and of disposing during any vacancy of the fund which should be provided by them for a stipend to their ministers, or for communion elements, manse, or schoolhouse, with this provision and condition always, that the patron and others of the parish of Greenock should not be lyable for any expense of paying stipend to the minister of such new parish, or for building, upholding or repairing the kirk, manse, or schoolhouse thereof, or any other parochial burdens whatever, but should be free of the same in all time coming; but also that the baillie, feuars, and inhabitants of the said burgh be bound and obliged not only to defray the expense of erecting, building, and repairing such kirk, manse, and schoolhouse, and other parochial burdens, but also to provide the minister of the kirk so to be erected with a competent and legall stipend not under nine hundred and fifty merks, with fifty merks for the communion elements, payable at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, providing always that the benefice of the then present kirk of Greenock should not thereby be deminished in any sort, but that the same and right of patronage thereof should remain with Sir John Schaw and his heirs of tailzie for ever.”

Greenock.

The decree then set forth the production of, inter alia, the various deeds above mentioned “for instructing the points and articles of the libel,” and the granting of decree in terms of the conclusion of the summons. “Because after elapsing of the days of compareance . . . and thereafter upon the day and date of these presents, the said action and cause being called in presence of the said Lords, and both parties comparing by their prors. foresaid, and the said pursuer’s pror. having produced ut supra, repeated the lybell and consents lybelled on, and craved decret in terms thereof, and for satisfying the Court that there was a sufficient fund for building and enduing the church to be erected, as also for a competent stipend to the minister to be settled at the new church, produced an heritable bond and infestment by Sir John Schaw of Greenock to the pursuers for the prinll. sum of £1000, as also a contract betwixt Sir John Schaw and the pursuers, whereby they assess themselves in a certain duty on malt yearly for fifteen years to come to be applied to the purposes aforesaid. Whereupon the pror. for the defenders consented to the disjunction and erection lybelled, with and under the condition and provision contained in their consent produced. Which debate above written being considered by the said Lords they decerned in the disjunction and erection lybelled, conform to the conclusion of the lybell, with this condition”—(Here followed the condition exempting the heritors and teinds from liability).

In 1742 the first minister was appointed.

In 1751 an Act was obtained for imposing for thirty-one years a certain duty on ale and beer brewed for sale or imported into Greenock, the proceeds of which were to be employed for various public purposes, and, inter alia, the building of the harbour, building of a new church, town-house, &c. The managers of the burgh funds were appointed trustees under the Act for these purposes.

In September 1751 Sir John Schaw, as baron, granted a new charter, giving power to the feuars to elect as magistrates and councillors the nine trustees under the Act, with power to manage the funds and common good of the burgh, in place of the nine managers appointed by the previous charter. The set of the burgh was fixed by this charter.

On 7th November 1758 Lord Cathcart granted to the Magistrates and Council, managers of the funds of the town of Greenock, a feu for the church and manse, and declared “the right of setting the seats and managing and disposing of the fund thence arising” to be in the said Magistrates and Town-Council, burdened always with feu-duty and the expense of repairs of church and manse.

The church was not completed till in or about 1761. The church cost £2388, of which £1058 was obtained from subscription, and the remainder was paid by the burgh. Prior to 1761 the congregation worshipped in a temporary place of meeting. The Magistrates and Council, from the date

No. 122. of the completion of the church, let the seats and paid the stipend of the minister.

Peters v.
Greenock.

On 11th August 1767, the Council considering that they had previously agreed to receive payment of the £1000 secured for payment to the minister of the Mid Parish as at Martinmas 1767, and that they intended "to apply the sum towards payment of the town's debt, and to grant a security for payment of the legal interest thereof in part of the modified stipend," gave directions, inter alia, to have a scroll of the security to be granted to the minister prepared and laid before the Procurator of the Church, and laid thereafter before the Presbytery.

A minute of 10th December 1767 narrated that the Council had received the £1000 and discharged the bond, and ordained the treasurer to pay certain debts therewith and the remainder to the town's credit.

The minimum stipend of 950 merks, with 50 merks for communion elements, was equivalent to about £55, 11s. 1½d.

From minutes of the Town-Council of Greenock, which were produced, it appeared that the stipend had been fixed in 1742 at the sum of £80, being an advance of £24, 8s. 10½d. on the minimum. It was raised to £100 in 1766,* to £125 in 1796, to £180 in 1800, to £220 in 1803, to £270 in 1808, and to £295 in 1812. It was reduced in 1843 to £220, but again raised to £320 in 1861,† and it stood at this last sum until 1873, when the resolution quoted below was adopted. These successive aug-

* The minute of the Town-Council of 26th May 1766 bore :—"The meeting, considering that the present stipend payable by the town to the said Mr Shaw, including the legal stipend and expense of communion elements as ascertained by the decret of erection, and gratuity of £24, 8s. 10½d., agreed to be paid by the then managers of the town of Greenock to him by their Act of Sederunt dated the 6th day of August 1742, amounst in whole to eighty pounds sterling, which the meeting being sensible is not now equal to the annual expense of the said Mr Schaw's family owing to the great increase upon the price of vivers of all kinds within the town for some years past, and that by the great increase of the town within these few years the said Mr Shaw's labour is consequently increased; and the Magistrates and Council being fully convinced of these facts, and the reasonableness of making an additional appointment to the said Mr Schaw living, so as to enable him to support his family supportably and with decency they therefore unanimously agree to pay to the said Mr John Schaw yearly, and each year during his incumbency allanarly, an additional gratuity of twenty pound sterling, commencing from the term of Whitsunday last, out of the first and readiest of the town's revenues, which sum now granted, with the aforesaid legal stipend and gratuity, makes the yearly stipend amount to £100 sterling, now payable to the said Mr John Schaw, but in which is included the fifty merk for communion elements. . . ." The minute contained a clause stating that "this additional gratuity" should not be binding longer than during Mr Schaw's incumbency allanarly.

† Minute of 4th January 1861.—"1st, That seeing the legal stipend attached to the New or Mid Parish does not exceed, with the allowance for communion elements, the sum of £120, and that the church and parish are now vacant and considering that such stipend, with the allowance for the elements, is not such as can now obtain the services of a suitable minister for the proper discharge of the duties attached to the cure, the Council agree that an additional sum of £200 should be allowed to the next incumbent, such additional allowance to be continued during the period he shall hold the cure of the parish. 2d, That the town-clerk be authorised to secure the Corporation or others liable in the payment of the stipend against the liability of paying more than the legal stipend, with the allowance for communion elements, and if he see proper, to consult counsel, so that the Corporation may be properly guarded against any further or additional stipend than the legal stipend attached to the church and parish."

‡ Minute of 2d September 1873.—" . . . That the Town-Council resolve . . .

mentations were always qualified by a declaration that they should be personal to the successive incumbents, and should not import an obligation to continue the same to their successors.

After the date of the resolution of 1873 the minister received out of the seat-rents (a) £120, and (b) the balance of the seat-rents after deducting such cost of maintenance and repairs on church and manse, as exceeded the average £50 paid by the Magistrates and Council under the resolution of 1873.

A vacancy occurred in 1877, and in that year the pursuer was elected. The total amount received by him during the first year of his incumbency was, besides the manse, £385, for the second £355, and for the third £347. From the receipts granted to the chamberlain of Greenock it appeared that of these sums £120 in each year was paid as "legal stipend," and the remainder as "balance of seat-rents . . . granted by the Town-Council as a supplement to the legal stipend of Mid Parish, personal to the presentee, all conform to the resolution of 2d September 1873, and such supplement is in no way to be held as constituting a claim for the same or any similar allowance for the said Town-Council."

The minister having subsequently declined to grant receipts in these terms except under protest, the Magistrates refused to make the payments. The minister raised the present action in 1891.

The pursuer averred ;—(Cond. 7) "The pursuer, as minister of said New or Mid Parish Church, is legally entitled to receive from the defenders a fixed yearly stipend of competent and adequate amount, regard being had to the circumstances existing at the time. For the period from Whitsunday 1880 to the present time the amount of said competent and legal stipend is the sum of £320 per annum, being the sum modified when the last augmentation of a fixed stipend took place in 1860. The said stipend was barely adequate at the time when it was fixed. Since it was fixed thirty years ago, the cost of living has become much greater, the population of the said New or Mid Parish has largely increased, and the demands on the time and energy of the minister have been extended in many ways. A competent and legal stipend, in view of existing circumstances, amounts to not less than £400, and accordingly the pursuer seeks to have his stipend for the future modified at that sum. The defenders have ample funds available for augmentation of the pursuer's stipend."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) According to the terms and meaning of the decree of disjunction and erection of the New or Mid Parish Church of Greenock, and to the usage and prescriptive use and enjoyment following thereon, the defenders, as representing the community of the burgh of Greenock, are liable in payment of a competent and legal stipend to the pursuer as minister of the said church. (2) The pursuer is entitled to decree for payment of the stipend of £320 first concluded for, from the term of Whitsunday 1880 to Martinmas 1890 that the legal stipend and communion element money payable to the next incumbent shall be £120 per annum, with the use of the manse, and that the presentation shall contain an obligation to pay the next incumbent, as a supplement personal to himself, the balance of the seat-rents which may during his incumbency be competently levied, after providing for that stipend and communion element money, and for the cost of the maintenance of the church fabric and manse, and for the necessary repairs and alterations thereupon, and similar charges, so far as such cost may exceed an average amount of £50 a-year; but it is hereby declared that this obligation shall not infer any warrandice, but shall only confer upon the incumbent right to the balance of such seat-rents as the Town-Council are legally entitled to levy."

Peters v.
Greenock.

No. 122. (under deduction of the sums paid to account), in respect that the same was not more than a competent and legal stipend, and was recognised and paid as such to the pursuer's predecessors in the cure from the year 1860 to 1873. (3) The pursuer is entitled to decree for payment of the stipend of £400 second concluded for, from and after Martinmas 1890, in respect that the same is a competent and legal stipend in the circumstances condescended on. (4) The resolution adopted by the defenders on 2d September 1873 having been, in the circumstances stated, ultra vires and illegal, the pursuer is entitled to reduction of the minutes of the defenders' meeting at which the said resolution was adopted, in so far as necessary to give effect to the other conclusions of the action. The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (3) The pursuer having been paid, or tendered, sums exceeding the whole sums due to him in name of stipend, the defenders should be assolizied. (4) The sum which the defenders are legally bound to provide to the pursuer, as minister of the New or Mid Parish, in name of stipend and communion elements, not being in any view more than £120 per annum, and the stipend paid, so far as in excess thereof, having merely been voluntarily paid out of the common good, in the discretion of the Magistrates and Council for the time, the action cannot be maintained. (5) It is incompetent to augment the stipend of the pursuer out of the funds of the burgh. (6) Separatim, The Court of Session has no jurisdiction to augment the pursuer's stipend. (7) The resolution of the Town-Council of 2d September 1873 which is sought to be reduced having been competent and legal, et separatim, having been for the interest of the pursuer and of the benefice, the defenders ought to be assolizied from the reductive conclusions.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 23d June 1891, pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds that the obligation libelled contained in the decree of disjunction and erection, dated 15th July 1741, is binding on the defenders : Finds that upon a just construction of the said obligation the defenders are bound to provide the pursuer and his successors in the New or Mid Parish Church of Greenock with a legal and competent stipend suited to the circumstances of the time, and the position and duties of the benefice : Therefore finds, declares, and decerns in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons : Quoad ultra appoints the cause to be enrolled that parties may be heard as to the petitory conclusion and reserves all questions of expenses ; grants leave to reclaim." *

* " OPINION.— . . . The decree of disjunction and erection of 1741 must, I think, be read as expressing a judicial contract, to which the predecessors of the defenders were parties, and under which the church of the New or Mid Parish of Greenock was erected by the Court of Teinds. It is therefore a document which, at least upon the parties to it, was and is binding according to its terms, and which requires to be construed on the same principles as any other contract. Accordingly, the first question is, What is the true construction of the obligation contained in the decree whereby the predecessors of the defenders became bound, inter alia, 'to provide the minister of the new church to be erected with a competent and legal stipend not under 950 merks, and fifty merks for communion elements, payable at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions' ?

" Now, in considering that question, it becomes important to keep in view that the predecessors of the defenders who undertook the above obligation did so, not gratuitously, but for more or less onerous considerations—(1) They received a sum of £1000 sterling, provided by the principal heritor, or raised by voluntary contribution, and which sum, it is admitted, although originally put out on bond, was subsequently mixed with the town's funds and applied to . . .

general purposes ; (2) they further obtained the patronage of the new church ; and (3) they obtained the right to levy and appropriate the whole of the seat-rents, or at least to appropriate so much of them as was not required for the repair and upkeep of the fabric. In return they became bound to provide the minister with 'a legal and competent stipend,' not under the sum mentioned, which, including communion elements, amounted when converted into sterling money to £55, 11s. 1½d.

"In these circumstances I find difficulty in adopting either of the constructions of the decree which were at the debate suggested by the defenders. I do not, for example, think it is possible to hold that the obligation undertaken with respect to the stipend was limited to the minimum of £55, 11s. 1½d., and that anything beyond that was to be in the discretion of the defenders' predecessors. If that had been meant, it would, I think, have been expressed, and it is in my judgment scarcely conceivable that it should have been meant, seeing that the sum in question—£55, 11s. 1½d.—did little more than represent the income of the £1000 which, as I have said, the defenders' predecessors received and spent. Nor would it, I think, have been altogether consistent with the onerous character of the contract that the debtors in the obligation should have been made the judges of the amount which they should pay. It is, perhaps, a more feasible proposition that a legal and competent stipend was to be fixed once for all, and that the parties to the contract being satisfied with the stipend as originally fixed, there was no room for recurring augmentations. But if the stipend was to be fixed once for all, one would have rather expected that it would have been so fixed in the decree. And on the other hand it can, I think, scarcely be doubted that a stipend to be modified from time to time, according to circumstances, was not only more in accordance with the language used, but also much more in accordance with the nature of the transaction, and with the probable requirements of the Court of Teinds,—not to speak of the elastic character of the revenue to be drawn by the town from the seat-rents.

"It is, moreover, I think, impossible in this connection to disregard the usage which has followed on this decree for upwards of a century. The stipend appears to have been fixed in 1742 at the sum of £80, being an advance of £24, 8s. 10½d. on the minimum. It was raised to £100 in 1766, to £125 in 1796, to £180 in 1800, to £220 in 1803, to £270 in 1808, and to £295 in 1812. It was reduced in 1843 to £220, but again raised to £320 in 1861, and it appears to have stood at this last sum until 1873, when the new arrangement now complained of was sought to be made, and the present dispute may be said to have arisen. No doubt—as set forth in the defenders' statement—these successive augmentations were always qualified by a declaration that they should be personal to the successive incumbents, and should not import an obligation to continue the same to their successors. But no augmentation once granted was ever in fact withdrawn, except in 1843, and then only to the extent which I have mentioned, and the later minutes from 1843 onwards contain regularly an acknowledgment that to the extent at least of £120 the stipend was a legal stipend for which the town was bound. How this last sum was reached does not appear, but it will be observed that it at least exceeds considerably the original stipend, and is not therefore consistent with the contention that the original stipend satisfied the town's obligation under the decree.

"I appreciate the argument that this is a case of contract, and not of trust, and that there is always a certain presumption against an obligation which is indefinite, and involves a reference to the Court from time to time. I observe also, on referring to the decree itself, that it appears to have been at least anticipated that a sum should be raised by a voluntary tax continuing for fifteen years, sufficient (with the £1000 already raised) to build the church and provide completely for the stipend. But it does not appear how far this tax was levied, or what it produced ; nor has it been suggested that by reference to this tax the means exist for now defining the stipend. In truth, the uncertainty of this

No. 122. been, to hold themselves bound in £120 per annum as stipend. That
 Mar. 16, 1892. was more than double the proceeds of the original £1000. With regard Peters v. source of income was, I think, not improbably the reason why the parties to Magistrates of the disjunction and erection, including the Court of Teinds, thought it necessary, Greenock. instead of resting satisfied with a prospective endowment, to impose on the town in general terms the obligation to provide a legal and competent stipend.

"I am, on the whole, therefore of opinion that the defenders' predecessors came under an enforceable obligation to provide such a stipend to the minister as should be legal and competent according to the circumstances of the time—the amount, in case of dispute, being from time to time fixed by the Court, and I am greatly fortified in this opinion by being able to appeal to so excellent an authority as a judgment of the late Lord Wood. I refer to his Lordship's judgment (practically acquiesced in) in the case of Cesar v. The Magistrates of Dundee, June 9, 1848, and reported in 20 D. 859. The obligation in that case was in terms identical with the present, and was contained in a similar decree of disjunction and erection. It was granted by the Magistrates of the burgh of Dundee, and its construction having come into question under circumstances very similar to the present, Lord Wood pronounced the following interlocutor:—'Finds that the sum of £105 which was originally fixed as the amount of stipend to be paid to the minister of the Cross Church of Dundee, of which the pursuer is now the incumbent, was thereby made the permanent amount of the stipend for that charge in all times thereafter, so that the obligation imposed on the burgh by the decree 1788 was exhausted as regarded the amount of the stipend which could be claimed from the burgh, and all demand for any increase absolutely excluded, however inadequate the sum might subsequently, under existing circumstances, come to be for the support of the clergyman for the proper discharge of his duties, and for the maintenance of his position in society, and therefore to that extent repels the defences and decerns, and before further answer appoints the cause to be enrolled.' A similar judgment was pronounced in the action which shortly followed at the instance of the other ministers of Dundee against the magistrates, reported in the same volume of Dunlop; but the question there was as to the administration of a trust, not as to the enforcement of a contract, and accordingly it is not of course a precedent of equal authority.

"It remains only to consider whether the obligation undertaken in 1741 by the baron bailie and feuars of Greenock has now transmitted to the defenders. I confess I do not think that this can well be doubted. Greenock was up to 1832 only a burgh of barony, but between 1742 and that date it had gradually acquired a municipal constitution, and there can, I think, be no doubt that the managers of the burgh previous to 1832, and the Magistrates and Town Council since that date, have accepted the position of representing their predecessors and adopting their obligations. They have all along paid the stipend in question, and performed the other obligations imposed by the decree of disjunction and erection; and they have, on the other hand, drawn the seat-rents and taken the benefit of their predecessors' funds, including the £1000 in Sir John Schaw's bond. They seem also to have exercised up to 1874 the patronage which was by the decree granted to their predecessors, and altogether I do not think that the case can be taken otherwise than as if the present Magistrates and Town-Council had been the municipal authority in 1741, and, indeed, do not gather that this was seriously disputed at the debate.

"I propose, therefore, to pronounce the following interlocutor (supra).

"If the parties cannot agree, it will be for after consideration how and what principles the amount of stipend shall be fixed. It may be that the stipend fixed in 1861 may form a standard, or it may be (though I should deprecate such a result) that some inquiry may be necessary. As at present advised, however, I do not see that any inquiry is necessary as to the funds of the burgh. In the view I have expressed, this is not an action for administering a trust, but for constituting a debt; and decree must therefore go out as for any other debt, without reference in the meantime to the circumstances of the debtors.

No. 122.

to what exceeded that, their position was that they could lawfully pay to the minister out of the common good, whether the seat-rents or not, a sum in their discretion.¹ This they had done, and the documents shewed that the pursuer's income had never fallen below £263, 17s. 2d. in any year. But the usage and the terms in which every addition had been made established that all beyond the legal stipend was voluntary addition, and indeed it would have been ultra vires for them to bind themselves. It was said that they were bound to add to the stipend whatever the Court might think fit, to make it "legal and competent," according to the circumstances of the time, or, in other words, that the Court of Session was to give the pursuer an augmentation—indeed, any number of them. That must either be because of contract or trust. If it were the latter, the Court would only interfere if a breach of trust were shewn. So long as the matter remained in the discretion of the defenders as trustees, the Court had no jurisdiction. It was true that the original £1000 was long ago spent, but the defenders had been paying the proceeds and much more out of their revenue. At all events, if that was a breach of trust, it fell to be answered by the representatives of those who committed it. The minister could not maintain that the seat-rents were a trust for him. But both the Lord Ordinary and the pursuer took the view that the case was one of contract, and that the town of Greenock had undertaken an obligation capable of indefinite expansion according to the view of a Court of law. The obligation was to pay "a competent and legal stipend not under" 950 merks. According to the ordinary principles of construction the 950 merks gave a measure of taxing the obligation. It was to be observed that at the date of the decree (1741) the law was understood to be that new augmentations could not be granted. It was not till the case of *Mitchell*² that these were introduced. At all events, an obligation so imposed did not import an indefinitely increasing obligation. Indeed, the administrators of a public fund could not lawfully undertake such an obligation. It would be contrary to the principle of the law which restrained them from alienations.³ It was said on the authority of the case of Cæsar, quoted by the Lord Ordinary, that the funds of the burgh could be made available for this increase of stipend as for a debt. But that was an Outer-House decision. The case was subsequently compromised. And it was very worthy of notice that when the decision was before the Inner-House in one branch of the relative litigation about the funds of Queen Mary's Hospital in Dundee,⁴ the Inner-House expressed the view that the increase the pursuer there was found entitled to was to be paid not out of the ordinary funds of the burgh but out of the hospital funds. That deprived the case of Cæsar of most of its supposed importance.

The only fund for an augmentation was teinds. Burgh ministers had no teind, and therefore even in the Teind Court could not bring an augmentation.⁵ If any were to be given it must be because a trust-fund was shewn, as in the case of the Presbytery of Dundee.⁴ The expression "legal and competent" stipend was too vague to justify the demand for augmentation. The pursuer surely had one. Even if he had only the £120 and a manse, that was more than the minimum of a competent and legal stipend, which, under the Act of 1844, enabled the Church Courts and the Teind Court to establish a quoad sacra parish.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was clearly settled that common good could be employed in augmenting the stipend of a minister of a burgh of barony. Kindred cases had been decided on the subject of education. If this case were to be regarded as one of trust, the principle of the case of the Probytery of Dundee applied. But it was truly a case of contract. The defenders' predecessors had received £1000 and a right of patronage, and had undertaken to provide a "legal and competent stipend." That it was to be not under a certain sum did not shew it was not to be much over, if that were needed to make it "competent." It must be "competent" according to the circumstances of the time. Lord Wood's judgment in Cesar's case, 20 D. 859, was sound in its reasoning, and was directly in point to that effect. If this were a case of obligation it did not matter that the defenders said they had no power to assess the inhabitants to fulfil it. Even if it were true that they had expended their available common good, or some of it, on other purposes, that would not hinder decree going out against them. Such arrangements as were made at the erection of this parish were frequent in last century, and quite competent.¹ The appeal must be to a Court of law, because it was a question, not of teinds, but of a particular contract. The town had spent the original fund, but the obligation remained!

The usage shewed the construction the defenders' predecessors put upon the expression "competent" stipend. They had always tried to make it suit the circumstances of the time. It was in vain that they had introduced saving clauses in doing so.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review should be affirmed, and I concur in the views expressed by his Lordship in the opinion he has given. Had nothing been argued before us beyond what seems to have been argued before the Lord Ordinary, I should have contented myself with simply expressing my concurrence in the judgment which has been pronounced, for I could not add usefully anything to what the Lord Ordinary has said. But two questions were submitted by the reclaimer in argument before us with which the Lord Ordinary has not dealt, and with regard to each of them I think it right to make one or two observations. The first of these questions is, whether the obligation in question was not ultra vires of the persons who undertook it, and if so, whether it is binding on the defenders! The Lord Ordinary has pointed out that the defenders now represent the persons who in 1741 (the date of the obligation) had the management and administration of the municipal affairs of Greenock, and therefore the defenders will be liable for the due fulfilment of the obligation if it was validly contracted. I see no reason for doubting that the obligation in question was one which it was within the power of those representing the inhabitants of the burgh at the time to grant or undertake. Such obligations appear not to have been at all unusual about the middle of last century. Several examples are given by Connell of similar obligations granted under similar circumstances and for a like purpose (Connell on Parishes, 86, et seq.); and Erskine (i. 5, 23) speaks of them as one of the modes by which provision may be made for the stipend of the minister of a newly erected church "either where there are no tithes, as in boroughs, or where the tithes have been already exhausted." The question whether a burgh or the representatives of a burgh could not validly grant such obligations does not seem to have been at all questioned in the times of the authors I have cited. But the question was distinctly raised in the case of the Magistrates of Kilmar-nock v. Aitken, 11 D. 1089, where it was held that an obligation similar in all its important features to that now under consideration was not ultra vires of the magistrates of the burgh who undertook it. There is no authority to the contrary, and that being so, I take it to be settled by authority that the obligation in question was not ultra vires of the granter.

Greenock.

The second question argued before us was, whether it was competent to the defenders to pay the pursuer's stipend out of the common good of the burgh? Now, that question was also decided—and decided in the affirmative—by the case of Aitken, above cited. And it is difficult to see how any other conclusion could be reached. If the obligation was one which the magistrates of a burgh could validly grant, it is only out of the property of the burgh that the obligation can be met. The obligation does not bind the magistrates personally; it binds that which in their official capacity they are administering.

Another view was suggested in the course of the argument, if not maintained, to the effect that the obligation now sued on is in itself not a valid or lawful obligation, or one which the Courts of law would or were bound to enforce. This view, as I understand, proceeds upon the consideration that the obligation in question is one for an uncertain—that is, an unfixed—amount which may vary from time to time. After the best consideration I have been able to give this matter, I am unable to concur in this view of the obligation before us. I am disposed to regard the obligation as one the extent and quality of which is quite fixed and determinate. It is to provide a "legal and competent stipend." The value or extent of that obligation in money may vary with circumstances, but the obligation does not vary. It is an unvarying obligation to provide a certain thing each year, but which may cost more or less each year as circumstances change. An obligation to aliment is of the same character. The obligation to provide suitable aliment is one which does not vary; the amount of aliment to be provided under the obligation frequently does and always may. That the thing to be provided under the obligation is minister's stipend does not appear to me to affect the question. We are not dealing in the ordinary sense with an augmentation of stipend. Augmentation of stipend in that sense is only competent out of teind, and can only be granted by the Court of Teinds. We are now and in this Court dealing with the construction and effect of a civil obligation, and it no more affects the result that it concerns something to be paid and provided to a minister than if it was something to be paid or provided to a wife, a child, a parent, or a stranger. That it is so becomes apparent from the fact that we could as competently listen and give effect to a demand on the part of the defenders for a reduction of the amount being paid under the obligation as we can now listen to the pursuer's demand for an increase. In the Teind

No. 122. Court such a course could not be followed. We are therefore dealing with a matter of purely civil contract.

Peters v.
Magistrates of
Greenock.

Whether the Courts of law are under obligation to enforce such an obligation as that now before us, may, perhaps (since it has been questioned), be doubtful. I should humbly think they were. But the Court has already entertained and decided an action similar to the present in the case of Cesar, 20 D. 859, and I am prepared to follow the same course.

A great part of the argument addressed to us related to the question of fact whether there is any common good in the burgh of Greenock available to meet the pursuer's claims if these were given effect to. I think that argument cannot be considered by us at present. The Lord Ordinary has still to determine to what extent the pursuer is entitled to decree under the petitory conclusions of the summons, and until that has been determined the defenders cannot say whether they are in a position to meet the pursuer's claims or not. It would be premature, in my view, to say anything in the present state of the case as to whether the defenders have or have not funds which may be made available or liable to meet the pursuer's demands.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion of Lord Trayner. I concur in it, and I have nothing to add.

LORD YOUNG.—I am in such a hopeless minority here that I must have the greatest misgivings as to the soundness of the views which I take of this case. I have considered and re-considered them accordingly, knowing that I differ from your Lordships as I do from the Lord Ordinary, but that difference of opinion on my part, and the distrust which I necessarily have of its soundness, makes it all the more necessary that I should explain distinctly the grounds of my opinion. The particular case is not one of any considerable importance. It is peculiar in many respects, but the general views upon which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded, and which are concurred in by Lord Trayner as by the rest of your Lordships, are of the very highest importance, and as I am unable to concur in them, thinking them quite fallacious, I must explain distinctly the grounds upon which I do so.

The Lord Ordinary says at the conclusion of his note—and it is really the keynote of the ground of judgment from which I dissent—"This is not an action for administering a trust, but for constituting a debt, and decree must therefore go out as for any other debt, without reference in the meantime to the circumstances of the debtor." In my view the case is one of trust—of the administration of a trust, and nothing else. So that here, to start with, I altogether differ from the view of the Lord Ordinary. We have of course to consider the import and meaning of the decree of disjunction and erection of July 1741, and to see what obligation or duty, or whatever be its legal character, it imposes upon anyone enforceable in this action, and to that end we must—who were the parties to the proceeding which resulted in that decree, which was really an arrangement among the parties to the proceeding. It was not a proceeding before a Court of law, but a parliamentary commission. Nevertheless we must read and construe it in order to ascertain its import and meaning and any obligation or duty which it imposes upon anyone. To that end the first thing to be considered is, who were the parties to it, and what was their position?

Now, this leads me to notice what is brought pretty prominently out in course of these proceedings, that the management of the affairs of Greenock in the first half of the last century, and perhaps the whole of the latter half also, was very primitive. I do not suppose the case is unique; I daresay many other similar cases could be found, but we must regard their proceedings as very primitive indeed. The town, or village as they called it then, had no revenue—no property. The inhabitants were feuars or tenants of feuars of the baron—that is, the landed proprietor, the owner of the barony of Greenock. They do not seem to have had any sources of revenue whatever at that time, and such money as they needed was collected by what I must regard as voluntary subscription—simply subscription. They did it in an odd enough way, by imposing a voluntary tax upon themselves. A tax, which at first at least I think was pretty consistently persevered in, was imposed upon malt. It was a voluntary tax upon malt, whereby they collected such money as they required for any purpose which they had in view. It does not seem to have occurred at first to the superior or baron, Sir John Schaw, that his consent to the inhabitants and feuars voluntarily taxing their own malt was needed, but this seems to have been suggested to him by somebody. It involved the preparation of a deed at least, and latterly he consented to their voluntarily assessing themselves by taxing their own malt. I suppose the view on which it was suggested to him that his consent was necessary was, that if they paid a tax upon their malt they would be so much the less able to pay him feu-duty. I do not know any other reason that could be suggested. Accordingly he gives his consent, and authorises them to appoint proper persons to administer the proceeds of the voluntary tax or subscription, as I should call it. The first deed we have as containing anything about it is in 1741, but the produce of that tax or subscription with which we are interested, amounting to the sum of £1000, existed at that date. They had voluntarily assessed themselves by a tax on malt, and had put the result, £1000, in the hands of persons appointed by themselves in 1741. By his deed—a charter it is called—of 30th January 1741 Sir John Schaw says,—“Considering that for the better government and management of the public funds allanarly that has arisen or may arise from any assessment laid on by the inhabitants of the said burgh with my consent on themselves upon all malt grounded at the milns of westward Greenock, it seems just, necessary, and expedient that a certain number of proper persons with necessary power should be appointed for the management and administration of the said funds,” and so on. He authorises the feuars to appoint nine persons to manage the produce of such voluntary assessment. They are to be managers and administrators of the whole public funds belonging to the burgh, “or which shall hereafter pertain and belong to the same, either arising from the above specified voluntary assessment with my consent on malt or any other voluntary assessment that shall be consented to by me,” and the expression “voluntary assessment” recurs repeatedly through the deed.

Now, the first we know about it is, that in February 1741—they had been appointed before, plainly—these managers were in possession of £1000 as the produce of a voluntary assessment upon malt. We know that, because in February 1741 those persons who were in possession of the money invested it, and invested it upon a deed which specifies a trust very distinctly. They lent the money, the produce of this voluntary assessment, to Sir John Schaw himself, and took from him a heritable bond dated 7th February 1741. We have not got that bond here, but we have the instrument of sasine proceeding upon it in the print of documents. The notary who gave sasine is said to compare "having and in his hands holding one heritable bond, dated at Sauchie Lodge, the seventh day of February current, made, granted, and subscribed by Sir John Schaw of Greenock, in favour of the persons before named"—that is, those nine persons who had the produce of the voluntary tax for themselves—a bond to and in favour of those persons "for themselves and in trust in manner underwritten, whereby the said Sir John Schaw grants him at the term of Candlemas last to have borrowed and received from the said persons, all feuars and subfeuars in Greenock, and who have had the management of the funds arising from a certain duty on malt voluntarily imposed by them and the other feuars and inhabitants of the town of Greenock, with the said Sir John Schaw's consent, or themselves for themselves, and in the name of the whole feuars and householders of the burgh of barony of Greenock, all and haill the sum of one thousand pounds sterling money," which sum he bound and obliged himself to pay to those persons. Now, look at the words—they seem to me to be very important,—“In trust for themselves and the whole other feuars and householders of the said burgh of barony, and of the new parish of Greenock, when the same shall be erected,”—that is, it is exclusively of those in the new parish—when “the same shall be erected in order to be applied for the special effect and purpose of being part of the benefice of the said parish, when or in case it shall be erected, and in trust that such erection being once legally made, the foresaid persons, or survivor of them, shall denude themselves by assigning and disponing the said bond in security to and in favour of the minister who shall be first settled in the said new erected parish, and to his successors in office in all time coming during the not redemption, or until payment, to the intent that such minister and his successors in office may receive the rents and profits thereof during their respective incumbencies, and that the said rents thereof in time of vacancy may be uplifted and applied,” and so on; and he comes under an obligation to give them a yearly annual rent of £50 in return, and he conveys certain lands in security to these nine persons, “or the survivors or survivor of them, in trust for themselves and whole other feuars and householders of the said burgh of barony, and of the new parish of Greenock when the same shall be erected,”—that is to say, as I read it, confined to that parish when it shall be erected—“in order to be employed for the special effect and purpose of being part of the benefice of the said parish”; and it goes on “when or in case it shall be erected, and in trust that such erection being once legally made, the forenamed persons shall denude themselves by assigning and disponing this bond in security to and in favour of the minister.” Now, I put here only to ask, is it doubtful that this is a trust, and nothing else, and that those nine persons were trustees, and that this fund of £1000 was so invested and the purposes of it declared in the deed of investment? I cannot think that doubtful for a moment, indeed it does not admit of doubt. This was in February 1741. Now, it seems that they were then, and had from the month of June preceding been in course of collecting a further sum by a similar voluntary assessment upon malt. I shall allude to that by-and-by, when I come to notice, as I proceed to do, the decree of disjunction and erection which is dated in the month of July 1741, and which is the deed more immediately in question.

Now, who were the pursuers of that process for a decree of disjunction and erection? The trustees under the deed from which I have just read were the pursuers of that process. They come forward and they state to the Court the Teind Commission that the inhabitants of Greenock desire to have this put erected, and it is narrated,—“And whereas by the great increase of the town of Greenock of late years, in trade and people, and consequently of the parish of Greenock, whereof the town is a part, the erection of the new kirk is become absolutely necessary for the greater success of the Gospel in that place, and is much desired by all the inhabitants thereof, who have provided a sufficient fund for building a new kirk and endowing a minister with a competent stipend, not less than 950 merks of stipend and 50 merks for communion elements, towards which the pursuers have already laid out upon heritable security on the lands of Kirkmichael the sum of £1000 sterling, and have bound themselves by contract to pay a certain contribution yearly for fifteen years, which will be sufficient to complete a fund for the stipend, and to defray the expense of building a church.” The first and most prominent deed mentioned here is the deed of trust investment which I have just read, and the other is what I referred to already as the arrangement which had been come to, and was in process of being carried out, of a further tax upon malt, the produce of which was to be applied in a certain way. Accordingly, the narrative of this decree proceeds, that the case being called, the parties came before the Court, and “for instructing the points and articles of the libel, produced in presence of the said Lords a consent by the whole heritors of the parish of Greenock to the disjunction and new erection libelled,” and, what is most important, they produced—“Item, heritable bond by said Sir John Schaw of Greenock, Baronet, to the said managers of the funds of the town of Greenock for the principal sum of one thousand pounds sterling, with interest from Candlemas last,” to be applied towards making up a stipend to the minister of the new erected church, dated 7th February 1741. It is not doubtful, therefore, in my opinion, that the pursuers of this process put forward as the most prominent part of their title this trust-deed under which they acted as trustees of the fund of £1000, and put forward most distinctly that the beneficiary in the trust was the benefice of the new erected parish, and no other beneficiaries—not the town of Greenock, not the municipality of Greenock, but the benefice of the parish, the erection of which they were praying for. That was the only beneficiary in the trust. The deed, I repeat, does not admit of dispute with respect to that. Then they produced the instrument of sasine following upon the bond, from which instrument I have already read. Then—“Item, principal contract betwixt the said Sir John Schaw and the feuars and inhabitants of the burgh of Greenock, whereby the said feuars and inhabitants do voluntarily assess themselves in a certain duty on malt for fifteen years to come for the purposes of the said new erection, dated the 20th and 29th June last bypast.” Now, that is June 1740, and they were in course of collecting the second and the only other fund narrated to have been provided for the erection at that time. We have not got a very satisfactory account of what was the result of this new voluntary tax upon malt. I rather infer that it was not very successful, for the church of this benefice which was erected in 1741 was not built for sixteen years according to one of the parties, the pursuer here, and not for twenty years according to the other. They required this sixteen or twenty years—it does not signify which—in order to get money sufficient to build the church. This voluntary tax upon malt which began in June 1740, I rather infer, was not successful from the fact that after the lapse of about ten years they had to get an Act of Parliament to impose a compulsory tax upon malt, one of the purposes being to erect this church. Now, how much was recovered under the statute by the tax upon

No. 122. malt which was to endure for thirty-one years from 1751? What was recovered under that we do not know. There were a great many purposes to which it might be applied, and the nearest approach to information which we have on the subject is in the answers for the respondent to the minute of the reclaimers. In the answers he says that the church—that is to say, this church—was built in 1757, that is sixteen years after the decree of erection. He says—"It cost £2388, 17s. 8½d., of which £1058, 5s. 9d. was defrayed by subscription and the remainder paid by the Corporation." The remainder paid by the Corporation—I suppose out of the voluntary tax—would therefore be £1330. It is not suggested—there is not a hint of it—that any other funds than this source existed. There were no other funds set forth in the decree or set forth by the pursuers in the action than those I have mentioned. The trust money was invested upon a very proper deed of trust expressing very distinctly and minutely the purposes of the trust for a thousand pounds, and the intention which was in course of being carried out of getting further sums by an assessment upon malt, which resulted as I have stated. I can find nothing else, and I do not find anything in the deed suggesting that the pursuers—those nine individuals—had power to undertake any obligation beyond those funds, or that they undertake any obligation beyond those funds, or that they had any power or authority, or represented that they had any power or authority, to undertake an obligation of debt beyond those funds and make the burgh of barony of Greenock liable as debtors without any limit as to funds or with reference to anything except those trust funds to which I have referred. I find nothing in it to suggest that idea. They undertake to pay the minister and to pay for communion elements "not less than" a thousand merks, and that was what we are told, £55, 11s. 1½d. They had an annual rent of £50, and with regard to the £5, 11s. 1½d., unless the second effort to raise more money by subscription was successful they had nothing to meet it except the seat-rents; but it would be a very unsuccessful church, built at an expense of between £2000 and £3000, if the seat-rents would not supply the £5. And is it not manifest to everyone—I confess it is very manifest to me—that that specification of the thousand merks had reference to the income from this trust money of £1000?

Now, when the erection was made had that any effect upon this trust? It was a trust which was created for the benefice of the parish, which was erected in 1741. Now, just suppose that the trust money had been re-invested, the trustees holding the fund ought in pursuance of the trust-deed, when the benefice was created and a minister appointed, to have transferred the trust to him as trustee. The heritable bond of 1741 specifies that very distinctly—I refer to the instrument of sasine. The trust is to be transferred to the minister at the time being, and to pass from one to another with very anxious care upon their administration, for they are not entitled to interfere with the existing investment or any future investment without the consent of the Procurator of the Church, or the Lord Advocate or the Lord President of the Court of Session. It is a check put upon the administration of this trust money of which the benefice was the beneficiary. Now, suppose the trust funds had been invested in such a way as to produce more than a thousand merks. I had myself at a very early period of my professional life a case which came before the Court upon an application for a scheme in connection with a charity fund—not for endowing a benefice, but for promoting education.

the sum involved being exactly £1000. The pious donor was a Dr Hutton, No. 122. who had been a doctor of Queen Anne, but in the beginning of last century he left £1000 to trustees, in a parish in Galloway, for the promotion of education and other pious purposes there. That was invested by the trustees early in the century in the purchase of a barony in the parish in Galloway, so that when the case was brought before this Court about 1842 or 1843 it was yielding an income of over £1000 a-year. It was invested so as to yield an income in excess of the original capital in the first half of the present century, and I think it must now be yielding over £1500 a-year. That must all go to the beneficiaries of the trust; and if this had been similarly disposed of to profit, is it doubtful that the benefice would have been the beneficiary? Or can it be said that it was just a case of simple debt, not a trust administration at all, and that they must have, not necessarily 1000 merks or 950 merks of stipend, but a legally competent stipend without reference to the produce of the trust-estate? I cannot assent to that; it is not sound. On the other hand, as has happened, and is not unlikely to happen again, if the trust funds are invested so that the return is diminished, would they not equally suffer in that case as they would have gained in the other, for the same reasons—that they are the beneficiaries in the trust? Now, that is the meaning which I attach to this decree. Suppose the trust had been transferred to the minister, as the trust-deed requires that it should. It was not so transferred. I do not know how this was neglected both by the original trustees and by the minister of the parish and his successors; I cannot account for it, and there is no explanation given. It was a neglect to carry out the terms of the trust-deed. But suppose the trust had been transferred to the minister, would there have been a debt upon the prior trustees for anything, or would he not have been entitled to every farthing that was drawn—the fruit of the trust? If there had been any money collected by the second attempt beginning in June 1740, that must have gone to the same trust; it was for the same purpose, and it is so expressed in the narrative of the decree—in trust for the benefice—but it produced nothing. I am assuming it produced nothing, and that when the Act of Parliament was passed ten years later they made no more money out of it or applicable to this purpose than was applied to this purpose in building the church.

Now, what is the position of the Magistrates and Council at the present time? The trust-estate which I have referred to was brought to rather a sad end a long time ago, as I shall notice; but suppose it had continued, either upon the investment which was made in 1740 or upon another investment which was substituted, what would have been the position of the Magistrates and Council of Greenock now? Would they not just have come in place of the original trustees? There is no other locus standi for them in this case. They came as trustees in room and in place of the original trustees, in trust not for the town and burgh of Greenock, but for this benefice and nothing else. There is nothing new in this; it is the most familiar thing in the world that the magistrates and council of a burgh may be trustees for any limited purpose you like. They might be trustees for erecting a monument to the memory of Sir Walter Scott, or for any place of public recreation or instruction, or any limited purpose you like which they choose to accept. Generally speaking, the magistrates and council of a burgh would decline to accept the trust except for some purpose in which some part at least of the community of the burgh was interested. But they would have been trustees for this benefice and for nothing

No. 122. else if that trust had continued, and I know of no other position which they occupy now. We are told that in 1761,—that is, exactly twenty years after this trust-investment was made—the trust money was simply uplifted by the trustees and spent. It is said it was spent in paying off some debts of the town of Greenock. Well, nobody will doubt that that was a most unwarrantable proceeding, and those who were guilty of it—the trustees who violated their trust—and their estates should be responsible for the misappropriation or misapplication, which is the same thing, of the trust funds with which they were charged for a particular purpose, but as it happened a century and a-quarter ago the money has hopelessly disappeared; there is no possibility of recovering it.

Mar. 16, 1892.
 Peters v.
 Magistrates of Greenock.

How shall the town of Greenock of the present day be in the least degree responsible for the breach of trust by the nine individuals, or any number you please, in the year 1761? I am afraid that in many, if not in most burghs in Scotland there has been great misappropriation of trust property—property in the hands of the magistrates and council in trust for any purpose you like to name which is a lawful purpose. If you read the history of Edinburgh you will find very grave grounds for the conclusion that a great amount of trust property in the hands of the Magistrates and Council—and they cannot have it otherwise than in trust—was most scandalously misapplied—lent or conveyed away, really without any consideration at all, to the effect of diminishing public ground, and making it the property of private individuals; but there is no remedy for that now. There might have been a remedy against those who were guilty of it, but when the thing has been accomplished a century and a-quarter ago, there is no such remedy now. This trust-estate of £1000 disappeared in 1767. There was nothing except the seat-rents, and looking with all anxiety I cannot find any trust-estate whatever in the hands of these trustees who are now before us—and we have none but trustees before us—except seat-rents. I think they are bound to apply the seat-rents in accordance with the trust, and that you find the purposes of the trust in this deed of erection. They are always referred to as trustees. See how the right to let seats and to draw rents is given to them. The declaration of the decree is,—“That the baillie of Greenock and managers of the fund for building and endowing the said church, and the feuars and elders of the said new erected parish for the time being have, in all time coming, the sole and undoubted right of patronage of the said new church, and the right of presentation and calling a minister to serve the cure thereof, how soon the said kirk shall be erected and accommodated for public worship and as often in all time thereafter as any vacancy shall happen,” and “of setting and uplifting rents for said seats, and of naming and appointing beadles.” So the right to exact rents is by the decree given to the managers of the fund for building and endowing the church and the feuars and elders of the new parish. These are the people who are to collect seat-rents. It is not the Magistrates and Town-Council of Greenock as the Magistrates and Town-Council of Greenock but as trustees coming in place of the original trustees as the managers of the fund for building and endowing the church, and it is in that capacity—and in that capacity alone—that the right is given to them to impose the seat-rents and to exact them, and they came into their hands as funds for the church. I can find no funds of the trust available except the seat-rents. For a great many years back at all events those seat-rents have been sufficient to uphold the church in a state of repair and to pay the church officers, and to afford to minister a stipend of between £200 and £300 a-year. That is a pretty good fund. It is a trust-fund in the hands of these trustees for the benefice, and they are able to keep up the benefice with it. But then it is said,—“Oh, but here is no trust or trust administration at all; we have nothing to do with the trust; it is an action for debt; there is simply a debt imposed upon the town of Greenock which is to be recovered without the least reference to the trust or trust-funds.” I cannot agree in that. I cannot see any indication of it in the decree.

Magistrates of

And now that is sufficient for the disposal of this case—sufficient for sustaining the defences and assailing the defenders from the conclusions of the action. The minister has been in receipt, I suppose, of all that which the trust funds in the hands of these trustees can afford, or if he has not—if he thinks that the trustees have misapplied the trust-funds and not given him the whole of these to which he is entitled—he has an action against them as trustees, but just as trustees. It is the very opposite of what the Lord Ordinary says it is; it is an action for trust administration, and it may be very greatly to his advantage. I do not know whether this is a popular preacher or not, but a popular preacher may fill the church and crowd the church, and may get a great amount of seat-rents, though I think these seat-rents would be trust funds for the benefice in the hands, as the decree expresses it, of the managers of the fund for erecting and endowing the church, and it may be greatly to the advantage of the minister, or the advantage of his successor, to have an action against those managers who have the seat-rents to administer them as trust funds according to the direction of the trust-deed. But we have nothing to do with that. It is an obligation for a legal and competent stipend. If there had been no trust here, and no trust funds here, but an obligation to provide and pay a stipend—a legal competent stipend “not under” 1000 merks—I should be clearly of opinion that 1000 merks was the limit of the obligation. I quite agree with Lord Trayner that there is no distinction between the minister and anybody else. We have nothing to do with augmentation, or with what is a mere statutory and unique proceeding,—with nothing analogous to it or in the least degree resembling it in this or any other country. The statutory Commissioners are allocating stipend out of teinds from time to time. I agree, therefore, that there is no distinction with regard to an obligation of the kind I am now imagining between a minister and anybody else; and I repeat that I am very clearly of opinion that if an obligation is come under to pay a minister of the Established Church, or of a dissenting Presbyterian Church, or a bishop, or an incumbent of an Episcopal Church, a legal and competent stipend or income of “not less than” £50, that is the measure of the legal obligation, and that, with the exception of the case Cæsar, in which Lord Wood’s opinion is quoted—and it is only the opinion of a single Judge—there is no case in which such a thing is even suggested. I do not think his opinion would have extended to anybody but a minister, and I cannot help feeling that his views, from which I entirely dissent, are influenced, as I think the Lord Ordinary’s are—indeed, he says it—by the analogy of augmentations in the Court of Teinds.

Take the case of aliment. Suppose anybody came under an obligation to furnish a legal and competent aliment to a person of not less than £50, could the Court increase it? Or would it depend on whether the person was the son or daughter of a Duke or of a millionaire? Would that have to be inquired into? Is anybody acquainted with any statute or rule of common law which will inform this Court what is a legal and competent aliment to anybody you choose to instance? What is a legal and competent stipend to a minister of the Church of England? There is no statute which defines it—no rule of common law which defines it; there is the most infinite variety in stipends. In England £50 is rather a large stipend. There are a great many stipends much under that, and on the Continent a great many do not exceed one-half of it. But what is the measure of a legal and competent stipend? Is not that really just general loose language? Is £250 legal and competent, or is £1000 illegal and incompetent? A suggestion was made that the Court could determine it, but we can only determine according to the statute and common law of the land. There is no statute or any law of the land applicable to such a matter. A father—let him be a millionaire—is bound to aliment his children. It is not in the power of the Court to fix from time to time, according to changing circumstances, the amount of aliment. The rule is simply this, that he must keep them from being public charges,—that is to say, he must keep them off the poor's fund. There is no other way; and if you wish to get an obligation for aliment, or stipend, or salary, you must have the sum specified, and if it is specified, and we think that it is, to be not less than so and so, then that is the amount of the legal obligation, and I am not in the least prepared to affirm—taking the case of aliment as an illustration—that if a man came under an obligation to give a legal and competent aliment to A, B, or C of not less than £50 a-year, by the law of Scotland that might be increased or reduced. It is said there was no augmentation here, and that it might not only be increased but diminished according to changing circumstances. I am not prepared to affirm that the law of Scotland is in accordance with any such proposition, or that decree could be given for more than the sum specified as the least that the party to the contract was bound for. I think that language is not the language, properly speaking, of legal obligation, and indeed such a decree as this decree of erection is not a proper instrument of obligation at all. It is mere familiar language, and means only that we will give you more if we conveniently can, and if the administration of the funds in our charge will afford it. If a Dissenting congregation entered into an arrangement with their minister to give him a stipend of not less than £200 a-year, I have no idea that he could come to this Court as upon a matter of debt, and say—"I wish this raised, for it must be a suitable stipend according to changing circumstances, and I am entitled to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, of the Inner-House, and of the House of Lords upon that." It is said that the Court might refuse. I really think they would. They not only might do it, but they must do it. The Court can have no will in the matter. If it is a legal debt the Court must consider it in the best way they can, and decide it. The Court can never exercise its option, and if it is not a matter of legal obligation they are not entitled to consider it. How should we judge of it? Are we to take the evidence or advice of men of skill? Of what are we to allow evidence? Are we to consider what is an average stipend? I entirely dissent from such a view. In reviewing and reconsidering my opinion, in reference to the fact that I am, as I have expressed it, in such a hopeless minority, which renders it likely that there is some error pervading my views, I must adhere to them, and conclude by saying that I do adhere to them. I apologise for having detained the Court at so great length, but it was incumbent on me to explain my views as fully and as clearly as I could.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur in Lord Trayner's opinion.

PATRICK SIM, Pursuer (Respondent).—Dickson—M Lennan.

No. 123.

HENRY ROBINOW, Defender (Reclaimer).—Dundas—William Thomson.

Mar. 17, 1892.

Jurisdiction—Forum non conveniens.—The plea of forum non conveniens will not be sustained, unless the Court is satisfied that there is a Court in another country which has jurisdiction to try the action and in which it ought to be tried as being more convenient for all the parties and more suitable to the ends of justice.

Sim v.
Robinow.

In an action by one of two joint adventurers against the other for count, reckoning, and payment of the proceeds of the joint adventure, which, the pursuer alleged, had been wound up by the defender, with a balance due to the pursuer in the hands of the defender, the defender on the merits averred that the accounts had been squared up and settled, and further pleaded forum non conveniens. The parties had entered into the joint adventure, which related to certain South African mining shares, when they were both resident in South Africa. The summons was served on the defender in Scotland after he had resided for more than forty days there, the pursuer being then resident in London. The defender averred that he was domiciled in South Africa, that he intended to return there, that the pursuer likewise intended to return to South Africa (this the pursuer denied), and that the whole books of the joint adventure were in South Africa, and also most of the witnesses. The Court, holding that the question depended on a mere balance of the convenience of a trial in this country as compared with one in South Africa, repelled the plea of forum non conveniens.

On 3d September 1891 Patrick Sim, designing himself as residing at No. 4 Hanover Street, Hanover Square, London, brought an action of count, reckoning, and payment against Henry Robinow, designed as "merchant, presently residing at Braemar, in the county of Aberdeen."

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction. (2) Forum non conveniens. He did not seriously insist in the first of these pleas.

The pursuer averred,—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer and the defender, who are Scotsmen by origin, were, until recently, both in business in Kimberley, South Africa. The defender was a merchant and commission-agent there. The pursuer presently resides at No. 4 Hanover Street, Hanover Square, London, and the defender presently resides, or until lately resided, at Braemar, in the county of Aberdeen. With reference to the answer, it is not known and not admitted that the defender is still in business in South Africa. He was continuously resident in Scotland, and had his place of residence at Braemar from on or about 29th July 1891 until the service of the present action on 16th September 1891, a period upwards of forty days. He is still resident in Scotland, and has taken an active interest in local questions at Braemar. It is believed that he has no immediate intention of returning to South Africa. Quoad ultra the answer is denied."

The defender answered,—(Ans. 1) "Denied that the defender presently resides at Braemar, or that he is still resident in Scotland. Explained that he is still a merchant and commission-agent at Kimberley, South Africa; that his stay at Braemar, which was only a temporary visit for the benefit of his health, is now ended, and that he is about to return to his business in South Africa. Quoad ultra admitted."

The defender further stated that he had a duly authorised attorney in Kimberley who had power to accept service of any summons raised

No. 123. against him in the Courts of Cape Colony; and also (what the pursuer denied) that the pursuer was about to return to South Africa.

Mar. 17, 1892.
Sim v.
Robinow.

The pursuer further stated that when he and the defender were resident in South Africa they became interested in a joint adventure in South African mining shares; that most of these shares were disposed of, and the accounts between the parties adjusted, in November 1887, but that certain of them remained undisposed of until 1888, when they were sold by the defender, and that as he had refused to account to the pursuer for the price, the present action became necessary.

In answer to these averments the defender stated that the whole accounts in connection with the shares "were long ago squared up, paid and settled by the parties, and there is now no sum due by the defender to the pursuer in connection therewith."

On 16th February 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Low) repelled the first and second pleas in law for the defender, and allowed a proof.*

* "OPINION.— . . . In these circumstances, while the jurisdiction of this Court is not disputed, the plea of forum non conveniens is urged. The defender maintains that the proper forum for trying the questions which are raised is in South Africa, because the joint adventures which are the subject-matter of the action were carried on there, and the books and the witnesses necessary to the determination of the matter in dispute are also there.

"In my opinion, the considerations of convenience in this case are not sufficiently strong to justify me in sustaining the plea. Where there is jurisdiction, the Court cannot, I apprehend, refuse to entertain an action, unless the circumstances make it plain that there is another tribunal to which not only the convenience of all the parties, but the justice of the case, point as the proper forum. Actions of accounting against a foreign executry or a foreign partnership are properly brought in the Courts of the domicile of the executry or the partnership, and these form the most familiar examples of the kind of case in which the plea of forum non conveniens has been sustained (Clements v. Macaulay, 4 Macph. 583, Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) p. 592). The plea, however, is not confined to that class of cases, but applies wherever it can be shewn that the case cannot, consistently with fairness and justice, be tried in this country. Thus, where a gentleman in Scotland brought an action of damages against the manager of his estates in Jamaica for alleged mismanagement and neglect of duty, it was held that the Courts of Jamaica, where the estate, the books, and documents, and the witnesses were, was the proper forum (Tulloch v. Williams, 8 II. 657). Again, in Williamson v. North-Eastern Railway Company, 11 E. 596, it was held that an action of damages against an English railway company for an accident occurring in England, and in circumstances which raised a question of an English right of way, could not be maintained in the Scotch Courts. The question, therefore, is one for the discretion of the Court in view of the circumstances disclosed—the general rule, however, being, as I have already said, that the Court must exercise its jurisdiction unless there are very clear and weighty grounds for refusing to do so.

"In the present case, I am of opinion that such grounds are not present. The action is not one of general accounting in regard to a former partnership business. The . . . action is for an accounting for the price realised by the sale of specific shares. . . . I therefore do not see that there will be any necessity for a general investigation into the business books of the defender. At the most, excerpts from the books of the entries relating to the joint speculations is all that can be required. Then the fact that some witnesses may require to be examined upon commission in South Africa does not appear to me to create a difficulty, especially as the questions at issue must turn rather on the state of the accounts in regard to certain specific transactions than upon matters of fact to be established by parole evidence. Further, I do not think that any specific question of South African law is raised. . . . I shall therefore, repel the plea of forum non conveniens."

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—The plea of forum non conveniens No. 123. was one which depended on the discretion of the Court, but it would be sustained wherever the trial of the case in Scotland amounted to practical injustice to the defender, with no counterbalancing justice or right on the side of the pursuer. It was not necessary that there should be an actually depending process between the parties in the foreign Court. It was enough that there was another Court, which was more convenient for the trial of the cause than the Scots Court.¹ Here there was such a Court in South Africa—a branch of the Cape Supreme Court sat at Kimberley. The books of the joint adventure were at the Cape, the contracts which were in question had been entered into and carried out there, and most of the witnesses were there. The single circumstance to the contrary was that the defender had come to Scotland on a visit, which lasted long enough to give the Scots Courts jurisdiction over him. But when jurisdiction had been “snatched” in this way, the Court would listen favourably to the plea of forum non conveniens.² The probability was that before the trial both the pursuer and the defender would have returned to South Africa, in which event there could not be a pretence in favour of the Scots Court being the convenient forum.

Argued for the pursuer ;—The plea of forum non conveniens raised something more than a mere question of comparative convenience or inconvenience. There must be practical injustice in trying the case in Scotland. Nothing of that sort occurred here. There would be no difficulty in trying the question between the parties in the present action. To sustain the plea would really mean that the Court would in all cases refuse to exercise its jurisdiction whenever the defender happened to be a foreigner.

LORD KINNEAR.—There is here an action of count, reckoning, and payment, in defence to which the defender has stated two preliminary pleas,—1. No jurisdiction ; 2. Forum non conveniens. The Lord Ordinary has repelled both these pleas, and there can be no doubt that the plea of no jurisdiction has been rightly repelled. That this Court has jurisdiction is beyond all question. But it is said that this jurisdiction ought not to be exercised, because this is not a competent or convenient forum for determining the questions at issue between the parties, and that the only proper forum is in the Cape Colony in South Africa.

The summons is based upon a perfectly relevant averment that while the pursuer and defender were resident in South Africa they became interested in a joint adventure in the shares of a limited company ; that the share certificates and other documents were entrusted to the defender, who had power to dispose of them, that the shares were realised early in 1888, and that the defender has failed to account for his intromissions. The defence on the merits is that the whole accounts “were long ago squared up, paid, and settled by the parties.”

The only averments on which the plea of forum non conveniens is rested appear to be that the transactions were carried through in South Africa, ¹ Brown v. Palmer, Dec. 17, 1830, 9 S. 224, 3 Scot. Jur. 146 ; Macmaster v. Macmaster, June 7, 1833, 11 S. 685, 5 Scot. Jur. 414 ; Tulloch v. Williams, March 6, 1846, 8 D. 657, 18 Scot. No. 123. that the defender's books and documents are in South Africa, and that the defender himself is about to return there. The defender further states that the pursuer also is about to return to South Africa, but this averment he denies, and it is one into which we cannot inquire. We must deal with the case on the same footing as any other action brought in this Court by a resident Englishman. In regard to the remaining averments in support of the plea of forum non conveniens, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that they are not sufficient to justify the Court in dismissing the action.

Mar. 17, 1892.
Sim v.
Robinow.

These averments certainly suggest that the matters in dispute between the parties might be speedily and conveniently tried in South Africa, if both of them had been resident in that country; and it is very probable that an inquiry in this country cannot be carried through without considerable expense, as some of the witnesses, and the books and documents which must be examined, are now in South Africa. But then the parties, who will probably be the principal witnesses, are not now in South Africa; and even if we were entitled to assume, what I think we can hardly take to be certain, that the defender will have returned to South Africa by the time the inquiry comes to be made, the result simply comes to be a question of the balance of convenience and inconvenience between an inquiry in this country and inquiry in South Africa, and we are asked to decide that question in favour of South Africa. Now, I am not aware that the Court has ever refused to exercise its jurisdiction upon the ground of a mere balance of convenience and inconvenience, and the reason is that such a ground of judgment would make it necessary for the Court to proceed upon facts and circumstances the full force of which it cannot appreciate without an inquiry into the whole merits of the case. But further, in the present case the alleged inconveniences are such as necessarily arise in the daily business of a Court which is called on to adjudicate upon mercantile transactions carried through in all parts of the world. The Court recognises that it may be called upon to enforce contracts wherever they are made, and between whatever parties, provided it has jurisdiction to entertain the action; and therefore in such a case something more is required than mere practical inconvenience in order to sustain the plea of forum non conveniens. The general rule was stated by the late Lord President in Clements v. Macaulay, 4 Macph. 593, in the following terms:—"In cases in which jurisdiction is competently founded a Court has no discretion whether it shall exercise its jurisdiction or not, but is bound to award the justice which a suitor comes to ask. Judex tenetur impertiri judicium suum;" and the plea under consideration must not be stretched so as to interfere with this general principle of jurisprudence." And therefore the plea can never be sustained unless the Court is satisfied that there is some other tribunal, having competent jurisdiction, in which the case may be tried more suitably for the interests of all the parties and for the ends of justice.

I do not think that any of the cases cited to us in which the plea of forum non conveniens was sustained are applicable to the present case. The cases of Brown v. Palmer, 9 S. 224, and Macmaster v. Macmaster, 11 S. 685, were cases of executry administration, in which foreign executors were called to account in this country for the executry estate situated abroad, and the ground upon which the Court in these cases went in sustaining the plea of forum non conveniens is very clearly explained by the Lord President in Clements v. Macaulay, when he says,—“In these cases the question always was, whether it was more for the true and legitimate interest of the executry estate and all the claimants that the distribution should take place where the executors have had administration. There is of course in most cases a strong presumption in favour of that consideration, and accordingly the plea is generally sustained in such cases." The same principle regulates actions relating to partnerships, in which there is a manifest expediency that questions relating to the partnership estate should be tried before the tribunal which has jurisdiction over the partnership as a whole. The case of Williamson v. North-Eastern Railway Company, 11 R. 596, was of a different character, but the grounds on which the Court there held that they ought not to exercise their jurisdiction were very strong. It was an action against an English railway company, on account of a fault committed in England, and it involved questions of English law; besides which there could of course be no question as to the competency and ready accessibility of the Courts in England for the trial of the case. The jurisdiction there was founded upon arrestments to found jurisdiction, and in deciding the case the Judges laid stress on the peculiar method by which the jurisdiction of the Court had there been established; but apart from that specialty the judgment of the Court proceeded on the ground that it was more convenient in the interests of both the parties and for the ends of justice that the trial should take place in England instead of before this Court. The case of Tulloch v. Williams, 8 D. 657, was very exceptional, and I do not think it is a precedent which we ought to follow. The Judges went mainly on the ground that the pursuer had no interest to prefer this Court to the Court of Jamaica, but the action was not dismissed, but was merely sisted in respect of the special circumstances of the case, and in respect that the defender had declared his readiness to answer in the Court of Jamaica, and offered bond to that effect. The defender here makes no such proposal, but if he had I should not have been of opinion that to sist process was an expedient course to follow, for, if this Court is not a convenient forum for the trial of the cause, then the action ought to be dismissed, but, if this Court is a convenient forum, then I can see no reason why the action should not go on in the ordinary way.

In all these cases there was one indispensable element present when the Court gave effect to the plea of forum non conveniens, namely, that the Court was satisfied that there was another Court in which the action ought to be tried as being more convenient for all the parties, and more suitable for the ends of justice. But I cannot say that I am able to discover this element in the present case at all; it might have been present if the defender had gone abroad and had now returned to South Africa; but all that he says is that he intends to go there. I do not think that the pursuer can be asked to wait till the defender carries out this intention, or that he ought to be sent to a Court which may be unable to exercise any jurisdiction over the defender in consequence of his continued absence from South Africa. It seems to me therefore that it is neither expedient for both the parties, nor proper in the interests of justice, that the action should be dismissed. I am therefore of opinion that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I also concur. I think it results from the examination of the authorities which Lord Kinnear has made that in all or almost all the cases in which the plea of forum non conveniens was sustained there was another Court in another country which had jurisdiction over the parties interested and Such certainly was the ground of decision in the executry and partnership cases to which we were referred, and it is very difficult to see how any case could arise in which we would sustain the plea when the action is a simple personal claim for payment of a sum of money. No doubt more or less inconvenience may be caused to a defender by obliging him to answer in the Courts of his temporary domicile, but it is impossible to determine that until the case itself is tried, and therefore mere inconvenience does not appear to be an appropriate ground for rejecting an action when the jurisdiction of the Court to try it is clear.

Police—Burgh—Assessment—Sewer-rate—Commissioners' power to borrow—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), secs. 196 and 384.—The General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 196, gives powers to the Commissioners of Police to borrow “for the purpose of making . . . sewers, and on the security of the special sewer-rate,” such money as the Commissioners deem necessary, and declares that the provisions of the Act, with respect to borrowing money and granting bonds therefor, “shall be applicable to the borrowing of money for the purpose of making . . . sewers.” Section 384 of the Act is the only section which makes provision for the borrowing of money and granting security therefor. That section authorises the Commissioners “to borrow and take up for any of the purposes of this Act, other than the construction . . . of sewers as hereinbefore provided, or for repayment of any moneys borrowed for such purposes” under the Act, such sum as the Commissioners deem necessary, provided that it shall be lawful for them to assess owners of property liable in the several assessments under the Act in such additional assessment as to produce a sinking fund for the extinction of the debt in twenty years.

The commissioners of a burgh borrowed money on the security of the special sewer-rate to pay for the construction of sewers, and assessed the proprietors at a rate sufficient both to pay the interest and repay the capital in twenty years. Held that the assessment was lawful, because, assuming that section 384 did not apply to borrowing for the construction of sewers, sec. 196 authorised the commissioners to borrow for the construction of sewers, and did not forbid such a system of borrowing as would pay off the capital by a sinking fund.

Police—Burgh—Assessment—Sewer-rate—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), secs. 96, 100.—Section 96 of the Act authorises Commissioners of Police when they shall resolve to make a new sewer: charge all the owners of lands and premises liable to contribute to the rates with a special sewer-rate, and sec. 100 provides that where in the Commissioners' judgment any premises “were sufficiently drained before the making of such new sewer, the owners thereof shall be entitled to have a deduction made from the special sewer-rate to which they would otherwise be liable in respect of the making of such new sewer, having regard to the cost of making such new sewer, and to the value and efficiency of such old sewer." The Commissioners of Police of a burgh constructed a new sewer, and imposed a rate of 1s. 5d. per £1. To the proprietors whose properties were already sufficiently drained, and who did not therefore use the new sewer, they allowed a deduction of 1s. 4½d. per £1, leaving a farthing payable by them, while from those whose properties were drained by the new sewer they exacted the full rate.

No. 124.
Mar. 17, 1892.
Police Commissioners of Govan v. Mickel.

Held that the assessment was legal, and that the deduction was warranted.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE OF THE BURGH OF GOVAN served upon 2^D DIVISION. Robert Mickel and others, proprietors of houses in Elder Park Street, Govan, a notice of assessment, calling upon them to pay for the years 15th May 1890 to 15th May 1891, and 15th May 1891 to 15th May 1892, a special sewer-rate of 1s. 5d. per £ (amounting in the case of Mickel to £178 for the two years), in order to pay for certain new sewers, in addition to the general sewer-rate for maintaining the sewers, which was ¾d. per £.*

For the same years the Commissioners served upon, inter alios, John M'Intyre, Helen Street, Govan, a notice of assessment imposing upon him (besides the general sewer-rate) special sewer-rate also at the rate of 1s. 5d. per £, but subject to a deduction of 1s. 4½d. per £, being ¾d. per £, payable by him. In all, 3s. 1d. was the sum claimed from him.

Questions having arisen as to the legality of these assessments a special case was stated for the opinion of the Court, to which case the first party was the clerk to the Commissioners, the second parties Mickel and others, and the third party M'Intyre.

The following were the circumstances in which the question arose:—

The burgh of Govan was divided into separate drainage districts. Both the second and third parties were in No. 1 district. In 1883-4 and 1884-5 the special sewer-rate was 2d. per £. In the year 1884-5 the Commissioners formed at a cost of £3080 a sewer at Fairfield and a sewer at Langlands Road, both in No. 1 district, in order to drain portion of the district then and at the date of this case mainly unbuilt upon. These sewers drained certain tenements in Langlands Road. In order to raise money to meet the cost a special sewer-rate was imposed for 1885-6 of 6d. per £1, the whole rate being payable only by proprietors who used the sewers, and the others being allowed an abatement of 5½d. per £, leaving payable by them ¼d. per £.†

* The General Police and Improvement Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), enacts, section 96,—“Whenever the Commissioners shall resolve to make any new sewer, they may charge the owners of all the lands or premises liable to contribute to the rates for making the same with special sewer-rates over and above any other assessment or rates to which such persons may be liable under this Act, and such rate shall, for the purposes of this Act, be called the ‘Special Sewer-Rate.’” Section 97.—“The Commissioners shall, if necessary, impose a sewer-rate to be called, for the purposes of this Act, the ‘General Sewer Rate,’ distinct from any other rate which they are authorised to make under this Act, to be applied in maintaining and clearing the sewers, and all other expenses connected with such sewers not herein otherwise provided for, or which may not be fully defrayed by the special sewer-rate, and for securing and paying off any moneys which may be borrowed on the security of the special sewer-rate under the provisions of this Act, and the interest of such monies which the special sewer-rates shall be insufficient to defray.”

† Section 100 of said Act provides,—“Where, in the judgment of the Commissioners, any premises were sufficiently drained before the making of such new sewer, the owners thereof shall be entitled to have such deduction made from the special sewer-rates to which they would otherwise be liable in respect of the making of such new sewer, having regard to the cost of making such new Mickel.

In 1889 the new sewers were extended, and the additional cost brought up the whole cost to £4000.

The Commissioners resolved to borrow money upon the security of the special sewer-rate to pay off the £4000, under the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, and to create a sinking fund which would repay in twenty years the capital sum required to construct the sewers, with interest.* They fixed the assessment at 1s. 5d. per £. In arriving at this assessment they had it in view to make the ratepayers whose property drained into the new sewer and its branches, and those whose property did not drain into the new sewer, bear the cost on the following principle, viz., the former to pay the full rate of 1s. 5d. per £, and the latter to pay that rate under deduction of 1s. 4½d. per £, leaving them to pay the rate which they had been formerly paying, viz., ½d. per £ upon the rental of their properties. The assessments were made accordingly.

The second parties' properties drained into the new sewer, and they were charged the rate of 1s. 5d. without deduction. The third party's property did not drain into it, and he was therefore assessed subject to the deduction.

The third party, however, objected to the rate imposed upon him upon the following ground:—But for the construction of the new sewers above described the special rate of 2d. per £ would have ceased by the year 1889. Therefore the ½d. per £ levied upon him and other proprietors sewer, and to the value and efficiency of such old sewer; and whenever any old sewer is enlarged, or open sewer closed, the expense of such enlargement, or of closing such open sewers, shall be defrayed in like manner as if it had been incurred in making a new sewer."

* Section 196 of the Act enacts,—“It shall be lawful for the Commissioners to borrow for the purpose of making, enlarging, reconstructing, and maintaining sewers, and on the security of the said special sewer-rates and general sewer-rates, such sums of money and at such times as the Commissioners shall deem necessary for that purpose, and to assign the said special sewer-rates and general sewer-rates in security of the money to be so borrowed; and the provisions of this Act, with respect to the borrowing of money and the granting of bonds therefor, and the transference and recording of such bonds, shall be applicable to the borrowing of money for the purpose of making, enlarging, reconstructing, and maintaining sewers."

But section 384 enacts,—“It shall be lawful for the Commissioners to borrow and take up, for any of the purposes of this Act other than the construction, alteration, or maintenance of sewers as hereinbefore provided, or for repayment of any monies borrowed for such purposes under this or any former Acts, which shall have fallen due to the lenders thereof, such sum or sums, and at such times or times as the Commissioners shall deem necessary for such purposes: Provided always that in all cases where it shall be necessary to borrow any sum or sums for the said purposes of this Act, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners and they are hereby authorised and required at their first annual meeting to assess after such borrowing, if the respective rates of assessment then levied do not amount to the respective maximum rates by this Act authorised, to assess all owners or occupiers of premises within the burgh respectively liable under the several assessments under this Act in such additional assessments beyond the sums necessary for such respective purposes as will produce a fund equal to five per centum per annum upon the sum or sums so borrowed respectively, and also to the annual interest of such borrowed sum or sums, which sum of five per centum per annum the Commissioners shall annually appropriate, set apart, and invest, at the highest rate of interest which can be had for the same, in the public funds, or in any chartered or other bank, or on heritable security, as a sinking fund, applicable, and to be applied by the Commissioners from time to time to the repayment of the monies borrowed until the respective debt shall be extinguished."

whose properties were sufficiently drained and were not connected with the new sewers would go to relieve the ratepayers whose properties drained into the new sewers. He contended that, in these circumstances, the Commissioners had no power under the Act to levy upon him any portion of the rate required for these new sewers.

Police Commissioners of
Govan v.
Mickel.

These questions were stated for the opinion of the Court,—“(1) Are the assessments of 1s. 5d. per £ of rental imposed by the first parties legal assessments, and are the second parties bound to make payment of the same to the first parties? (2) Is the said assessment of 1s. 5d. subject to an abatement of 1s. 4½d. imposed by the first parties upon the third party a legal assessment, and is the third party bound to pay the same to the first parties?”

The second parties admitted that the rate of 1s. 5d. was fair, if the proprietors who drained into the sewer and its branches were alone bound to defray all the cost, if the borrowed money must be repaid in twenty years, and if they must meet both principal and interest. They, however, maintained that section 100 of the Act applied only to the case of a sewer constructed in place of an already existing sewer, and that the abatement of 1s. 4½d. per £ allowed by the Commissioners to the majority of the ratepayers in the district was not authorised by that section, and that if authorised, the section did not sanction an abatement which virtually amounted to a total exemption. Further, that in respect that the sewer was constructed to supply the wants of a district which was yet to a great extent unbuilt upon, it was ultra vires of the Commissioners to throw the whole expense of the sewer on the few proprietors who had buildings at present within the district; that it was not expedient nor equitable on the part of the Commissioners to limit the period for repaying the borrowed money to twenty years, and that there was no obligation upon the Commissioners by statute or otherwise so to limit it. On the contrary, they pointed out that section 384, while it provided for a sinking fund to repay borrowed money, expressly excepted money borrowed for the purpose of defraying the cost of construction of sewers, and contended that in any case an assessment to provide a sinking fund was a separate assessment from special sewer-rate assessment, and must be levied equally from the ratepayers within the burgh, and at all events within the district. They also contended that even if the Commissioners were bound to repay the borrowed money in twenty years, they were entitled and bound to relieve the second parties and those ratepayers in the same situation as much as possible; that the statute did not impose an obligation upon the Commissioners to repay money borrowed to defray the cost of construction of sewers out of the special sewer-rate alone, and that the Commissioners were entitled to give the relief asked for by levying part of the cost of construction of the sewer as “general sewer-rate.”

It was stated by counsel for the first party, with reference to the amount of the deduction allowed, that in consequence of the number of proprietors in the same position as the third party, and represented by him, about two-thirds of the total assessment would be paid by them, and the other third by the second parties.

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The questions submitted to the Court under this special case relate to certain rates or assessments which the first party has imposed on the second and third parties in respect of new sewers which have been laid down within the burgh of Govan. No question is raised as to the regularity of the proceedings adopted by the first party either as to making the sewers or impos-

The point raised by the first question is as to the right of the first party to impose an assessment for the new sewer at such a rate as will enable them to pay off the whole expense incurred in connection therewith in twenty years; and the second question relates to the deduction allowed off the assessment so imposed to persons whose property was sufficiently drained before the new sewer was made.

Mar. 17, 1892.
Police Commissioners of
Govan v.
Mickel.

The answer to the first question depends upon the meaning and effect of sections 196 and 384 of the General Police Act of 1862, which has been adopted (at least as far as concerns questions of drainage) by the burgh of Govan. The first of these sections (196) makes it lawful to the first party to borrow money for the purpose of making sewers on the security of the sewer-rates, and declares that the provisions of the Act with respect to the borrowing of money and granting security therefor shall be applicable to the borrowing of money for the purpose of making new sewers. The only clause of the Act which makes provision for the borrowing of money and granting security therefor is the 384th, and it authorises persons in the position of the first party in fixing their assessments with a view to pay off the expenditure made or debt incurred to impose such additional assessments (under a certain limit which has not here been exceeded) "beyond the sums necessary for such respective purposes as will produce a fund equal to 5 per cent per annum upon the sum or sums so borrowed respectively,"—that is, in other words, to impose such assessments as will enable them to create a sinking fund, which in twenty years will be sufficient to pay off their debt, and interest thereon. If this clause is applicable to the expense incurred by the making of new sewers, then the first party has acted admittedly within the powers conferred by the Act, and the first party has, as is stated in the case, acted on the footing that that section is applicable. But this clause (384) commences with the declaration that it applies to the borrowing of money "for any of the purposes of this Act (other than the construction, alteration, and maintenance of sewers) as hereinbefore provided," which makes it difficult to hold that the provisions of that clause apply to the borrowing of money for the purpose of constructing sewers, which is in terms excepted from the operation of the clause. The Act therefore presents this difficulty—it authorises the borrowing of money for making sewers, according to the provisions made with reference to the borrowing of money for other purposes under the Act, and in the clause making these provisions it excepts from its operation the borrowing of money for the construction of sewers. I suppose the exception in clause 384 was inserted per incuriam under the idea that the matters there excepted had already been specially provided for in an earlier clause. However that may be, I think this peculiarity in the provisions of the Act does not present any formidable difficulty in reaching the proper answer to the first question. Either clause 384 applies to the matter of borrowing money for making sewers or it does not. If it does, there is an end of the question. The first party, in that case, have acted strictly according to the direction or provision of the Act. If it does not, then under section 196 the first party is authorised to borrow money to meet the expense of making sewers, and to pledge the sewer-rates therefor without any direction whatever as to the manner of borrowing, or the time within which the borrowed money is to be repaid. In that case, the proceedings of the first party in imposing an assessment sufficient to pay off the borrowed money by means of a sinking fund in twenty years is not forbidden by statute, and as an act of administration would be within their power, and does not in itself seem open to any good objection.

The second party further objects to the full assessment being laid upon them, No. 124. while a mere fraction of the assessment practically is imposed upon other proprietors or ratepayers in the same drainage district; while these last-mentioned proprietors or ratepayers (represented by the third party) object to their being burdened with any part of the assessment. This brings me to the second question. Mar. 17, 1892.
Police Commissioners of
Govan v. Mickel.

The power of the first party to impose the special sewer-rate in respect of the construction of any new sewer on all owners within the drainage district where the new sewer is made cannot be questioned. Such power is directly conferred by section 96. The whole assessment in question could therefore have been validly imposed on the class represented by the third party, unless they could shew that in the circumstances they were entitled to some deduction therefrom. But section 100 provides for such a deduction. It provides that the owners in the drainage district in which the new sewer is made, and whose premises were, "in the judgment of the Commissioners," sufficiently drained before the making of the new sewers, shall be entitled to a deduction from the assessment, and in fixing upon the amount of the deduction to be allowed the Commissioners are directed to have regard to the cost of making the new sewer, and the value and efficiency of the existing drainage. Now, it appears to me that the first party have acted in precise conformity with these statutory directions. They have imposed the assessment upon all the owners in the drainage district, but to those whose drainage was in their judgment sufficient before the new sewer was made they have allowed the deduction which the statute authorises. It would appear at first sight as if the Commissioners in the present case have allowed such a large deduction in favour of the third party as to amount to an exemption practically from the assessment altogether. Even had this been so, I think the Court could not have interfered with the judgment and discretion of the Commissioners in that matter—a matter left to their judgment by the statute, and one which they are better able to determine, from local knowledge, than the Court could be. But, from explanations given at the bar, it appears that the class represented by the third party actually pay (in the reduced assessment) about two-thirds of the whole assessment, while the second parties, burdened with the whole rate, only pay the remaining third. On the whole matter, therefore, it appears to me that the proceedings of the first party have been quite regular and within their competency, and that both questions put to us should be answered in the affirmative.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT answered both questions in the affirmative.

Lawrie v.
Lawrie's Trustees.

Trust—Ultra vires—Partnership—Contract between one of trustees and the trustee.—Testamentary trustees were empowered to carry on any business in which the truster might be engaged at the time of his death, or to continue his interest in any business in which he might then be partner. At the time of

No. 125. his death the truster had a retail spirit business in Glasgow, which was managed by A, his brother, who, however, asserted that by arrangement with the truster he had right to half the profits and to half the goodwill. The trustees, of whom Mar. 17, 1892. Lawrie v. Lawrie's Trustees. A was one, after taking legal advice as to A's claim, resolved to carry on this business under A's management, and the trustees allowed A to receive, as a partner, half the profits. After the business had been sold certain of the beneficiaries brought an action to have the profits so paid restored to the trust, alleging that the payments were ultra vires, on the ground that A had not been partner with the deceased, but merely manager, with a salary of half the profits. A proof was allowed. There was no written contract of copartnership, but A deponed that the truster had agreed to give him half the profits of the business, besides a share in the goodwill, in consideration of the trouble which he had had in putting the business on a satisfactory footing, the truster not having been able to look after it personally. A law-agent whom the truster occasionally consulted deponed that the truster "distinctly led me to understand his brother was a partner to the extent of one-half the business." Held that the partnership had in fact been established, and therefore that the trustees, having continued the business, were bound to allow A half the profits.

Question, whether the trustees would have been entitled to enter into a compromise of their co-trustee's claims.

1st Division. JOHN LAWRIE, wine and spirit-merchant in Glasgow and Rothsay died in 1876, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated in 1870 by which he conveyed his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, to James Wilson Lawrie, his brother, David Lawrie, and James Birrell, the son and son-in-law respectively of James Wilson Lawrie, as trustees for behoof of his children. Among the special powers conferred upon the trustees in carrying out the purposes of the settlement was a power to carry on, on account of the estate, for such time as they might think proper, any business in which the testator might be engaged at his death, or to continue for such time as they might think proper his interest in any business in which he might be a partner at his death.

The deceased at the time of his death had two wine and spirit businesses in Glasgow, one in Bath Street and the other in Queen Street. These businesses the trustees resolved to continue under the management of James Wilson Lawrie, one of their number, who received one-half of the annual profits of the Queen Street business, on the footing that he was entitled thereto as having been the partner of the deceased in that business. Both businesses were sold in 1885, and the sums received for their goodwill were credited to the trust-estate.

In 1891 certain of the children of the deceased brought an action against the trustees for count, reckoning, and payment, and for declaration that the defenders were not entitled to make payment of any part of the proceeds of the Queen Street business to James Wilson Lawrie, and were liable personally to restore the sums so paid to the estate, and for decree ordaining them to do so.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 4) " . . . The whole business belonged to the testator, who was alone interested in the profits derived therefrom. After his death the trust-estate was entitled to be credited with the whole profits accruing from the business. As to the explanation in answer, it is admitted that the testator had at his death a wine and spirit business also in Bath Street, Glasgow. Admitted that when the Queen Street business was sold the whole goodwill was credited to the deceased's estate. The defenders are called upon to produce any document instructing the said alleged arrangement. Quoad ultra denied."

The defenders denied these averments, and "explained that the testator had two wine and spirit businesses in Glasgow, but being unable to give them personal attention, he agreed with his brother, the defend-

James Wilson Lawrie, to take charge thereof under an arrangement by No. 125. which he was to receive one-half of the profits of the Queen Street business. This arrangement was entered into several years prior to the truster's death, and was in force at that time and binding upon his representatives. The arrangement was therefore continued, the defender James Wilson Lawrie taking charge of both businesses as before, and receiving one-half of the profits of the Queen Street business. The estate benefited largely by the shops being carried on, and if Mr Lawrie had not been prepared to take charge of them, the businesses must have been at once sold. When the Queen Street business was sold he voluntarily gave up his interest therein, and the whole goodwill was credited to the estate."

Lawrie v.
Lawrie's Trustees.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The defenders not having been entitled to make payment to the said James Wilson Lawrie of any portion of the said sums paid to him by them, the pursuers are entitled to declarator, count, reckoning, and payment as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The defender James Wilson Lawrie having a right to a half of the profits of the Queen Street business, the defenders were entitled to make payment of the same to him.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was almost entirely parole. The material portions of this evidence are given below.* It also appeared

* James Wilson Lawrie, who was seventy-six years of age, deponed,—“ . . . My brother had a wine and spirit business in Rothesay, and two in Glasgow. . . . He attended to the business in Rothesay himself. In the beginning of 1869 he asked me to give him some assistance in the Glasgow businesses, and I agreed to do so. . . . About the end of October or beginning of November 1869, about the end of the first year after I had been taking charge, the businesses were improving, and my brother came up and stayed with me all night. Next morning we walked over to the shops and had a look over. He was pleased with the progress they were making, and said, ‘James, you have had a good deal of trouble with the job, and I think it would be fair for me to give you half of the profit of the Queen Street business, and besides a share in the goodwill if it comes to be sold.’ I accepted that arrangement, and took up the business. He did not say what was to be the exact share of the goodwill, just a share, but I understood it to be a half. He did not say it was to be a half. I was not to have any interest in the Bath Street shop. I was to manage it as well. I did not ask for any remuneration—he volunteered it. From that time on I continued to manage both businesses until his death. . . . The position I stood in in reference to the Queen Street business was laid before the law-agent of the trust, and after considering matters there was a minute prepared to the effect that we should go on with the businesses. I continued to act in connection with them after my brother's death just in the same way as I had done during his life, down to the time when they were sold in 1885. . . . When the shops were sold I made a claim for a share of the goodwill of the Queen Street shop, which I considered I was entitled to. I claimed a half of the amount received for goodwill, and I held to that to the last. My view was that I was entitled to a half. I insisted upon my claim at first, but there was a scruple about it, and I said I would rather give them the benefit of it and take nothing than have it considered that I was exorbitant. . . . (Q.) Did your brother speak to you several times about giving you payment for the work you were doing? (A.) Not to begin with, but after that it was understood. (Q.) And the way in which you were to be paid was by your getting half the profits of the Queen Street shop? (A.) Yes, and a share of the goodwill, which I understood was one-half. (Q.) You were to be paid for your work by getting those two things? (A.) Yes. There was no one present at the meeting between me and my brother when that arrangement was made.”

Thomas William Alexander, writer in Rothesay, deponed,—“I was well acquainted with the deceased Mr John Lawrie. . . . He frequently consulted me on matters of business. He mentioned to me an arrangement that he had with his brother, Mr James W. Lawrie, as to the management of his Glasgow shops. I cannot remember the details of the conversation, it is so long ago; but he several times mentioned to me in the course of conversation that his brother was managing his Glasgow shops, and that on that account he had given him a share in one of them. He said he had given him a half share in the Queen Street shop. As far as I recollect that was a phrase he used. . . . Cross.—" . . . I just remember the general terms of the conversation (Q.) In fact, anything he said to you might be quite consistent with Mr James Lawrie managing the business and getting half the profits as salary? (A.) No, there was nothing said about that; he distinctly led me to understand his brother was a partner to the extent of one-half in the business."

David Murray (of Messrs Maclay, Murray, & Spens, writer in Glasgow, deponed that he was law-agent of the trustee and of the trustees:—"At the meeting of the trustees on 30th May 1876, the arrangement which had subsisted prior to Mr John Lawrie's death, between him and his brother, was explained to me. It had been explained to me two days before that by Mr David Lawrie. At the meeting of trustees it was again explained by Mr James Lawrie. . . . It was arranged that I should make some further inquiries. . . . What was put to me by the trustees was, that it was of great importance that the business should be carried on, and the trustees had in their minds that it would require to be carried on in that way or given up. They did not see their way to put the business in the hands of an outside person. It was explained to me that the importance of carrying on the business was because the income otherwise would be short. There were a number of children, and it was stated that the family could not be maintained and educated without the assistance of the business, and the sole effort was to see whether or not the business could be carried on as before, to provide additional income for the benefit of the family. I put myself into communication with Mr Alexander, writer, Rothesay, . . . It was by one of the defenders that I was referred to Mr Alexander, . . . and after I received Mr Alexander's letter and had considered it and the other information I had got, and had made up my mind, I advised Mr David Lawrie, and through him, I understood, the trustees as a whole, that Mr James Lawrie was entitled to this share of the business, and that the trustees could carry on on the same footing as before." Cross.—" (Q.) On what footing did you understand at the time he was receiving the half of the proceeds? (A.) My view of the legal relationship at the time was this, that Mr James Lawrie had got a half interest in this business, and that the trustees could not dispose of that business without his consent, and could not let it drop without his consent, and that if they carried on they were bound to give him a half interest. (Q.) Was the only reason for your coming to that conclusion, that you had been told that he had got from his brother half the profits of one of the businesses? (A.) And likewise that he had got the half interests; that is how it was put by Mr Alexander. (Q.) What meaning did you attach to half interest? (A.) What I have said just now. (Q.) That he was a partner to the extent of one-half. (A.) It would come to that legally but the word 'partner' was not used."

profits of a certain public-house business in Glasgow, which profits were, after the truster's death and until the business was sold some years afterwards, divided between the trust-estate and one of the trustees, the defender Mr J. W. Lawrie. The present pursuers are some of the children of the truster. They challenge the action of the trustees in dividing or permitting the division of the profits, alleging that the business belonged to the truster, and that it was illegal for the trustees to make any arrangement, whether with respect to its management or otherwise, which involved making or continuing payments out of the profits to one of their own number.

"The action belongs to a class where there is always more or less delicacy, and where it is necessary for the Court to be on the one hand jealous of any attempt to get behind the salutary rule that a trustee must not make a profit out of his trust, and on the other hand, to take care that this rule is not applied in circumstances to which it is not properly applicable. In the present case, the whole facts have now been ascertained by a proof, and the result has been to satisfy me that the action of the trustees was not inconsistent with the strictest principles of trust law.

"I do not think it necessary to recapitulate the facts, but I think the division of the profits complained of was legitimate upon two grounds, either of which would, in my view, have been sufficient.

"In the first place, I am satisfied, upon the evidence, that the defender J. W. Lawrie is speaking the truth when he states that during the truster's life, and shortly after he (the defender) took the oversight of the truster's two shops, it was agreed between them that he (the defender) should, in consideration of his doing so, have a joint interest in the profits and goodwill of one of the shops, viz, the shop now in question. The agreement was no doubt verbal, but it was natural and probable in itself. It was acted on for years, and up to the truster's death, and its terms are not only spoken to by Mr Lawrie himself, but also by Mr Alexander, the truster's agent in Rothesay, to whom the truster communicated the arrangement he had made with his brother. I saw no reason to doubt the evidence of either of those witnesses. They both impressed me as speaking the truth, and Mr Alexander, besides being a quite impartial witness, has this also in his favour, that on being applied to at the time of the truster's death, he made to the agents of the truster, by letter, exactly the same statement as he made in the witness-box. It is not enough, I think, to detract from this direct and positive evidence that the precise share of the goodwill was not expressed, or that J. W. Lawrie, while insisting on his right to half of the business, waived, at his son's request, his claim to a half of the goodwill when sold. One is always disposed to be critical of explanations given ex post facto in such matters, but I am bound to say that on the whole I see no reason for distrusting this part of the defender's evidence.

"If this be so,—that is to say, if Mr J. W. Lawrie had a joint interest in the business in question,—there is, of course, an end of the case. So long as the business was carried on, and the trustees had power to carry it on, Mr J. W. Lawrie was entitled to one-half of the profits, and his co-trustees, in continuing the arrangement which had been in force up to the truster's death, made no concession and did nothing which they could help doing if they were to carry on the business at all.

"But in the second place, I am not prepared to reject the alternative argument also submitted by the defender. Supposing it to be held that the evidence is insufficient to prove the alleged joint interest in the business, the fact still remains that J. W. Lawrie claimed that interest, and pressed his claim, and did so on at least reasonable grounds, and in entire good faith. What in these circumstances were the trustees to do? Were they bound to litigate the question, sacrificing in the meantime the business, which, if carried on at all, could only be carried on with Mr J. W. Lawrie's assistance? I should hesitate to affirm that proposition. But if not, what better could they have done in the interest

No. 125. enforcing that claim against the trust merely by reason of the circumstance that he was a trustee; but in order to take a case out of the rule that a trustee was not entitled to act in rem suam in reference to trust matters, a contract entitling him to claim against the trust must be very clearly established.¹ The proof here failed to establish that Mr J. W. Lawrie was the partner of his brother, the truster, in the Queen Street business. A written contract of partnership was not alleged, and the proof of the alleged partnership consisted entirely of the evidence of Mr J. W. Lawrie himself and Mr Alexander, for the other trustees and Mr Murray spoke only to what they had heard from one or other of these two. Now, neither Mr J. W. Lawrie nor Mr Alexander said that the deceased had in so many words assumed his brother as his partner in the Queen Street business; it was rather their inference from what he told them. Mr Lawrie's account—which was the stronger of the two for the defenders—came to this, that he was to have half the profits and “a share” of the goodwill “if it comes to be sold.” The fair meaning of that was that he was to be paid half the profits of the Queen Street business as his remuneration for managing the two Glasgow businesses, on the understanding that he was to have such a share of the goodwill as his brother might determine, if his brother thought fit to sell the business. In other words, he was to be manager, not partner. The actings of the trustees bore out that view, for Mr J. W. Lawrie did not receive a share of the goodwill, and while he continued to receive half the profits he bore none of the losses. In any view the partnership was no more than a partnership at will, which terminated by the death of the truster; so that the trustees were truly entering into a new partnership with one of their own number—that was to say, they were creating a new contract, not merely fulfilling the obligations of a contract which already existed when they came into office. In substance therefore the case was identical with Mackie's case,² where it was proposed to increase the share of the trustee-partner. But it was said—and this was the Lord Ordinary's alternative ground of judgment—that even if Mr J. W. Lawrie should be held not to have been his brother's partner, his position was so doubtful as to make it a fair subject of compromise with the view of avoiding litigation. It might be that it was a fair subject for compromise had the question been with a stranger to the trust; but for trustees to enter into a compromise with one of their own number was nothing else than to enter into a contract of the trust than they did do? They placed the matter in the hands of their law-agent, Dr Murray, than whom nobody stands higher in his profession, and he made inquiry and came to the conclusion that the claim was good, whereupon the trustees, acting on his advice, arranged with their co-trustee that both the truster's businesses should be carried on as formerly under his oversight, he receiving the same share of profits of the one business which he had received all along. It is admitted that in result this arrangement was greatly to the benefit of the trust, and provided an income on which the beneficiaries were brought up and educated, and I am not able to say that, although made with one of their own number, it was in the circumstances beyond the trustees' powers. If trustees compound or transact a claim made by one of their number, they must, I admit, either shew that it was a good claim in law, or, that being more or less doubtful, they made a settlement of which the Court can approve. But I am not prepared to say that the latter may not sometimes be as good a defence as the former.”

with him, which was ultra vires. It was not indeed clear wherein the compromise here consisted, for Mr J. W. Lawrie simply continued to manage the business and to receive half the profits, which was all that he claimed.

Argued for the defenders;—The evidence established that Mr J. W. Lawrie had been assumed by his brother as his partner in the Queen Street business. The right to profits was prima facie evidence of a partnership,¹ and the other evidence corroborated this presumption. It was immaterial that it was a partnership at will, for it gave Mr Lawrie certain rights; if the trustees resolved to continue the business they could do so only on the footing of recognising these rights. They had power to continue the business, and no question was raised as to the propriety of doing so as an act of trust management. It was at all events a fair act of trust administration for the trustees to enter into a compromise of Mr Lawrie's claims. To hold that trustees could under no circumstances transact with one of their own number was to stretch the rule which prohibited trustees from entering on their own account into contracts with the trust beyond all reasonable limits, for that would oblige trustees to litigate every matter in which one of them had interest adverse to the trust, unless his right was clear beyond all dispute. The present was a case in which the trustees, acting on all the advice and information which they could obtain, had come to the conclusion that the business ought to be continued on the footing on which the truster had left it; and so acting they had done well in the interests of the beneficiaries, and would be protected.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a difficult case, but I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to, on the ground that at the death of John Lawrie the defender was his partner in the Queen Street business. That is the view which was acted on by persons of whom it is to be observed that if some were interested, all are believed by the Lord Ordinary to be honest men. Moreover, his Lordship, apart from any presumption arising from those actings, is satisfied by the testimony given before him on the main issue of fact. I should be slow to differ from a conclusion so arrived at, and I have come to be satisfied that it is correct.

The case of the pursuers consisted of an attempt to make out that the true position of Mr J. W. Lawrie was that of a manager, paid by a share in profits; and if this were so, he would have been disqualified from taking such remuneration for his services from the trust-estate while he acted as trustee. The evidence, however, does not seem to support the pursuers. When the truster died, Messrs MacLay, Murray, & Spens, who had prepared his settlement, and were acting for his trustees, applied to Mr Alexander, a writer in Rothesay, who had been on intimate terms with the deceased, to inform them of what he knew of the arrangement between the deceased and Mr J. W. Lawrie as to the Glasgow shops. Mr Alexander replied that the deceased had more than once mentioned the arrangement in general terms, and that he had given Mr J. W. Lawrie a half interest in the Queen Street business. Mr Alexander is examined in this case; he is a witness of unquestioned credit and impartiality, and he says the deceased told him he had given his brother James a half share of the Queen Street shop. In cross-examination, the pursuer's counsel put to Mr Alexander the theory of

 Mar. 17, 1892. "(Q.) In fact anything he said to you might be quite consistent with Mr James Lawrie v. Lawrie managing the business and getting half the profits as salary? (A) No, Lawrie's Trustees. there was nothing said about that; he distinctly led me to understand his brother was a partner to the extent of one-half in the business." This is therefore plain and unambiguous evidence of a partnership, as distinguished from a managership with a salary of one-half of the profits.

The pursuers, however, have fastened upon certain expressions in the evidence of Mr James Lawrie, in giving his account of the interview at which the arrangement between him and his brother was made, as supporting their theory. Applying to one part of his deposition a rather strict construction, they say that he represents his brother as having agreed to give him one-half of the profits and a share of the proceeds of the goodwill when sold. It is pretty plain that if what was given was a half share of profits and a share of the goodwill, the pursuers' case would be most arduous; for on that state of facts Mr James Lawrie could hardly have escaped liability to third parties as a partner. But if Mr James Lawrie's evidence be read as a whole (and he is seventy-six years of age), it is plain enough that in the passage in which they occur the words "if it comes to be sold" are not meant to qualify the words "besides a share in the goodwill," but rather point to the event in which his share in the goodwill would sound in money. Indeed, the pursuers themselves have helped to clear his meaning by their cross-examination, for when they asked him, "And the way you were to be paid was by your getting half the profits of the Queen Street shop?" he replied "Yes, and a share of the goodwill, which I understand was one-half."

Such is the direct evidence of the agreement between the brothers. Mr James Lawrie and his son David Lawrie seem to have acted frankly and above board in placing the facts before Mr Murray, the experienced and able adviser of the deceased and of his trustees; he made independent inquiry, as already stated, and Mr James Lawrie's position as a partner was recognised till the business was sold, the trustees having elected to exercise the powers expressly conferred by the truster to continue for such time as they might think proper his interest in any business in which he might be a partner at his death. He was a partner in none if not in this; and this provision has, in the result, proved admirably advantageous to the truster's children, some of whom are now challenging the actings of the trustees in this regard. The pursuers have made several points on the actings of the parties in the administration of the trust as bearing against the existence of a partnership. Only two of these require notice,—(1) that the trust-estate bore certain losses in the Queen Street business, and that Mr James Lawrie did not bear his share; (2) that he did not claim any part of the proceeds of the goodwill when it was sold. The same explanation answers both points. An arrangement was come to by which Mr James Lawrie waived his claim to a share of the goodwill, and the estate bore the loss. As the loss was only £57, and the goodwill, even for inventory purposes, was valued at £200, it is not surprising that the point about the losses was not put in cross-examination to Mr James Lawrie.

My opinion is that James Lawrie was a partner of his brother in the Queen Street business; and this entitles the defenders to the judgment which the Lord Ordinary has pronounced.

It is right to add that I do not adopt the alternative ground of judgment.

stated by the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship speaks of the trustees compounding or transacting or making a settlement. In fact, the defenders did none of these things. What they did was, they simply admitted the claim on the footing that it was well founded. I think that the claim was well founded, and therefore that they were right. I am not called on therefore to decide whether three trustees, father, son, and son-in-law, could in law defend their admission of a claim by the father on any ground short of this. Still less is it necessary to do more than express a reservation of my opinion as to the conditions under which the compromise of such claim by trustees so situated could be successfully defended.

Lawrie v. Lawrie's Trustees.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. I would just wish to call attention to this fact, that under the deed of trust there was a power to the trustees to carry on any business in which the truster might be engaged, either alone or in partnership. Therefore if at the time of his death it was found that there was a subsisting partnership between him and his brother, the trustees were not under any disability in consequence of the ordinary rules of trust administration from continuing to leave the truster's money in its then state of investment. But no doubt this was technically a partnership at will, because there was no written contract, and therefore strictly speaking it came to an end at the truster's death. But then it came to an end under the condition that—if we are to accept the evidence as to the terms of partnership—the brother would have been entitled to have the business sold and the goodwill divided. Now, in these circumstances it appears to me to be quite consistent with sound principles of trust administration that with a power to continue the business the trustees should enter into a renewal of the partnership arrangement which had subsisted, taking care to give no increase of interest to the partner who was one of their own number. There are many cases in the books in which the question of the propriety of trustees entering into partnership with one of their own number has been discussed; but I know of no case where it has been held objectionable to continue the partnership arrangement where there was a power given to the trustees to invest money in trade, and no greater interest given to the deceased's partners than they had before. If it had been proposed to give a larger share as a consideration for the additional trouble in the management of the business, that would have raised a very different question, and one which probably we would not have been able to decide in the same way as we have done the present case. I agree with your Lordship's analysis of the evidence. I think the evidence leaves no doubt that this was a proper partnership, and not an arrangement which is no doubt quite legal but rather unusual, especially in businesses of a small class, that of appointing a manager with a salary proportioned to his share of the profits.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur with your Lordship, and also with Lord M'Laren, and have nothing to add.

 Anderson v. Anderson's Trustee.

Bankruptcy—Husband and Wife—Property of wife entrusted to husband—Married Women's Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 1, subsec. (4).
 —The Married Women's Property Act, 1881, enacts with regard to a wife's separate estate on the occasion of bankruptcy of the husband (sec. 1, subsec. 4), that any estate of the wife, "lent or entrusted to the husband," shall be treated as assets of the husband's estate in bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend after the claims of other creditors have been satisfied.

A husband whose wife had separate estate delivered to his wife a sale-note whereby, on the narrative that from time to time he had received from her separate estate sums amounting in all to £225, he sold to her in consideration of that sum the whole furniture in the house they occupied, conform to inventory. About seven months afterwards the husband's estates were sequestrated. The wife then sought to interdict the husband's trustee from interfering with the furniture.

After a proof the Court refused interdict, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner holding that, on the assumption of a bona fide sale by the husband to the wife, the furniture was estate of the wife entrusted to the husband, Lord Rutherford Clark holding that no bona fide sale had been proved.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Caithness.

THE estates of the Reverend William Anderson, minister of the parish of Pulteneytown, were sequestrated on 4th September 1891.

The trustee, Mr R. S. W. Leith, having proposed, for the purposes of the sequestration, to make an inventory of the furniture in the house occupied by the bankrupt, Mrs Anderson, the bankrupt's wife, who maintained that the household furniture was her property, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Wick to interdict the trustee from making an inventory of or selling or interfering with the furniture.

The pursuer stated that she had separate means derived from her father, and that on 9th December 1890 her husband sold and delivered to her the household furniture for £225, conform to sale-note produced further, that £225 was a full and just price, and was truly paid.

The sale-note was as follows:—"I, William Harley Anderson, AM minister of Pulteneytown, residing at Rosemount, Wick, hereby acknowledge that I have received from Mrs Mary Benvie or Anderson, my wife, out of her separate estate the sum of two hundred and twenty-five pounds sterling (£225), which has been paid to her at various times since the death of her father, . . . by the agents for his trustees; . . . in consideration of which sum of £225, paid by her to me, I have sold to her all my moveable goods and effects, consisting of the furniture and plenishing of this my house, situated at Rosemount, Wick, a particular statement of which follows."—(An inventory followed.)

The defender denied that the furniture was pursuer's, and denied the bona fides of the alleged transaction. He pleaded;—(4) The deed in question having been granted by an insolvent to a conjunct or confidential person, to the prejudice of his prior creditors, and without true and necessary cause, and without payment of a just price therefor, is ab initio null and void. (5) The deed in question having been made by the bankrupt, and received by the pursuer in the knowledge of the bankrupt's insolvency, and having been made gratuitously and with intent fraudulently to defeat the rights of the bankrupt's creditors, is voidable at the defender's instance, and falls to be set aside. (6) The household furniture and effects referred to not having been delivered but allowed to remain in the bankrupt's possession and use, the alleged sale is invalid.

Proof was led. The bankrupt and the pursuer deposed that the latter from time to time handed over the separate income she was receiving from her father's trust to the former on condition that the furniture was to be hers when the value of it was paid up; that this occurred in December 1890, when the last instalment of £225, which was the true value, was paid, and that the bankrupt then wrote out the sale-note. The furniture remained as before in the possession of the spouses.

Anderson v.
Anderson's
Trustee.

The Sheriff-substitute (Mackenzie), on 18th February 1892, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that in the end of 1885 or beginning of 1886 the pursuer and the said Reverend W. H. Anderson entered into an agreement by which the pursuer was to pay money from her separate estate to the value of the household furniture belonging to her said husband, in return for which the furniture was to be sold by him to her: Finds that payments to an amount exceeding the sum of £225 were so made by her to him at various times from the 4th January 1886 till the 8th December 1890: Finds that on 9th December 1890 the said Reverend W. H. Anderson wrote and handed to the pursuer the document No. 5 of process [the sale-note]: Finds that subsequently to that date the furniture remained in the joint use and enjoyment of the pursuer and her husband: Finds in law that a contract of sale was entered into between the pursuer and her husband, which is set forth in the said document: Finds that no delivery of the furniture followed upon said contract: Finds that the said furniture has been 'lent or entrusted' by the pursuer to her said husband and 'immixed with his funds,' in the sense of sec. 1, subsec. (4), of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21):* Finds therefore that under sec. 2, subsec. (2) of the said Act, the only claim which the pursuer can have, if she any have to the said furniture, is a claim in terms of the subsection of the said Act first above mentioned: Finds it is inexpedient to decide in this process the validity or value of such claim, as it is in any view insufficient to entitle the pursuer to interdict as concluded for: Finds that the pursuer is not entitled to interdict in terms of the prayer of the petition: Therefore recalls the interim interdict granted on 28th September last: Assolutes the defender from the conclusions of the action."

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The bona fides of the sale was proved, and the Sheriff had affirmed it. The subjects were transferred by writing. There was all the delivery that the subjects were capable of. They were the articles used in the dwelling-house, and the pursuer could not have been expected formally to remove them.¹ As to the Married Women's Property Act, the furniture had not been lent or entrusted to the husband by remaining in the only place in which she could keep it, if they were to live together and use it.²

The defender argued;—The transaction was not bona fide. It was the pretended sale shortly before bankruptcy of the bankrupt's furniture to

* The Married Women's Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 21), enacts, sec. 1, subsec. 3.—"Liability to Arrestment.—Except as hereinafter provided, the wife's moveable estate shall not be subject to arrestment, or other diligence of the law, for the husband's debts, provided that the said estate (except such corporeal moveables as are usually possessed without a written or documentary title) is invested, placed, or secured in the name of the wife herself, or in such terms as shall clearly distinguish the same from the estate of the husband."

Subsec. (4).—"Bankruptcy.—Any money or other estate of the wife lent or entrusted to the husband or immixed with his funds shall be treated as assets of the husband's estate in bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend as a creditor for the value of such money or other estate after, but not before, the claims of the other creditors of the husband for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied."

a conjunct and confident person, and without delivery. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act* did not apply to such a case, as the case of Sim shewed, for there was not only left with the seller the "custody," but the use and possession. Assuming the sale, it was clear that the pursuer "entrusted" the bankrupt with the furniture. Anyone buying it from him before the sequestration would have had a good title.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If it were necessary in this case to decide whether the transaction between the bankrupt husband and his wife, the appellant, was a bona fide transaction, I must say I should have difficulty in holding that it was. My impression at present is decidedly to the contrary. But the Sheriff-substitute has decided that it was, and it is unnecessary to form an absolute opinion upon it, for I agree with the Sheriff in this, that whatever is the truth of the transaction, this furniture was certainly "entrusted to the husband." It remained after the transaction (which I am assuming to convey it bona fide to the wife) in the house in which the husband resided, and continued to be used by the spouses as before. In these circumstances, I think it does not fall under the protection afforded to the wife's property from the husband's creditors under the Married Women's Property Act, but under the clause making an exception from such protection. As it was furniture of the wife entrusted to the husband in the sense of the Act of 1881, sec. 1, subsec. (4), I do not think that either of the spouses is entitled to interfere with the husband's creditors obtaining possession of it.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. Prima facie, and in the absence of anything to the contrary, I think that the trustee for creditors is entitled to take possession of this furniture. The question is whether this pursuer, who desires to interdict him, has proved anything to the contrary. I think she has not. The furniture was originally the husband's. The wife says that in 1880, a few months before the sequestration, the furniture was sold to her. She is entitled to a small income (between £40 and £50 per annum) from her father's estate, and she says that during ten years before his bankruptcy the husband drew that income and spent it. The allegation is that when the spouses reckoned up matters in 1890 it was found that the husband had thus got £225, and it was agreed that the furniture should be sold to her by a bill of sale for that sum, which was a "full and just price," and "truly paid" by Mrs Anderson for the furniture. Now that may have been an honest enough transaction, but at first sight I am not favourably impressed by it. The husband was embarrassed in his circumstances and owed money to various tradesmen when he arranged with his wife that she should be the purchaser of the furniture, which was thus to be put beyond reach of these tradesmen. It has not prima facie an honest aspect, and certainly appears to have been intended to frustrate these honest creditors of their right to obtain payment by diligence against the husband's effects. My opinion is that the transaction ought not to be sustained as an honest lawful sale to the wife, and therefore that we do not require to consider questions which have been raised under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act and under the Married Women's Property Act. I doubt if the former of these Acts applies to such a case. In considering that Act we are in the region of fine distinctions. The cases on that Act and the considerations arising in them create fine distinctions.

* The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 60), enacted, sec. 1, that "where goods have been sold but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent to any creditor of such seller after the date of such sale to attach such goods as belonging to the seller by any diligence or process of law, including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser or others in his right from enforcing delivery of the same, and the right of the purchaser to demand delivery of such goods shall, from and after the date of such sale, be attachable by or transferable to the creditors of the purchaser."

Anderson v.
Anderson's
Trustee.

But if we assume the integrity of the transaction, and that the wife honestly bought the furniture from her husband, intending it to be used of course by her husband and herself and their children—there is no indication of delivery—that was not a transaction within the meaning and spirit of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. You may get words in the Act to cover that, but qui hæret in litera hæret in cortice. It may be only within the Act in a very formal sense, and not within the intendment of it at all.

As to the Married Women's Property Act, I think this is a case of entrusting the husband with the furniture. It was the only furniture in the house. He had a duty to keep his house furnished and habitable for his wife and children. He would not fulfil that duty by providing them with the bare walls of an unfurnished house. He ought to have a furnished house. The furniture was entrusted to him in order that he should perform this duty. That exposes it to the diligence of the husband's creditors.

My opinion is that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is right, and ought to be adhered to.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of opinion that the furniture should go to the creditors, and I put my opinion on the ground that I am not satisfied that there was a bona fide transaction by which the wife acquired a right to it.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree in the conclusion reached by the Sheriff. I am not prepared to say whether there was a bona fide sale or not. There is much, I think, to be said on both sides of that question. Assuming the bona fides of the transaction, I agree with Lord Young on the question of the application of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act.

Succession — Legitim — Satisfaction — Provision in marriage-contract.—A father in his son's antenuptial marriage-contract bound himself to leave to his son's marriage-contract trustees one full third part in value of the residue of his estate. The provision was not declared to be in satisfaction of the son's legitim. 2D DIVISION.

ON 5th January 1891 the Honourable Walter Arbuthnott, a domiciled Scotsman, died survived by his wife and two children, Major Walter Charles Warner Arbuthnott, and Mrs Kathleen Georgina Arbuthnott or Rait, both of whom had issue. The widow of the deceased died intestate on 17th March 1891.

The deceased left a will and testament dated 27th July 1886, by which he nominated and appointed Lieutenant-Colonel Arthur John Rait of Anniston, Forfarshire, to be his sole executor, with full power to him to intromit with his whole moveable estate.

The deed contained the following directions :—"To pay and perform the obligations undertaken by me in antenuptial contract of marriage between the said Arthur John Rait and my daughter Mrs Kathleen Georgina Arbuthnott now Rait; in the third place, to pay and perform the obligations undertaken by me in the marriage-settlements entered into on the marriage of my son Walter Charles Warner Arbuthnott and Miss Emma Marion Hall Parlby; in the fourth and last place, in regard to the residue or remainder of my whole means and estate, I hereby direct and appoint my said executor to pay to my said wife the free income thereof during the whole days of her life, and after her death or after my death, if she shall predecease me, I leave and bequeath the life-ent of the said residue or remainder to the said Walter Charles Warner Arbuthnott during the whole days of his life; and in regard to the fee of the said residue or remainder, I hereby leave and bequeath the same to the child or children of my said son, with power to my said son to apportion the said fee amongst his children in such manner as he may think right, and failing such apportionment, the said fee shall be payable amongst the said children equally, share and share alike."

Major Arbuthnott's marriage-contract, here referred to, was dated 14th January 1878, and was executed in English form. By it the father bound himself, in the event of his son or his son's wife or any issue of the marriage surviving him (the father), to "well and effectually give, devise, and bequeath unto, or otherwise cause to be vested in the trustees, one full third part in value at least of the residue, after payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, of all the heritable and moveable property and other real and personal estate to which he the said Walter Arbuthnott, or any person or persons in trust for him, shall at his death be entitled, in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy, or otherwise howsoever," but subject to any provision which he might make out of the income thereof for his (the deceased's) widow, "and that in case he, the said Walter Arbuthnott, shall not in any manner, and subject only as aforesaid, well and effectually give, devise, and bequeath unto or otherwise cause to be vested in the trustees, one full third part in value at least of such residue as last aforesaid, then one-third part in value at least of such residue as last aforesaid shall immediately after the death of him the said Walter Arbuthnott, and at the cost of his estate, and subject only as aforesaid, be assured and transferred by his heirs, devisees, executors, and administrators, and all other necessary parties, if any, unto or otherwise vested in the trustees." No. 127.

Mar. 18, 1892.
Rait v. Arbuthnott.

The trustees were directed to pay the income of the funds so to be provided by the deceased to his son, Major Arbuthnott, during his life, to his wife, Mrs Emma Parlbay or Arbuthnott, on survivance, for her life, and to pay the capital to the issue of the marriage, and failing such issue, to Major Arbuthnott, his executors, administrators, and assignees. This provision was not declared to be in satisfaction of Major Arbuthnott's legitim.

In the marriage-contract of Mrs Rait (also referred to in the above clause in the will), and which was in Scots form, there was this provision,—"And the said Honourable Walter Arbuthnott hereby binds and obliges himself and his heirs, executors, and successors to make payment at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after his death to" the marriage-contract trustees "and their foresaids, as trustees aforesaid, for the ends, uses, and purposes hereinafter written, one just and equal third part of the whole property, heritable and moveable, real and personal, which shall belong to him, the said Walter Arbuthnott, at the time of his death." The deed contained no reference to legitim.

Questions having arisen upon, inter alia, the construction of the bequest in the will in favour of Major Arbuthnott, a special case was presented to the Court by (1) Colonel Rait; and (2) Major Arbuthnott. The first party maintained that the effect of the bequest was to give the second party a mere lifereit interest in the residue or remainder of the means and estate of the deceased, and that it was his, the first party's, duty, as executor of the deceased, to retain the residue and remainder, paying the income thereof to the second party, and holding the fee for behoof of the second party's children. On the other hand, the second party maintained that the terms of the bequest in his favour were such as to entitle him to the fee of the residue, and that the first party was bound to hand over to him the said residue or remainder as his own absolute property; or alternatively, that if he, the second party, had no right to the fee of the said residue and remainder, the first party was not entitled to retain the said residue and remainder, but was bound to hand over the same to the second party for behoof of himself and his children, according to their respective rights of lifereit and fee.

Further, in the event of its being found that the bequest in favour of the second party conferred upon him merely a lifereit right, he maintained that, in addition to the trustees under his marriage-settlement being entitled, by virtue thereof, and of his father's will, to receive one-third of his father's estate, he himself was entitled to claim legitim out of the estate remaining, after deducting the amounts payable, under the obligations undertaken by his father, in his own and his sister Mrs Rait's marriage-contracts. The first party, on the other hand, maintained that any claim for legitim by the second party was excluded by the provision made by his father for him in his marriage-settlement.

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—(1) Whether the bequest in favour of the second party, contained in the fourth purpose of the said last will and testament, confers upon him a right to the fee of the residue and remainder of the estate of the Honourable Walter Arbuthnott? (2) In the event of the foregoing question being answered in the negative, whether the first party is bound to retain the said residue and remainder in his own hands until the death of the second party, paying to the latter only the income thereof; or, whether the first party is bound to pay over said residue and remainder to the second party for behoof of himself and his children, according to their respective rights, and if so, on what terms and under what conditions, if any? (3) Whether the second party, in addition to the performance of the obligations undertaken by the Honourable Walter Arbuthnott in his, the second party's, marriage-settlement, is entitled to legitim out of the residue of his father's estate remaining after performance of the obligations contained in the second party's marriage-settlement, and in the marriage-contract of the first party and Mrs Kathleen Georgina Arbuthnott or Rait?"

Argued for the first party;—(1) The rule laid down in the case of Frog's Creditors,¹—that a gift to a parent in liferent and to his children nascituri in fee imported a fee in the parent,—which was said to be applicable to the destination in the fourth purpose of the will, was very technical, and had not been viewed with much favour. At most it only applied to destinations by which the granter of a conveyance was so completely divested of the fee that a feudal necessity arose for the application of the rule. It had no application where there occurred a direction to hold, e.g. to continuing trusts, or where the testator shewed an obvious intention to limit to a liferent by using the word "allenary" or in some other way.² In the present destination there was no divestiture of the testator. The direction to pay the liferent was quite separate from the direction to pay the fee. Moreover, the father had a power of apportionment which was quite inconsistent with his taking the fee. In short there was here a continuing trust,³ and not a trace of a direction to the executor to pay over the whole estate at once. The second party's interest then in the residue was limited to a liferent. (2) Being entitled to receive one-third of his father's estate in virtue of his marriage-contract and the will, the second party was not also entitled to legitim out of the residue. A child's claim to legitim might be discharged in three ways,—(1) by the parents so providing in their antenuptial marriage-contract; (2) by the child agreeing to discharge it; and (3) by the child's accepting a provision given in lieu of legitim, e.g., in a general settlement. Now the obligation contained in the son's marriage-contract was one to make such a provision, and that having been made and accepted, the second party's claim to legitim must be held to have been discharged. The fund of which the provision was to be one-third was the whole moveable estate.

Argued for the second party;—(1) The rule established by Frog's Creditors, whether good or bad, was fixed and applied in terms to the bequest in his favour in the will. The rule had been applied in later cases.⁴ When such a rule was established and recognised its justice or injustice in the abstract was of less importance to the community than that the rule itself should be constant and invariable.⁵ There was nothing here resembling a continuing trust, except perhaps the direction to pay the liferent to the widow, a payment which ceased at her death. The destination was in short a direction to pay to all intents and purposes the same as that in Frog's Creditors, and imported a fee in the second party. (2) Should it be held that the bequest only conferred upon him a liferent, he was entitled to reject it and to claim legitim. There was no actual discharge of his legal rights, and no room for presumed discharge. The obligation contained in the marriage-contract being for an onerous consideration was a debt due by the testator, and therefore must be deducted from his estate before the legitim fund was ascertained. The obligation was not in any sense a testamentary provision in a general settlement of the testator's effects.¹

Arbuthnott.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The late Honourable Walter Arbuthnott had a son and a daughter, both of whom were married during his lifetime. In their marriage-settlements, to which he was a party, he bound himself to leave to each one-third of the value of the residue of his estate, subject to any income he might leave to his widow out of the annual proceeds of his residue. By his testament, which is dated 27th July 1886, he appointed the first party to be his sole executor, and directed him to fulfil these obligations in the children's marriage-contracts. He then directed his executor as follows:—"In the fourth and last place, in regard to the residue or remainder of my whole means and estate, I hereby direct and appoint my said executor to pay to my said wife the free income thereof during the whole days of her life, and after her death, or after my death, if she shall predecease me, I leave and bequeath the liferent of the said residue or remainder to the said Walter Charles Warner Arbuthnott during the whole days of his life; and in regard to the fee of the said residue or remainder, I hereby leave and bequeath the same to the child or children of my said son, with power to my said son to apportion the said fee amongst his children in such manner as he may think right, and failing such apportionment the said fee shall be payable amongst the said children equally, share and share alike." The first question which arises on this clause is whether the second party is entitled to the fee of the residue. It appears to me that the answer to that question is not doubtful. The words of the deed are express and unambiguous. They effectually and separately dispose of the liferent and of the fee by two separate bequests. There is here no question of a fee left hanging in doubt; it is expressly bequeathed to others than the person to whom the liferent is bequeathed. The words of the deed are too clear for doubt.

The second question proceeds upon the assumption that the answer to the first question is as I have already answered it, and relates to the control of the fee during the subsistence of the liferent. Is the first party to hold it, or must he hand it over to the second party? The answer to that question seems to me to be equally clear. The second party having no right to the fee, but only a right of apportionment, to take effect on the lapse of his liferent, I hold that the first alternative of the second question must be answered in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

The third question is whether the second party is entitled to claim legitim out of the residue of the estate remaining after the marriage-contract obligations have been fulfilled. I see no principle upon which he can be excluded from demanding his legal rights should he be advised to do so. The sum payable to

No. 127. his marriage-contract trustees is a debt due under contract by the father's estate, and not a bequest in any way to the second party so as to compel him to give up his legal rights to a share of the residue left after contract obligations have been met. There is nothing in the deed which can debar him from claiming these rights. I therefore propose to answer the third question in the affirmative.

LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare in answer to the first question, that the bequest there mentioned in favour of the second party does not confer upon him a right to the fee of the residue and remainder of the estate in question: In answer to the second question, that the first party is bound to retain the said residue and remainder in his own hands until the death of the second party; and quoad ultra answer the second question in the negative; answer the third question in the affirmative . . ."

He further stated that he was entirely ignorant of the whole proceedings until some time after the sale had taken place. The defenders stated that the registered letters had been sent to the last address known to them, and therefore that there had been due service in terms of the Citation Amendment Act, 1882.

Held (1) that the action in so far as founded on the alleged irregularities in the service of the summons and of the inventory and appraisement was incompetent, all review of a small-debt decree, including procedure leading up to the decree, being excluded by the 30th section of the Small-Debt Act, 1837. (2) that the action in so far as founded on the alleged want of notice prior to sale was competent, the Small-Debt Act not protecting diligence following a small-debt decree, and (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that the pursuer's averments were not irrelevant for want of specification.

1ST DIVISION. ON 6th July 1891 Robert Gray, journeyman baker, Crockenzie, brought an action against Miss Ellen Smart, proprietrix of the house No. 10 High Street, Musselburgh, and Alexander M'Donald, sheriff-officer, Edinburgh, concluding for £100 as damages for certain alleged wrongous proceedings, and for reduction of these proceedings.

Lord Low.

The pursuer averred that at Whitsunday 1890 he became tenant for a year of the house No. 37 High Street, Musselburgh,—(Cond. 2) “In the end of December 1890 the pursuer obtained employment with a master baker at Cockenzie, and, as he found it inconvenient to walk from Musselburgh to Cockenzie daily, he, after a week or two, resolved to take a house at Cockenzie, and to remove there with his wife and family, consisting of three children. Having secured a house at Cockenzie, he, on the morning of 6th January 1891, proceeded to carry out his removal. He possessed a considerable quantity of furniture and other effects, and required a lorry for their removal. He was engaged in loading it with his furniture, when certain police-officers came up and officiously and illegally ordered him to desist. They also went for Mr Newlands, factor for the defender Miss Smart. Mr Newlands came, and, although the pursuer explained the above-mentioned circumstances of his removal to him, he, in his capacity as factor for Miss Smart, . . . compelled the pursuer to replace the furniture and effects in the dwelling-house. The pursuer . . . was, however, permitted to lock the door of the house, and to take the key away with him.” (Cond. 3) “At the time of his removal, as aforesaid, the pursuer was due to the defender Miss Smart about £1, 3s. 6d. as arrears of the rent due at Martinmas for the said house. Shortly after removing to Cockenzie, on or about 21st February 1891, he remitted £1 to Mr Newlands, the defender’s factor, in part payment of the rent. Thereafter, on or about 25th February 1891, finding the want of his furniture and effects very inconvenient, the pursuer and his wife proceeded to Musselburgh, in the expectation that Mr Newlands would then permit them to remove the whole, or at least a part, of the furniture and effects in the house there. They called at the house, and to their surprise found the door unlocked, and on entering discovered that the house had been entirely emptied of the furniture, clothing, and all its other contents.” (Cond. 4) “Thereafter, the pursuer discovered, from inquiries made by a law-agent whom he employed to investigate the matter, that on the very day of his removal, namely, 6th January 1891, the defender Miss Smart had raised a summons of sequestration against him for the sum of £1, 3s. 6d. of rent in the Small-Debt Court at Edinburgh. . . . The defender Miss Smart employed the defender Alexander M'Donald, sheriff-officer, Edinburgh, to execute the said summons, and to inventory and appraise, and thereafter to sell, the furniture and effects in the said house. The said defender M'Donald returned a pretended execution of citation, sequestration, and appraisement, dated 7th January 1891, but in executing the same he made no attempt to comply with the provisions of the said Act 34 and 35 Vict. c. 42.* . . .

* The pursuer founded on section 3 of the Citation Amendment Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 42), which enacts,—“Where an officer of any Small-Debt Court is satisfied that the defender named in any summons, complaint, decree, and warrant, or other order of such Small-Debt Court, or writ following upon such summons or complaint, is refusing access or concealing himself to avoid citation or service, or has within a period of forty days removed from the house or premises occupied by him, his place of dwelling for the time not being known, it shall be lawful for such officer, after he has affixed to the gate or door of such house or premises, or left in the hands of an inmate there, the said summons, complaint, decree and warrant or other order or writ, to send to the address which after diligent inquiry he may deem most likely to find the defender, or to his last known address, a registered letter by post containing a copy of such summons, complaint, decree and warrant or other order or writ; and the affixing or leaving of such summons, complaint, decree and warrant or other order or writ, and the posting of such intimation shall constitute a legal and valid citation or service: Provided always that the execution to be returned by

No. 128. Although it was well known to the said defender M'Donald and to the said J. R. Newlands, the factor of the other defender, that the pursuer had removed from the said house to Cockenzie, and although his address there was known to or could have been readily ascertained by them, and further, although the defender M'Donald found the house locked and deserted and required to force the door open, no attempt was made to effect legal execution of the said summons, inventory, and appraisement, and no execution thereof was returned by the defender M'Donald in the form prescribed by the said Act. The pretended execution returned by him is null and void. It bears that the service copy summons, with citation thereon, and a copy of the inventory and appraisement of the sequestrated effects, was left for the present pursuer 'upon a table within the dwelling-house of the said defender, there being no person therein to whom the same could be delivered.' No copy of the summons, &c., was affixed to the gate or door of the house; but the pretended execution bears that a copy thereof was sent by registered post letter to the present pursuer, addressed to said house, which of itself discloses the defender's knowledge of the pursuer's removal. The said pretended execution does not state that the defender endeavoured to effect service at the pursuer's last known dwelling-place, and the circumstances that prevented it, and in fact no such endeavour was made." The pursuer then stated sundry objections to the manner in which the inventory and appraisement had been carried out,—(Cond. 7) "On 21st January 1891 the defender Miss Smart obtained decree against the pursuer in said action of sequestration for payment of the sum of £1, 3s. 6d., and expenses.* . . . On said 21st January the defender M'Donald, acting on the instructions of the defender Miss Smart, gave the pursuer a pretended 'lockhole' charge under the said decree. The pretended execution of said charge returned by the defender M'Donald bears the charge was given 'by leaving a just copy of the foregoing complaint and decree, and a charge thereto annexed, subscribed by me for the said defender, within the lockhole of the most patent door of his dwelling-house, in 37 High Street, Musselburgh, and that after giving six audible knocks on said door, because I neither could get access to the said dwelling-house, nor find himself personally, and also by posting a like full copy in a registered letter, addressed Robert Gray, 37 High Street, Musselburgh.' The said pretended execution of charge is funditus null and void, the recited provisions of the said Acts such officer shall state that he endeavoured to effect service at the defender's last known dwelling-place, and the circumstances that prevented it, and shall be accompanied by the post-office receipt for the registration."

The Citation Amendment Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 77), sec. 3, was founded on by the defenders. It enacts,—“In any civil action or proceeding in any Court . . . any summons . . . or warrant of service or judicial intimation, may be executed in Scotland . . . by sending to the known residence or place of business of the person upon whom such summons, warrant, or judicial intimation is to be served, or to his last known address, if it continues to be his legal domicile or proper place of citation . . . a registered letter by post containing the copy of the summons or petition or other document required by law in the particular case to be served, with the proper citation or notice subjoined thereto, or containing such other citation or notice as may be required in the circumstances, and such posting shall constitute a legal and valid citation, unless the person cited shall prove that such letter was not left or tendered at his known residence or place of business, or at his last known address if it continues to be his legal domicile or proper place of citation.”

* The decree, which was produced, bore,—“Decerns and ordains execution to pass hereon by sale of the effects on the premises where the same are, after forty-eight hours' notice to defender, all in terms of the Act of Parliament.”

being applicable to charges on decrees, as well as to service of summonses, &c. On 24th January 1891, without any intimation to the pursuer, the said defender Alexander McDonald, acting on the instructions of the other defender, Miss Smart, wrongfully and illegally, nimiously and oppressively, carried out a pretended sale of the whole furniture and other effects within the said dwelling-house. . . . The explanations in answer are denied.”

No. 128.
Mar. 18, 1892.
Gray v. Smart.

The defenders in answer stated that the proceedings complained of were in all respects legal and regular, and in particular the defender McDonald explained (Ans. 4) that he was “unable to find the pursuer, or to discover any trace of his having removed elsewhere. In these circumstances, the said summons, and the inventory and appraisement of the furniture, were served on the pursuer, both by leaving copies of them at the said house in Musselburgh, and by posting them in a registered letter to the pursuer at the said house, which was the only and last residence of the pursuer known to the defender McDonald,” and he further explained (Ans. 7) “that before the said sale took place the usual notice of sale was duly given to the pursuer, by affixing it to the door of the pursuer’s said dwelling-house, and sending a copy thereof through the post in a registered letter, addressed to the pursuer at his said dwelling-house, because access to the said house could not be obtained. Quoad ultra denied.”

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The pursuer having sustained loss, injury, and damage through the wrongful and illegal actings of the defenders, nimiously and oppressively carried out, adopted, and taken advantage of by them as condescended on, is entitled to decree in terms of the petitory conclusions of the summons. 2. The alleged inventory and appraisement being inept in respect (1) the summons of sequestration was not served on the pursuer, (2) the alleged inventory and appraisement was not served on him, and (3) there was no proper inventory and specification of the articles said to have been sequestered, ought to be reduced, with all that has followed thereon. 4. The pretended sale following on the said alleged inventory and appraisement, not having been notified to the pursuer, nor preceded by a charge, in terms of the Small-Debt Acts, and not having been carried out as required by the Small-Debt Acts, and having comprehended articles improperly inventoried and specified, as well as articles not inventoried and specified, and some not liable to the landlord’s hypothec, the said pretended sale ought to be reduced.

The defenders pleaded that the pursuer’s averments were irrelevant.

On 4th February 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Low) found that the pursuer’s averments were irrelevant, and dismissed the action.*

* “OPINION.— . . . The pursuer does not dispute that he gave no notice of his intention to leave the house in Musselburgh, and he does not say that he explained to Mr Newlands why he was taking away his furniture, or where he was going. The interference of the police suggests that the removal was taking place at an early hour in the morning, because I do not know what right they had to interfere, unless it was under the 255th section of the Police Act of 1862, which authorises the police to stop removal of furniture within burgh, until inquiry can be made, between the hours of eight in the evening and six in the morning, except at the usual terms of removing. . . .

“The pursuer claims damages on the grounds (1) that he was not properly cited in the action; (2) that there was no proper appraisement of the articles sequestered; and (3) that he had not received notice of the sale. The first two of these grounds of action are in a different position from the third, because the former refer to matters which preceded the decree in the action, while the latter refers to the procedure in carrying out the decree.

“Now it is admitted that a small-debt decree cannot be challenged in any way whatever in the Court of Session. The decree must be dealt with as a valid and legal decree, and therefore it seems to me to be impossible to entertain an action of damages founded upon alleged irregularities in the proceedings leading up to the decree, because that would truly be to allow objections to the decree itself. The case of Crombie v. M'Ewan, 24 D. 333, is directly in point.

"The pursuer's counsel, however, tried to make out that the appraisement was in some way separable from the decree, and ought to be made the ground of an action in the Court of Session, although the decree was unchallengeable. I am unable to adopt this view. The procedure in a summons of sequestration and sale at the instance of a landlord is regulated by the 5th section of the Small-Debt Act, and schedule B of the Act, and it is plain that the appraisement is just a step which must be taken in the process before decree can be pronounced:

"In so far, therefore, as the pursuer's action is founded upon alleged irregularities in the procedure anterior to the decree, I am of opinion that it is incompetent. The remaining ground of action is the 3d, viz., that the pursuer did not receive notice of the sale for which warrant was granted by the Sheriff. I do not think that the action, in so far as it is laid upon this ground, is incompetent, and the question is, whether the pursuer has stated a relevant case.

"The decree of 21st January granted warrant for the sale of the sequestrated effects upon forty-eight hours' notice. The defender M'Donald gave the notice by affixing the decree and warrant to the door of the house in Musselburgh, and by sending a copy in a registered letter, addressed to the pursuer at that house. The pursuer avers that M'Donald either knew that he was residing at Cockenzie, or could easily have found out that he was residing there, and that, therefore, to send the notice to the house in Musselburgh was insufficient. The Citation Amendment Act of 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 77), provides that citation may be by registered letter sent to the 'last known address' of the party 'if it continues to be his legal domicile, or proper place of citation.' The question is whether the sending of the registered letter to the house in Musselburgh was in conformity with the provisions of the Act, and in order to answer that question it is necessary to see precisely how the facts stand. The pursuer, upon his own shewing, tried to take his furniture away from the house without notice to his landlord, and under suspicious circumstances; he does not say that he told the factor, or anyone else, where he was going, and he did not go back to the house again for nearly seven weeks. He, however, left his furniture in the house, and kept possession of the key. In such circumstances the house in Musselburgh was, I think, prima facie the place at which to cite the pursuer. He was still tenant of the house, he had civil possession of it, and he had left no other address. It was therefore prima facie his last known address, and the proper place of citation. The pursuer, however, avers that it was well known to M'Donald that he had gone to Cockenzie, and that his address there was known to, or could have been readily ascertained by, M'Donald. I am of opinion that so general and vague an averment is not sufficient. I must assume that the sheriff-officer acted regularly and in conformity with his duty unless specific facts, necessitating a different conclusion, are averred. Now the undisputed facts in this case lead to the inference that the Sheriff-officer did not know, and had no means of knowing, where the pursuer actually was residing; and I cannot hold that a mere general averment that he had knowledge, or means of knowledge, makes the case relevant without some specification, or at least indication, of the sources from which he had obtained, or might have obtained his information.

"I understand, however, that the pursuer contends that the citation must be held to be one under the Citation Amendment Act of 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 41), and not under the Act of 1882, because there was a lockhole charge as well as a registered letter. Now if the sending of a registered letter is sufficient under the Act of 1882, the additional precaution of a lockhole charge would not, I think, make the citation bad. But, assuming the citation to have of a small-debt summons, but irregularities in the appraisement were in a different position, because the appraisement was not a proper step leading up to the decree, but was separable from it. (2) At all events, Crombie v. M'Ewan had no application to the diligence following on a small-debt or any other decree, and the service of the decree and charge was bad. The proceedings here must be taken to have been an attempted compliance with the Citation Amendment Act of 1871, and not with that of 1882, because there had been a lockhole charge. Under the Act of 1871 it was essential that there should be diligent inquiry to discover the address of the person on whom the charge was to be made, but here the defender M'Donald made no attempt to find the pursuer, and there was not the slightest doubt that he could have found out his address without any trouble. Even under the Act of 1882 the charge was bad, for the Act, in permitting service by registered letter sent to "the last known address," required that that address should continue to be the person's proper place of citation, and the house in Musselburgh did not continue to be that with reference to the pursuer. Further, "last known address" meant last address known to the person making the service, and the pursuer averred that the defenders knew that he had changed his address.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) In so far as the first and second grounds of action were concerned Crombie v. M'Ewan was conclusive, because the appraisement as well as the service of the summons were both steps leading up to the decree, which, being a small-debt decree, was unchallengeable in the Court of Session. (2) Diligence following on a small-debt decree was probably in a different position, but the pursuer's statements were irrelevant on this point. He left his furniture in the house, kept the key, and went away leaving no address, and all he said was that the defenders knew, or might have ascertained, in the first place, that he had left permanently, and secondly, what his new address was. A case of this sort might be relevant if the pursuer had made specific averments of knowledge, or of the means of knowledge, but bare averments of this kind could not be held sufficient. The service was under the Act of 1882, but even under the Act of 1871 the question was, had the registered letter been sent to the pursuer's "last known address," and it had been sent to the last address known to the defenders.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer in this action complains of a wrong done to him by the sale of his household effects, and he alleges three illegalities in the been under the Act of 1871, I do not think that the averments are sufficient. The Act provides (section 3) that when an officer is satisfied that the defender is concealing himself to avoid citation, or has, within a period of forty days, removed from the house or premises occupied by him, his place of dwelling for the time not being known, it shall be lawful for the officer, after he has affixed to the gate or door of such house or premises, the summons, or warrant, or order, as the case may be, 'to send to the address which, after diligent inquiry, he may deem most likely to find the defender, or to his last known address, a registered letter by post,' containing a copy of the summons, warrant, or order, provided that the execution returned by the officer shall state that he endeavoured to effect service at the defender's last known dwelling-place, and the circumstances which prevented it. Now it seems to me that the citation here was in conformity with these provisions, unless the officer knew the pursuer's place of dwelling for the time, or failed to make diligent inquiry as to the address most likely to find the pursuer. The only averments as to the officer's knowledge of the pursuer's dwelling-place, or his failure to make inquiries, are the general averments to which I have referred; and, for the reasons I have already given, I am of opinion that they are insufficient, and that the pursuer has not stated a relevant case. I shall therefore dismiss the action, with expenses."

Gray v. Smart.

No. 128. proceedings. Two of these relate to steps anterior to the warrant of sale, and the case of Crombie v. M'Ewan, 23 D. 333, is a binding authority to this effect, Mar. 18, 1892. that the clause of the Small-Debt Act excluding review of small-debt decrees implies that no action of damages will lie on account of irregularities in proceedings leading up to such a decree any more than for defects in the decree itself. Gray v. Smart. Now, unless it can be made out that what purports to be part of the small-debt decree is not so in fact, that case applies, but I think it is impossible to split up the decree in the manner for which the pursuer contended, and therefore I think that Crombie v. M'Ewan is in point, and that the two first grounds of action are irrelevant.

There remains the third objection, which depends on what is said to have taken place after the granting of the decree, that is to say, it assumes the validity of the decree, but challenges the proceedings subsequent thereto. The decree was the only warrant of sale, and one condition in it was that the sale was only to take place after forty-eight hours' notice had been given to the pursuer. The pursuer avers that he received no notice whatever. I cannot escape from the conclusion that that is a relevant averment of a defect in procedure. The defenders' only answer is that notice was sent to what they were entitled to regard as his proper residence. That is an answer upon the facts, not upon relevancy, and does not meet the pursuer's universal negative that he received no notice. Upon the clear and simple ground that there is here a plain allegation of no notice, I am of opinion that this part of the case must be allowed to go to trial.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion, and on the same grounds. I think that the Lord Ordinary rightly rejected the first and second grounds of action, because of the finality clauses of the Small-Debt Act. There is only an appeal from small-debt decrees upon limited grounds, and to the Court of Justiciary. Here there is a decree for payment of £1, 3s. 6d., and it is quite settled that the objection of want of citation is an insufficient ground for setting aside that decree, because citation is a necessary preliminary to decerniture. The same reasoning applies to want of notice of appraisement, for of course decerniture could never have been given unless upon the footing that appraisement had been made. But, as your Lordship has pointed out, while this applies to decrees in the Small-Debt Court, it does not protect diligence done in virtue of such decrees. Here the sale may have been properly proceeded with, or it may not, but we must at this stage take the pursuer's statement as true when he says that his effects were sold without any intimation to him. If that turns out to be the case, no doubt a wrongful act has been done. I do not see why what he has said is not to be regarded as a sufficient averment of the wrong he complains of. The defenders may be able to shew that notice was given at a certain house, and that that house was the pursuer's dwelling-house, where he should have been prepared to receive such notices, but that is a question of fact which is just what the jury will have to determine. Accordingly, I think the Lord Ordinary has gone too fast, and that the case must go to trial.

LORD M'LAREN.—It seems to be settled by the case of Crombie that no action will lie because of informality attending proceedings incidental to a small-debt decree so long as the case is pending in the Small-Debt Court, that is to say, while the case is under the control of the Judge in that Court he can correct any error before pronouncing decree, and the holder of a decree has protection by statute against its being reduced. But when the case has passed out of the Sheriff's hands, I cannot see why a small-debt decree should confer a higher immunity upon a creditor in carrying it into execution than that enjoyed by holders of decrees in any other Court. A decree in this Court, affirmed it may be by the House of Lords, must be regularly enforced, and any informality in its execution is open to challenge. It is no answer to say that the decree being the decree of the Supreme Court is a final decree, and not appealable to any other Court. Its finality only warrants lawful execution. In that respect there is no difference between decrees of this Court and those of the Small-Debt Court. Therefore, upon the question of the objection to the execution of this charge, I think there is issuable matter. No. 128.

Gray v. Smart.

It is argued that under the Citation Amendment Act of 1882 it was sufficient if a registered letter were sent to the pursuer's last known address. But, according to the pursuer's statement, the house in Musselburgh, to which the defenders say the registered letter was addressed, was neither his present address nor his last address known to the defenders, because he says the factor knew perfectly well that the pursuer had moved to Cockenzie. I have no doubt that if a person goes away temporarily, on a holiday for example, he may be well cited by a registered letter sent to his permanent address, because he ought to make arrangements for getting his letters, but here the pursuer says that he had finally given up the Musselburgh house. However that may be, we are at present on relevancy, and must accept the pursuer's statements, and therefore I cannot hold, with the Lord Ordinary, that the pursuer's case is altogether irrelevant. On the contrary, I am of opinion that if the facts he avers are true, a wrong has been done, for which he may obtain compensation.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is perfectly right as to the effect of the decree in the Small-Debt Court, and as to any irregularities in the proceedings leading up to that decree, but then I agree with your Lordships that there remains a different and perfectly relevant ground of action when the pursuer says that he found in February that his whole furniture had been sold in the previous January, and that without any notice to him. It is said that that is not relevant because vague. I cannot see how the pursuer could have said more than that he knew nothing about the sale, if it is true that he did not know. Of course that puts it upon the other party to shew what means he took to inform the debtor. I can imagine the sheriff-officer returning an answer which would, on the face of it, be conclusive, but here the answer which he does make involves a question of fact which we cannot possibly determine now. What he says is, that a registered letter was sent to the pursuer's last known address, and this the pursuer denies. Now, but what is that except just an additional question of fact, to be ascertained by evidence? I therefore agree with your Lordships that this branch of the case should go to a jury.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in so far as it sustains the pleas therein mentioned as applicable to the objections to the decree of the Small-Debt Court, and procedure antecedent thereto: Quoad ultra recall the said interlocutor, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to adjust an issue or issues for the trial of the cause," &c.

Property—Disposition—Superior and Vassal—Construction of disposition.—In 1796 the Duke of Argyll, who held the plenum dominium of the lands of Castle Campbell of the Crown, disposed in feu the lands of Hillfoot, part of Castle Campbell, to Drysdale, but reserved the coals and coalheughs. Tait acquired the Castle Campbell estate remaining in the Duke. Tait became bankrupt in 1828, and in 1837 Tait's trustee, on the narrative that he had exposed to sale "the superiority and feu-duty of the lands" of Hillfoot, and that Moir, who had in 1796 acquired Drysdale's feu, had offered a certain sum for these subjects, and had been preferred to the purchase, conveyed to Moir "all and whole the town and lands of Hillfoot . . . all as at present possessed" by Moir and his tenants. No coal had at this time been worked in Hillfoot. The feu-rights and infeftments granted by the disponent's predecessors to feuars were excepted from the warrandice clause. The disposition contained an assignment to an unexecuted precept of sasine in a Crown charter of resignation and confirmation, which Tait had obtained, "in so far as applicable to the lands of Hillfoot thereby disposed, to the end that" Moir "may be more readily infeft and seased in the premises, and also in and to the whole feu-duties and other services and casualties payable from the said lands and others above disposed." "Surrogating hereby" Moir "in my full right and place of the premises for ever." On the precept assigned Moir was infeft. In 1890 Orr, who had acquired from Tait's trustee in 1860 the lands of Castle Campbell, with a description which included the lands of Hillfoot, and the "coals and coalheughs," raised an action against Moir's testamentary trustees to have it declared that the pursuer was proprietor of the coals in Hillfoot (which still remained unworked), in virtue of the conveyance of 1860. The defenders pleaded the conveyance of 1837. Held by a majority of the whole Court that the defenders should be assolizied, in respect that the conveyance of 1837 on a just construction carried the coals along with the superiority to Moir, diss. Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, Lord Rutherford Clark, Lord Wellwood, Lord Kyllachy, and Lord Low, who held that that conveyance carried nothing but the superiority.

WHOLE COURT
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

In 1702 the Duke of Argyll was proprietor of the lordship, barony and estate of Campbell, otherwise Dollar or Gloum, in the county of Clackmannan.

Some time prior to 1796 the Duke disposed in feu to John Drysdale all and whole certain lands, forming part of the lands of Castle Campbell, and which may be referred to by the general name of Hillfoot. The Duke reserved to himself and his heirs and successors, all the coals and coalheughs of the said lands, with full power to him and them to work the same. In 1796 John Moir became proprietor of Hillfoot (Drysdale's feu) and obtained a charter of confirmation from the Duke, there being here again a reservation of the coals. Hillfoot passed to Moir's son and grandson, and in 1890 was in possession of his grandson's testamentary trustees.

The coals were never worked in the lands of Hillfoot, but coal had been worked before 1836 in other parts of the Castle Campbell estate.

In 1808 Crawford Tait of Harviestoun acquired from the Duke of Argyll All and Whole the lordship, barony, lands, and estate of Campbell, including, inter alia, the lands of Hillfoot and others, with, inter alia, the coals and coalheughs. Power was given to Mr Tait, and his heirs and successors, to work coal and put down sinks.

Mr Tait's estates were sequestrated in 1828, and a trustee appointed.

Orr v. Moir's
Trustees.

By disposition dated 28th July 1837, Mr R. E. Scott, Tait's trustee, granted a disposition in favour of Moir. The disposition in its narrative clause set forth the trustee's appointment, and the vesting in him of "the whole lands and other heritable and moveable estates which belonged to the said Craufurd Tait or to my predecessors in office, to pertain and belong to me as trustee foresaid, and particularly without prejudice to said generality, the lands and estate of Campbell, otherwise Dollar, therein described, comprehending, inter alia, the superiority and feu-duty of the lands of Hillfoot and others lying in the parish of Dollar and county of Clackmannan, belonging in property to John M'Arthur Moir of Hillfoot." The same clause further set forth that the disponent "having upon the 11th day of January last, 1837, exposed, inter alia, said superiority and feu-duty of the lands of Hillfoot to public roup and sale, in terms of certain articles and conditions of roup executed by me upon the said 11th day of January last, the said John M'Arthur Moir, after various offers, offered for the same the sum of £450, and being the last and highest offerer, he was by the judge of the roup preferred to the purchase, and by minute subjoined to the said articles, became bound for the said price, and to implement the whole conditions of the sale so far as applied to the said purchase, as the said articles of roup, offers, and minute of enactment, more fully bear." It also set forth the payment of £450, and then proceeded in the dispositive clause to convey "All and Whole the town and lands of Hillfoot, . . . all as at present possessed by the said John M'Arthur Moir and his tenants," . . . "to be holden from me and my foresaids, of and under our immediate lawful superiors of the same, in the same manner, and as freely in all respects as I, as trustee foresaid, my predecessors and authors, held, hold, or might have holden the same." The warrantice clause bore this exception, viz.,—"Excepting always from this warrantice the feu-rights or infeftments of property of the said lands granted by my predecessors and authors to the feuars and vassals thereof." This disposition further constituted John M'Arthur Moir the disponent's assignee in and to a charter of resignation and confirmation in favour of Mr Tait under the Union Seal, dated 4th February, and sealed 6th May 1811, and the precept of sasine therein contained still unexecuted, "in so far as applicable to the town and lands of Hillfoot and others thereby disposed; to the end that, in virtue thereof, and of the precept of sasine contained in said charter yet unexecuted, and of these presents, the said John M'Arthur Moir, or his foresaids, may be the more readily infeft and seised in the premises, and also in and to the whole feu-duties and other services and casualties payable from the said lands and others above disposed." There then followed this clause: "Surrogating hereby, and substituting, with consent foresaid, the said John M'Arthur Moir and his foresaids in my full right and place of the premises for ever, which assignation above written I, as trustee, with consent foresaid, bind and oblige myself to warrant from my own facts and deeds only; and I bind the creditors on the sequestrated estates of the said Craufurd Tait to warrant the same as follows, viz., in so far as concerns the writs and evidents, at all hands and against all mortals, and in so far as concerns the feu-duties and casualties of superiority, from facts and deeds only." Mr Moir was infeft in 1838 upon the Crown precept assigned, and by procuratory of resignation and instrument of resignation following thereon in 1838, he consolidated the property of Hillfoot, &c., with the superiority.

By disposition dated March 1860, Tait's trustees sold to Sir Andrew Orr All and Whole the lands of Castle Campbell acquired by Tait, including the lands of Hillfoot and others, with the "castles, towers, fortalices

No. 129. woods, fishings, coals, coalheughs, and whole parts, pendicles, and pertinents," for a sum of £80,000. Existing feu-rights were excepted from the warrandice of this disposition. This disposition was confirmed by the Crown.

Trustees.

In 1890 James Orr, who had succeeded Sir Andrew Orr, made a claim to the coals in the lands of Hillfoot, and to make good that claim raised an action of declarator against Mr Moir's testamentary trustees for declarator that he had the sole and exclusive right to the coal in the lands of Hillfoot, and had power to work and win it.

The pursuer and defenders pleaded their respective titles.

On 19th December 1890 Lord Stormonth Darling (Ordinary) assized the defenders.*

* "OPINION.—Both parties concurred in representing this case as one to be decided on a construction of the titles, and I do not think it would be competent to look beyond them.

"The sole question, therefore, is—Whether the coal under the lands of Hillfoot, and under some other small parcels of land, belonging to the defenders, was conveyed to the defenders' author, John M'Arthur Moir, by disposition, dated 28th July 1837. For if it was, undoubtedly the defenders' right is prior and preferable to any right which can be claimed by the pursuer, whose title is twenty-three years later in date. The coal, if it exists, has never been worked, so that no aid can be derived from possession.

"It is common ground between the parties that, when the lands of Hillfoot, &c., were feued out to the defenders' predecessor before 1796, the coal was reserved to the then superior, the Duke of Argyll; that the coal so reserved was, with the rest of the Castle Campbell estate, conveyed to the late Mr Crawford Tait in 1808; that the estates of Mr Tait were sequestrated in 1828, and that his trustee remained feudally vested in the whole Castle Campbell estate (including the coal of Hillfoot), down to 1837.

"The deed of 1837 proceeds on the narrative that the trustee had exposed to public roup 'the superiority and feu-duty of the lands of Hillfoot,' and that Mr John M'Arthur Moir, having offered £450, had been preferred to the purchase; also that the said John M'Arthur Moir, had subsequently purchased from the trustee by private bargain 'the superiority and feu-duty of the said lands of Lochyfaulds and others,' at the price of £30; and the trustee disposed to Mr Moir 'All and Whole the town and lands of Hillfoot, of old called the Easter-town of Hillfoot, with mosses, muirs, and all and singular pertinents used and wont pertaining and belonging thereto, all as at present possessed by the said John M'Arthur Moir and his tenants, as also All and Whole the lands of Lochyfaulds,' as therein fully described. There was an exception from the warrandice of the 'feu-rights or infestments of property of the said lands granted by my predecessors and authors to the feuars and vassals thereof,' but there was no exception of the coal under the lands.

"By procuratory of resignation and instrument of resignation following thereon, dated and recorded in 1838, Mr M'Arthur Moir consolidated the property of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds with the superiority. What was the effect of the disposition of 1837? The pursuer says that it only conveyed the dominium directum of the lands, and left the coal still in the person of Crawford Tait's trustee. He goes on to say that when the trustee, in 1860, conveyed to his author, Sir Andrew Orr, the Castle Campbell estate, with a description which included the lands of Hillfoot, and the 'castles, towers, fortalices, woods, fishings, coals, coalheughs, and whole parts, pendicles, and pertinents, which belonged to the late John Duke of Argyll, in property or superiority, at his death,' he truly conveyed the coal under Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds to Sir Andrew Orr.

"I cannot adopt this view. To me it seems that the dispositive clause of the deed of 1837 was habile to convey, and did convey to John M'Arthur Moir, the whole rights of Crawford Tait's trustee in the lands of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds, a calo ad centrum.

"That undoubtedly is the primary and natural construction of such a dis-

Trustees.

The following is a summary of the pursuer's argument;—Prior to the disposition of 1837 Tait's trustee was vested in two separate estates, viz., the superiority of the land, and the plenum dominium of the coal. Coal, when reserved from a grant of the dominium utile of land, formed a separate tenement—separate both from the dominium utile and from the superiority of the land.¹ The superior was infeft in the coals in pleno dominio and not as superior.² This was the principle on which the case of *Fleming v. Howden*³ was determined. It was again affirmed in the Duke of Hamilton's case both in the Court of Session and in the House of Lords.⁴ That being so, the next question was, whether the disposition of 1837 conveyed this separate estate of coal—an estate as separate as if it position (Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, p. 604). But the pursuer says that the comprehensive words of the dispositive clause are controlled by the narrative, which recites a purchase of the 'superiority and feu-duty,' and that the dispositive clause itself is limited by the words, 'all as at present possessed by the said John M'Arthur Moir and his tenants.'

"With regard to the first of these contentions, I think it is enough to say that the 'superiority' means simply the estate remaining in the superior. The coal had never been erected into a separate tenement. It had been reserved as part of the superior's estate, and when he sold that estate without reservation, it seems to me that he sold the coal. With regard to the second contention, I think it is impossible to read the words, 'all as at present possessed,' &c., as meaning more than a definition of the boundaries of the lands, for otherwise these words would exclude the bare superiority itself, which had never been possessed by John Arthur Moir or his tenants.

"I am not sure that I correctly represent the pursuer's argument if I say that he also founds on the price as shewing that the coal was not included, for that argument would require information outside the deed. But if it be used, I think the answer is that the price of Hillfoot superiority was more than thirty-eight years' purchase of the feu-duty, which shews that no real aid can be derived from the amount of the price.

"The pursuer's main reliance is in the case of Fleeming v. Howden, May 21, 1868, 6 Macph. 782, 40 Scot. Jur. 401. But that case is of so very special a nature that I think it affords no guide to this. Undoubtedly, the two main considerations which led the Court in that case to hold that the minerals were not conveyed were,—(1) That the granters of the deed, who were commissioners of an heir of entail, had no power under the Act 20 Geo. II. c. 50, to sell anything but the bare superiority; and (2) that the grantee himself (so far from consolidating the property with the superiority as Mr M'Arthur Moir did) actually granted deeds of clare constat and resignation, in which he inserted a reservation of the minerals, thus shewing plainly his own understanding that the minerals had not been conveyed to him.

"If I am right in my construction of the deed of 1837, it is unnecessary to consider the pursuer's title of 1860, but that deed, if it were necessary to examine it, seems to me to contain some indications, particularly in the warrantee clause, that it was not considered by the parties as carrying the coal under the lands of Hillfoot."

were a distinct portion of land. The narrative clause set out distinctly that it did not. That clause narrated a bargain made and a price paid which affected nothing but the superiority. That clause would be controlled no doubt by the dispositive clause, but there was no inconsistency between them. The dispositive clause conveyed the lands of Hillfoot: that was the ordinary form of a conveyance of superiority, for the superior had a title to the lands themselves. If it was limited to a conveyance of superiority, the two clauses would stand together, and the deed would do what it professed to do. If it were extended to the coal then the clauses were irreconcilable, and the disposer was conveying under cover of the superiority what belonged to him, not on his title of superiority, but in pleno dominio. The Lord Ordinary was wrong in saying that the coal had never been erected into a separate tenement. The authorities quoted established the contrary, and an examination of the case of Fleming would shew that it depended on no specialties. The case of Erskine v. Schaw in 1785¹ was no sufficient authority as against those cited. The opinions were obscure, but it would appear that the actings of parties had much weight with the Court. The case, however, never having been reported, was of no great authority. It had plainly not been accepted at its date, and could not have ruled the practice since.

The defenders' argument may be thus summarised;—The superior by his grant of the lands of Hillfoot prior to 1837 was not truly divested of these lands.² His infestment subsisted as an ex facie absolute title to the whole lands. The typical case of a disposition of superiority, where the lands are themselves disposed, feu-rights being reserved from the warrantice, was proof of this doctrine. The superiority, dominium directum, of the land could not exist apart from the proprietorship of the coals, which he had never parted with. The authorities to which the pursuer referred³ only shewed that minerals could be made a separate estate to be held apart from the lands and apart from the dominium directum. They did not establish that the granting of the feu-right with a reservation of the minerals necessarily had this effect. Now, the dispositive clause in the deed of 1837 was in general terms; if it was intended to reserve the coals the disposer should have so expressed himself. If not reserved they were conveyed.⁴ To refer to the narrative clause with a view of derogating from the terms of the dispositive clause was to defy plain rules of interpretation laid down by the highest authority.⁵ If such a reference was competent, the defenders' reading of "superiority" in the narrative clause was that it meant the superior's whole estate, i.e., dominium directum in coal. The case of *Fleming v. Howden*⁶ was throughout treated by the Court as a case dependent on specialties. The case of Erskine v. Schaw of portions of the respective estates by the parties, &c., it was agreed that the vassal should buy his superiority at thirty years' purchase of the feu-duty. Accordingly, thereafter, a disposition, dated in 1744, was granted by the superior to the vassal, narrating the agreement, stating that the superiority was sold at so many years' purchase of the feu-duty, and disposing to the vassal the lands as in his charters. There was no mention of coal. Subsequently, an action was brought by the superior, to have it found that the coal under the feus belonged to him. It was held by the majority of four to two of the Judges that the coal belonged to the vassal, and upon a reclaiming petition, it was again decided in the vassal's favour by a similar majority."

The following notes of the Judges' opinions were taken by Sir Ilay Campbell, who was of counsel for the pursuer—(Sess. Papers, Campbell Coll. vol. 47, No. 126):—

"LORD JUSTICE-CLERK (Sir Thomas Miller).—Would be sorry if this claim good, but clear grounds in law and justice for preserving it to Lord Cathcart—good feudal title to whole—dangerous after such an acquiescence to allow such investigation to limit and explain. If contract had been before their eyes this would have been no bar—no appearance of coal—possibility of it a matter of no importance, but clearly not under view. Whose fault? Not Sir John Schaw's business, but theirs to advert to coal, and to except it if so meant. Res ipsa loquitur what Lord Cathcart understood when built his house there. They in pessima fide to allow that to go on. Bar personali exceptione.

"HENDERLAND.—Same. Farm of Gartmorn conveyed in same terms—full assignment of writs and evidents—as to intention first probably not attended to—out of head—future operations in view—rise of water, pleasure ground.

"SWINTON.—Doubt—how stood right before 1736—clear that coal reserved then various —adjusted superiority, &c., warrandice.

"MONBODDO.—Same.

"ESKGROVE.—At first of that opinion, but afterwards came to see it in different light—intention of parties to be disengaged from one another.

"Sustain the defence and assoilzie."

On a reclaiming petition the following opinions were delivered:—

"LORD PRESIDENT (Robert Dundas).—Difficult cause but cannot bring myself to alter. Purchaser would be safe on faith of record, therefore words must be ample enough. If this be the case difficulty is to narrow from collateral circumstances—feudal contract—shall we rumage into letters, &c. No going coal here, no act or deed shewing retention of coal,—perhaps not in view,—or, one side slyer than another, but in general Sir John Schaw meant to obtain full right. Lord Cathcart began to build his house as early as 1756. Lord Erskine said nothing—neither party had then an idea. Adhere.

"LORD JUSTICE-CLERK (Sir Thomas Miller).—Reservation of coal was part of the full dominium belonging originally to the disposer pleno jure as king's vassal—afterwards, however, meant to convey over every right to Sir John Schaw in same manner, &c. Words of disposition full and ample. Disposition does not go further than agreement. But if it did, not called upon to go back to original communings. OTT v. Moir's
Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Kinnear.

LORD ADAM.—The lands of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds seem originally to have formed parts of the lordship and barony of Campbell.

The original grant or disposition of these lands has not been produced, but there is produced a charter of confirmation, of date 6th November 1798, by the Commissioners of the Duke of Argyll, who was then proprietor of the lordship and barony, in favour of John Moir.

This charter confirms to and in favour of John Moir, his heirs and assignees, the lands of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds, as also two small pieces of land called the Bog, but “reserving to the said John Duke of Argyll and his heirs and successors all coals and coalheughs of all and sundry the said lands respectively above written.”

The charter then confirms the various writs by which Mr Moir was vested in the lands, which it was declared were to be holden of and under the Duke of Argyll for the feu-duties and other prestations therein specified.

This charter, accordingly shews that, at its date, Mr Moir held the dominium utile of the lands of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds, with the exception of the coals in these lands, while the Duke of Argyll held the dominium utile of these coals, and also the dominium directum of the lands, excepting the coals. It is true that the coals formed a separate tenement from the rest of the lands, but they were not held under any separate title. They simply remained part of the lordship and barony of Campbell, and, along with the dominium directum of the rest of the lands, were held by him under his infeftment in that lordship and barony.

The next writ, to which it is necessary to refer, is the disposition by the Duke of Argyll and others to Mr Tait, dated September and November 1808. By this disposition there is conveyed to Mr Tait certain portions of the lordship see how the right stood—must take in whole together. See clause in contract limited in express terms to superiority and feu-duty—matters of less importance expressly attended to—consideration given for superiority—value common price same as if no regard of coal. Lords Grange and Dunn—ignorant even of this age—Disposition does not mean to go beyond contract—see narrative what held feu before—in implement, &c.—Lord Cathcart, the heir of the party, as a third party acquiring on faith of record. Duke of Argyll.

Trustees.

The lands of Lochyfaulds are not mentioned in this disposition, but it sufficiently appears from the charter of confirmation, previously referred to, that these lands had formed part of the lands of Hillfoot, and no doubt passed to Mr Tait under that description.

The feu-rights of the vassals are excepted in the clause of warrandice. It will be observed, accordingly, that Mr Tait, the common author of the pursuer and defender, acquired right to the dominium directum of the lands, excepting the coals, and to the dominium utile of the coals, not by any conveyance of them as separata tenementa, but simply by a conveyance of the lands of Hillfoot with the coals.

The next deed to be referred to is the disposition by Mr Scott, the trustee on Mr Tait's sequestrated estate, in favour of Mr Moir, of date 28th July 1837.

By this deed the granter, after narrating his own title and the cause of granting the deed—to the consideration of which I shall afterwards return—dispones to Mr Moir all and whole the town and lands of Hillfoot, with mosses, muirs, and all and singular pertinents used and wont pertaining and belonging thereto, all as then possessed by Mr Moir and his tenants, and also the lands of Lochyfaulds and the two pieces of land called the Bog, being parts and portions of the church lands of Campbell, lying within the lordship of Campbell.

Then follows an obligation to infest the disponent and his heirs a me, and a warrandice clause from which are excepted the feu-rights or infestments of property of the said lands granted by his predecessors or authors to the feuars and vassals thereof.

Then the disponent and his foresaid are assigned, not only in and to the whole writs, titles, and securities of the lands and others, but specially in and to a charter of resignation and confirmation in favour of Mr Tait, under the Union seal, with the unexecuted precept of sasine therein contained, in so far as applicable to the lands of Hillfoot and others thereby disposed, “to the end that in virtue thereof, and of the precept of sasine contained in said charter yet unexecuted, and of these presents, the said John M'Arthur Moir or his foresaids may be the more readily infest and seized in the premises, and also in and to the said feu-duties, and other services and casualties payable from the said lands and others above disposed,” “surrogating hereby and substituting, with consent foresaid, the said John M'Arthur Moir and his foresaids, in my full right and place of the premises for ever.”

What followed on this disposition was that Mr Moir took infestment in the lands of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds, in virtue of the precept of sasine contained in the crown charter of resignation and confirmation thus assigned to him, conform to instrument of sasine in his favour, dated 27th June, and recorded 6th July 1838. He thereafter consolidated the property with the superiority conform to precept of resignation ad remanentiam, dated 30th November 1838, and instrument of resignation following thereon in his favour, dated 30th November, and recorded 3d December 1838.

It appears to me that the legal effect of this disposition, and of the infestment following thereon, clearly was to divest the trustee of all right, title, and interest he had in the lands of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds, and to invest Mr Moir in his full right and place therein.

No. 129.

Mar. 18, 1892.
OTT v. Moir's
Trustees.

But I think that that was not only the legal effect of the disposition and infestment, but that it also gave effect to the intention of the parties.

The trustee must have known that his only title to the coals was his infestment in the lands, and we should certainly expect that, if he had meant to retain them, they would have been expressly reserved from the conveyance. In that case also the trustee would have had an interest in the titles to the lands, and we might have expected that there would have been an obligation on the disponent to make them forthcoming to him on all necessary occasions.

I think that the intention was, what the deed itself says, to substitute "the said John M'Arthur Moir and his foresaids in my full right and place in the premises for ever." That "the premises" means the lands of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds, and the rights thereto pertaining, and is not limited to the dominium directum thereof, appears to be clear, because it is said that the writs, and particularly the crown charter of resignation containing the unexecuted precept, are assigned, to the end that the disponent and his foresaids may be the more readily infest "in the premises, and also in and to the whole feu-duties and other services and casualties payable from the said lands."

To return to the narrative clause of the disposition—it sets forth that the trustee had exposed the superiority and feu-duty of the lands of Hillfoot for sale by public roup, that Mr Moir was the highest offerer at a certain price, that Mr Moir had also purchased from him by private bargain the superiority and feu-duty of the lands of Lochyfaulds, that Mr Moir had made payment of the agreed-on price, and that therefore he disposed to him the lands of Hillfoot, &c.

It certainly appears to me that it is to be gathered from this narrative, that the subject-matter of the conveyance was to be the superiority and feu-duty of the lands, and not anything more.

It is suggested that the word "superiority" may be construed so as to include all the rights in the lands held by him, contained in the title under which he held the superiority, and therefore may be held to include the dominium utile of the coal, but I do not think that that is an admissible construction.

Neither do I think that the right to the coal in question can be considered as merely the incorporeal right of working and winning the coal, and as such among the rights the aggregate of which is denoted by the word superiority. It appears to me that the right reserved was nothing less than the full right of property in the coals—that being the right which was in the granter antecedent to the grant. The case of Duke of Hamilton v. Dunlop, 12 R. (H. of L.) 65, would seem to be conclusive on that point.

I also think that in all cases, whether the right to be disposed be the plenum dominium, or the dominium directum, or the dominium utile, the proper and recognised form is to dispose "the lands of A." But I do not think that such words in a dispositive clause are at all ambiguous or open to construction. I think that a disposition of the lands of A prima facie implies a grant of these lands, with everything pertaining to them, a centro ad cælum. If it is intended that something less is to be given, then I think it is the duty of the conveyancer to see that such rights as are intended to be excepted or reserved are expressly, or it may be impliedly, excepted or reserved on the face of the deed; and it appears to me that every right of the disponent in the lands, not so excepted or reserved, will be carried to the disponent by force of the terms of the dispositive clause.

Where, therefore, a superior has nothing but the superiority of lands and desires to convey it, the usual and appropriate form is to convey the lands excepting the feu-rights in the dispositive clause ; or it may be done, though perhaps not so correctly, as in this case, by excepting the feu-rights from the clause of warrandice, because the vassals are secured in their rights of property by their own infeftments, and the disponent can have no action on the warrandice. But I do not think that it is an appropriate form where the superior has, besides his rights of superiority, other rights in the lands which he desires to retain. In that case it appears to me they must be excepted or reserved, expressly or impliedly, in the deed.

No. 129.

Mar. 18, 1892.
Orr v. Moir's
Trustees.

In this case the trustee had, besides his right of superiority, a right of property in the coals in the lands. According to my construction of the disposition granted by him to Mr Moir, this right of property was neither excepted nor reserved, and therefore was carried to Mr Moir by force of the dispositive clause.

The case, therefore, appears to me to come to this—the narrative clause expresses an intention of conveying the superiority of the lands and nothing more ; but the dispositive clause, and the ancillary clauses to which I have referred, do in fact, and I think in intention, convey not only the superiority, but every other right which the trustee had in the lands, including the coals.

In these circumstances, and giving the fullest weight to the principles applied in the case of Fleeming v. Howden, I am of opinion that the coal was carried by the disposition granted by the trustee, and now belongs to the defender. I think, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

There has been no argument as to the pursuer's title to the coal in question, though that would rather appear to me to be the first question which should be disposed of. I desire, however, to say that, as at present advised, I am not satisfied that the pursuer has a title to the coal. Mr Moir's infeftment on the precept of sasine, contained in the crown charter of resignation, and assigned to him, would appear to have exhausted that precept in so far as applicable to the lands and coal in question, and I do not see how the trustee could thereafter get himself infeft in the lands ; and if that be so, I do not see how he, not being himself infeft, could grant a valid title to the pursuer of the lands and coal. I should require to be satisfied on this point before decerning in the pursuer's favour.

LORD M'LAREN.—The case being fully before the Court, I proceed, without recapitulating the facts, to state some considerations which, as I think, ought to determine the question in favour of the defender.

1. I should not be disposed to rest my judgment on any special rule of construction applicable to the dispositive clauses of deeds of sale. I should be disposed to construe the clauses of a deed just as the clauses of an Act of Parliament are construed, according to ordinary critical laws and methods. If a deed is arranged in clauses, the subject of each clause is either announced or is apparent from the structure of the clause ; and there is, I think, a certain presumption to the effect that each clause is intended to be complete in itself, and to contain all that the granter has to say with reference to its principal subject. But this is not always practicable ; and it may be necessary that the granter, either in the inductive clause, or, it may be, in some other part of the deed, should announce some limitation of the subject or purpose of the deed. If he does so in plain language, it does not seem to be very material, unless in a question of literary criticism, whether the limitation is or is not introduced at the

No. 129. most appropriate place, which I suppose would be as near as possible to the words of grant the scope of which is to be defined or limited.

Mar. 18, 1892.
Orr v. Moir's
Trustees.

For example, I should consider that the proper way of conveying a right of bare superiority would be to begin by disposing the estate, either by its general name or by a bounding description, and then to add words excepting in general terms all such feu-rights as the grantor or his authors had given off. But in practice such excepting words are often omitted; and instead of excepting the feu-rights from his grant, the maker of the deed very often only excepts them from the warrandice, giving in form a right, but only an elusory right, to the lands which have been feued.

Again, the proper way of qualifying the right of a dispositive under a deed of entail is by the insertion of the prohibitions and irritancies in the dispositive clause; but in our older practice this was not usually done. The so-called "fetters" were usually inserted only in the procuratory, and this was held to be sufficient, in respect of the expressed intention to make an entail. In such a case, while the words of disposition might be absolute and unqualified, the grantee could have no action (even if the deed were onerous) to compel the grantor to give him a new procuratory discharged of the fettering clauses.

2. While I contend that a dispositive clause, unqualified in its terms, may have its effect qualified or restricted by other clauses importing such qualification or restriction, I am not of opinion that a dispositive clause is liable to have its effect controlled by expressions in other parts of the deed, which are represented as amounting to evidence of an intention to qualify or restrict the grant. That the maker of the deed should qualify his grant by antecedent or subsequent clauses is one thing; that we should do it for him, by conjectural interpretation, quite another. Inferences drawn from the narrative clause of a deed are always in some degree conjectural, because the narrative is not a clause which professes to give, or even to define, a right, but only to indicate the nature of the transaction and the cause of granting. It does not necessarily or usually supply all the information that would be requisite if its office were to interpret or to control the other clauses of the deed. It has besides a tendency to fall into conventional forms, as, for instance, where railway stocks or securities are transferred in consideration of "the sum of five shillings to me paid," in which case everyone would admit that the extent of the subject of conveyance ought not to be measured by its apparent value as set out in the narrative. Even where the statements in the narrative represent the true transaction, we never can be sure that they contain a complete statement of the necessary facts; and therefore the principle of reforming a deed of sale by supplying words from the narrative is, in my opinion, not only open to serious objections from a theoretical point of view, but is practically a very untrustworthy mode of finding out the true contract, as understood by the parties at the time.

3. In the present case the subject of conveyance is announced in the narrative clause as being the superiority and feu-duty of a certain estate; and it is suggested that this expression is evidence (I suppose conclusive evidence) of an antecedent contract which did not include the coal. I am not able to follow either the suggested construction or the conclusion founded upon it. "Superiority and feu-duty," especially when used in a non-technical clause, is a short expression for the assemblage of rights which a superior retains after having conveyed away the substantial estate to a tenant or tenants in capite, and may very well include such a right of working minerals as the superior has in fact reserved to himself. That this may be, will be apparent if we consider the case of the superiority, say, of a Highland estate, in which neither coal nor metals have been found or are supposed to exist. Nevertheless, as a usual precaution, the superior has reserved the minerals, in case any may be discovered. In such a case, if the superior came afterwards to sell the superiority by a contract or missives of sale purporting to sell the "superiority and feu-duties," I think that the superior would be bound to convey to the grantee every right which he himself possessed; that the superior would not be entitled to put into the disposition a clause excepting or reserving minerals which might be discovered; and I also think that if the superior's estate were conveyed to the grantee in general terms, and minerals were thereafter discovered, these would belong to the grantee in virtue of the transfer to him of the estate of superiority, that is the estate in general, subject to the burden of existing feu-rights. Whether the words "superiority and feu-duty" in a dispositive clause would include reserved rights is a different question, on which it is not necessary to give an opinion, though my inclination would be in favour of the extended meaning.

But even if I were able to read the words "superiority and feu-duty" as descriptive of the superior's rights other than the right to work coal, I should not therefore conclude that coal was not conveyed. Because it might be that the coal was not included in the contract of sale to which the narrative refers, and yet that when the disposition came to be granted, the coal was thrown in, either because it was believed to be of no value, and not worth retaining as a separate subject, or because the vendor was willing for some other reason to make a concession. This may be unlikely in the actual case; but we ought not to enter on an irrelevant inquiry for the purpose of getting at the history of the contract. It is just because all inquiry is excluded that I prefer the terms of what I conceive to be an unambiguous dispositive clause to the clause as it is proposed to be reformed by the introduction of limiting words said to be derived from a comparison of other parts of the deed.

On the main question, the construction of the dispositive clause in the conveyance by Tait's trustee to Mr M'Arthur Moir, I think that this clause (keeping in view the limitation of its effect resulting from the clause of warrandice) imports a disposition of the dominium directum or superiority, in the large sense which is inclusive of the superior's reserved rights in relation to mines and minerals.

4. I have said that I read this disposition as giving the grantee an unqualified right to the superiority, as including every privilege which the granter had in virtue of his superiority title, and I may add that I think the disposition is not limited topographically. The reference to existing possession may be useful for defining the marches of the different farms which are conveyed by name; but for different reasons I am unable to read these words as importing a vertical limitation. In the first place, if it is supposed that the feuar's possession is referred to as being the measure of the limits within which the disponee of the superiority may exercise his rights, then the reference is altogether inadequate to effect such a limitation as is suggested. The feuar's sasine is not an instrument of possession of the "surface" of the lands. His right and his possession (I mean in contemplation of law) extends to the centre of the earth, subject only to the burden of suffering such necessary use of the land as may be claimed by the superior for the purpose of extracting coal or minerals having a mercantile value. If the feuar's possession has any bearing on the question, then I suppose the disponee of the minerals may mine to any necessary depth, just as the feuar may dig in search of water, or for any purpose not inconsistent with the superior's reserved rights. There is another and to my mind a better, reason for not giving the suggested meaning to the words of reference to possession, and it is this—that right to the minerals, although recognised as a right of property, is an incorporeal right, and is not the proper subject of such a limitation. I think that the meaning of the reference to possession is no more than this, that if any particular lands can be proved to have been possessed by the feuar under the sasine, the disponent of the superiority shall have a right which extends to these lands. It is implied, in the case of the superior as in that of the feuar, that his estate is in three dimensions, and is not limited to the visible surface, which would indeed be of very little use to anyone.

5. I add a single sentence on the case of Fleeming v. Howden. I understand that the present case has been referred to the whole Court, in order that we may decide the important question that has been argued to us on its merits, giving such weight to previous judicial opinions as is due to the reasoning on which they depend. It appears to me that in the case of Fleeming v. Howden it was an important, and, in the opinion of the Lord President, a determining element in the case that the disponent of the superiority had no power to convey mineral estate, being precluded from doing so by the terms of the entail under which he possessed. In that case the decision was to the effect that the conveyance carried what the disponent had the power to convey. I think that in the present case the conveyance to Mr M'Arthur Moir ought to receive effect by giving the disponent all that the granter had the power to convey; and while I do not say that my views coincide with all that is said in the opinions delivered in Fleeming, I do think that the decision in Fleeming is capable of standing along with the Lord Ordinary's judgment in this case, by giving weight to the element to which I have referred.

6. It is suggested in one of the opinions in this case, which I have had the opportunity of considering, that if, as matter of construction, a disposition in general terms transfers to the grantee every right which was in the granter, it would have the effect of transferring a feu or other subaltern right which the superior might have reacquired, or might thereafter reacquire, and this notwithstanding that feu-rights were excepted from the operation of the clause of warranty. If I rightly understand the argument, it is that in the case supposed there is no eviction, and therefore no case which brings into operation either the warranty or the exception to it. Hence, it is suggested, the grantee would take by disposition not only the superiority but such feu-rights as the granter possessed or might acquire by separate titles, contrary to the true contract which the deed was intended to carry out.

This, as I think, is a perfectly relevant and legitimate consideration to be taken into view in determining the proper principle of construction to be applied to a case like the present competition. Indeed, I think it provides a complete answer to the view (if such a view be entertained) that a dispositive clause being unambiguous, is incapable of being controlled by other clauses of the deed containing it. I wish, however, to point out that my opinion does not involve assent to such an unqualified proposition. My view has always been, as stated in the first paragraph of this opinion, that the granter may make such qualifications as he pleases, and in such parts of the deed as he pleases, provided he makes his meaning clear. I do not understand the Lord Ordinary's judgment as involving a different view, because his reasoning is founded on the unequal-fed character of the grant in so far as relates to coal. An exception of subjects already feued out may be put into the warranty, or even into the testing-clause (provided in the latter case that the clause is filled in before subscription); because the maker of a deed is not bound to be consecutive, and a Court of construction ought to give effect to every term of the contract or condition of the grant. Now, although I hold that it is according to good conveyancing that the exception of feu-rights in a conveyance of a superiority should be noticed in the dispositive clause as well as in the clause of warrandice, yet if the granter, anywhere within the confines of the deed, declares that he does not profess to give a title to the dominium utile of feus already given off, I should consider this to be a valid restriction of the effect of the dispositive clause. Having regard to the practice of conveyancers, of which we may take cognisance, I should hold that an exception inserted in the clause of warrandice is sufficient as a restriction of the dispositive clause, although not the best way of making such a restriction.

Trustees.

But I am not prepared to assent to the view that a dispositive clause may have its effect cut down by drawing inferences from statements of fact inserted in the deed by way of narrative. That appears to me to be a large, and, I fear, a dangerous extension of the principle that a clause is to be construed with reference to the subject and context. I am of opinion that the line which separates merely technical or strict construction from lax construction—a line which, I must admit, is not easily defined—has in this case been properly drawn by the Lord Ordinary, and that the reclaiming note ought accordingly to be refused.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of opinion that the defenders have been rightly assolized, and that the Court should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

It is common ground that since 1838 the defender and his predecessors have been infeft in the lands in question by virtue of titles which contain no exception or reservation of minerals. In order to succeed in his action, therefore, the pursuer must produce a prior infeftment in the minerals as a separate tenement, by which he himself either is, or may be vested in that estate, to the exclusion of the proprietor of the lands. But the pursuer's case is rested exclusively on his construction of an instrument which forms a link in the defender's title—the disposition and assignation of 1837; and he seems to me to have failed, if indeed he has attempted, to deduce his own title, so as to shew that he is either infeft or in a position to obtain infeftment in the minerals, assuming that it was intended to exclude them from the conveyance contained in that deed. His case, as it is presented in argument, and on record, proceeds on the assumption—which, as the Lord Ordinary has observed, has been accepted by the defenders—that the Castle Campbell estate, including the coal of Hillfoot, was feudally vested in Ralph Erskine Scott; and on that assumption he would probably be well founded in his contention that, if Mr Scott were not divested of the mineral estate by his disposition to John M'Arthur Moir in 1837, he must be held to have conveyed it to Sir Andrew Orr by the disposition of 1860. But the fact is that neither Mr Tait nor Mr Scott was ever feudally vested either in the superiority or in the minerals of Hillfoot. Mr Scott, therefore, not being infeft, could not effectually dispoise. The only method by which he could transfer the property was by assigning his personal right to claim sasine from the Sheriff, as crown bailie, by virtue of the open charter and precept of 1811; and accordingly the operative and effectual part of the deed of 1837 was not the disposition of lands but the assignation of the crown charter and precept, the words of disposition being unnecessary, and perhaps, as the Judges suggested in Renton v. Anstruther (15 S. 137, 2 Bell's App. 214), incorrect and improper, although undoubtedly customary. This is a consideration which may not be immaterial to the question of construction. But, in the meantime, I observe that no infeftment upon Scott's conveyance can be of any avail to the pursuer; and therefore, in order to establish the right which he alleges, he must connect his title not only with the disposition to his ancestor, of 1860, but with the warrant for infeftment in the minerals of Hillfoot, which is contained in the crown charter of 1811. This crown charter is the basis of the pursuer's title, if he has any title to the minerals; and yet he has neither produced it nor explained why it is not produced. We do not know what were its terms, but we know that it was assigned to John M'Arthur Moir "in so far as relates to the lands" of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds, and that he took infeftment on the precept. The pursuer, therefore, must either shew that the precept was not exhausted, in so far as regards the minerals, or else he must reduce the infeftment of M'Arthur Moir as going beyond its warrants, so as to enable him to take up an estate which at present stands in the defender's title. I understand that the argument has been taken on the assumption that there is no objection to the form of action. But that will not relieve the pursuer of the obligation to set forth a feudal title to the minerals he claims. I do not see how he can obtain decree until he makes it clear whether he has already a good title to the minerals, or whether he is only in a position to obtain a title after he has reduced the defender's infeftment. The presumption appears to me to be that the defender is feudally vested in the minerals in question, whether it was intended to include them in his predecessor's purchase or not; and I think it was essential for the pursuer, whose right, if it exists, must be founded on the charter of 1811, to produce that deed, and to shew how he is connected with it in title.

But the question as to the construction and effect of Mr Erskine Scott's conveyance of 1837 has been argued on the assumption that the deed is an effectual disposition of the lands. This may not be an inconvenient mode of stating the argument, because the deed disposes the lands in form; and the true question is whether, in so disposing, the granter intended to reserve the minerals to himself or to convey them to his purchaser.

There can be no question that a conveyance of lands carries the minerals as well as the surface. But it is said that the dispositive clause must be restricted in its effect, because the feudal right in the minerals had not been split, so as to create separate estates of superiority and property; and it appears from other parts of the deed that a superiority alone was intended to be conveyed.

I can find no indication of any intention to confine the conveyance to the superiority, except that which may be collected from the narrative. The other clauses which have been relied on—the obligation to infeft a me, the assignation of feu-duties and casualties, and the warrandice clauses—are equally applicable whether the minerals are conveyed or not. The intention of the deed was to put the disponent in the place of the granter, or of the granter's author, as the immediate vassal of the Crown; and an obligation to infeft otherwise than as such would have been repugnant to that intention. The exception of subaltern rights from the warrandice was appropriate and necessary, because a subaltern right had been constituted by the seller's author in favour of the donee. But that exception affords no indication whatever of the extent of the new conveyance. It must have been expressed in the same terms, if the feu-right already granted had affected only a small portion of the estate conveyed, and the greater part of it had belonged in property to Mr Tait and his trustee. The assignation of feu-duties and casualties is equally without significance, and for the same reason. It is appropriate, because a part of the estate conveyed was subject to a feu-right; but it does not follow that no other part is held by the grantor and carried to the donee in full property. The omission of an assignation of rents would have been unusual, if that part of the estate which was not affected by subaltern rights had been a rent-bearing subject. But the sole purpose and effect of the assignation is to give the donee a good title to levy the rents from tenants and occupiers, although his right to the lands may not have been made real by infeftment. Such a clause would have been futile and unmeaning with reference to minerals which were neither let nor worked at the date of the grant.

Trustees.

I cannot, therefore, assent to the proposition that the disposition, read as a whole, is conceived in terms appropriate to the conveyance of an estate of superiority only. It is in terms appropriate to the conveyance of an estate which may have been feued out in whole or in part. But the operative clauses would be equally appropriate, whether the feus already granted had affected the whole or a part of the estate described in the dispositive clause; and there is nothing except the narrative to suggest that the subject of the conveyance, although it certainly includes a superiority, is a mere estate of superiority, and nothing more.

I agree that the narrative, taken alone, sets forth a contract with reference to a superiority only. The reserved minerals were held under the superior's title; but it is not, in my opinion, an accurate use of language to describe them as forming part of the superiority. I do not think they would have been carried by a conveyance "of the superiority with the feu-duties and casualties." But the subject of the conveyance, as described in the dispositive clause, is not the superiority but the lands; and it is the function of the dispositive clause, and not of the narrative, to describe and convey the subject in which it is intended to give sasine. It cannot be disputed that lands include minerals, unless minerals are expressly reserved; and it is well-settled law that if the terms of the dispositive clause are unambiguous, they cannot be contradicted or controlled by any other part of the deed—(Ross, ii. 127, 128; Lee v. Alexander, 10 R., H. L., 91). It does not follow that the disposition may not be restricted by an express declaration in some other part of the deed, that the grantor excludes, from the conveyance, some part of the subject which might otherwise have fallen within the description. But the dispositive clause cannot be controlled by any other, which does not, in terms, purport to qualify or explain it. The canon of construction, as Lord Blackburn states it in Lee v. Alexander, is that "where the description of the premises assigned is clear and unambiguous, effect must be given to it by the Court, even though convinced from other parts of the deed, that it was not what the parties meant to say." Lord Watson, in the same case, says,—“If the terms of the dispositive clause are per se sufficient to give the right, they cannot be displaced or controlled by a reference to the other clauses of the disposition.” But it appears to me to be certain that the dispositive clause per se would be sufficient to carry the minerals. It conveys the lands in terms which admittedly include minerals, unless their meaning

No. 129. can be confined by the reference to the possession of Hillfoot. I agree with Lord Kincairney and the Lord Ordinary, for the reasons stated by them, that the reference to possession is merely demonstrative, and cannot exclude the minerals, even of Hillfoot. The conveyance is, therefore, as clear and explicit as if the minerals had been specified in express terms; and the question is whether a clear and unambiguous conveyance of lands is to be denied effect because it carries something more than is expressed in the narrative clause.

Mar. 18, 1892.
Trustees.

But it is said that a dispositive clause is always ambiguous, because it does not define the estate of property or superiority which it is intended to convey. It is true that in correct feudal form the lands should be disposed in the same terms, whether a dominium utile or a dominium directum is conveyed. But that is because the subject of the dispositive clause is not the feudal right, but the lands themselves. A dispositive clause cannot be said to be ambiguous, because it does not define the holding. That is no part of its function. It specifies the disponent, the subject conveyed, and the real burdens and reservations with which it is intended that it shall be affected. It will be expressed in the same terms, therefore, whether the lands are to be held of the granter, or of the granter's superior; and it is, in general, expressed in the same terms, whether they are affected by subaltern rights or not, provided such subaltern rights are not vested in the granter himself. But this identity of expression involves no ambiguity in the dispositive clause itself, although the feudal character of the disponent's right may differ, in different cases. In all the cases supposed it will carry the whole land and estate, within the description and covered by the granter's infestment, except in so far as the conveyance may be limited by an express reservation.

It has been suggested that if a conveyance by a superior of lands which had been feued out had this effect, it would carry the dominium utile which was not vested in the granter, notwithstanding an exception of subaltern rights in the clause of warrandice. But it is just because such a conveyance does in fact carry the whole estate, that the exception from the clause of warrandice is necessary. It is not because the property of the vassal is not included in the superior's conveyance, but because it is so included, that the superior must be protected by the exception, from an action upon the warrandice. The effect of the superior's conveyance is limited by the recorded infestment of the vassal, but not by anything in the conveyance itself, except in so far as the disponent may be precluded by a personal obligation expressed or implied in the warrandice clause, from challenging a subaltern right which might otherwise have been reducible. An obligation to this effect is not unusual, to preclude the grantee from reducing the excepted rights, on grounds which might infer warrandice against the granter. But the necessity for such a stipulation only serves to illustrate the effect of the disposition; and, accordingly, Mr Duff recommends that an exception of subaltern rights should be inserted not only in the clause of warrandice but also in the dispositive clause, "in order that it may qualify the conveyance; for although such exception, even in the warrandice, may operate against the disponent, it would plainly be ineffectual in a question with an adjudger, whose diligence, when perfected by infestment, would thus exclude subaltern grants made by the seller or his predecessor which had not been duly feudalised, the vassals on these having no remedy but under their author's personal obligation of warrandice. The same result might take place where a second purchaser or bondholder had acquired a right in which the exception was not repeated.”—(Duff’s Feudal Conveyancing, sec. 140 ; Dewar, No. 129. Mor. Dict. 16,637 ; Erskine, ii. 3, 31.)

But whatever be the effect of an exception from the warrandice as regards the rights of vassals, I take it to be clear in law that an unqualified conveyance of lands will carry all the rights vested in the granter himself, whether of property or superiority. If he means to reserve any subject which is within the description, and is covered by his infeftment, he must in terms exclude it from the conveyance.

Mar. 18, 1892.
Trustees.

It is said to be doubtful whether a conveyance by a proprietor infeft in two separate fees will comprehend both fees, if it does not contain the words “with all right, title, and interest,” in addition to the description of the lands. I venture to think that this doubt is without foundation ; and Professor Bell, who is referred to as having given it some countenance, says distinctly that the words cited are not essential, at least in onerous deeds. But the point has no bearing on the present discussion, because the only plausible ground, on which the effect of such a conveyance has been questioned, appears to have been that when two distinct fees in the same lands are held upon separate titles, a disposition of the lands must be ascribed to the nobler title, and not to the inferior, and will therefore carry the superiority only. But when an estate is held upon one title only, it is of no consequence that a part of it is a superiority. It is not open to question that a conveyance of lands, of which a portion has been feued, will carry the dominium directum of that portion, and the full dominium of the rest. In other words, it will carry the lands as they stood in the granter, subject to the subaltern rights.

This follows of necessity from the nature of the right that still remains vested in the granter of a feu. A superior is not divested of the lands contained in the grant to his vassal. “His right continues unimpaired except so far as the grant conveys the dominium utile to the grantee”—(Erskine, ii. 5, 1). His infeftment subsists in every other respect ; and it follows that his conveyance of lands, described as in his own title, will carry everything covered by his infeftment, subject only to the right already constituted in his vassal.

It can make no difference whether that part of the estate which is unaffected by the subaltern right consists of minerals, or whether it extends a celo ad centrum. The effect of a reservation of minerals in a grant of lands, as the Lord Ordinary explains in Fleeming v. Howden, is to separate the minerals from the estate which is vested in the grantee. But it does not separate them from the estate which still remains vested in the granter. They remain, as they were before, an integral part of the lands in which he is infeft, just as any other portion remains which has not been included in the grant to the vassal ; and an unqualified conveyance of the lands will divest the superior of his minerals, just as it will divest him of every other part and portion of the land described in the conveyance.

It appears to me, therefore, that there is no ambiguity in the dispositive clause. It is true that it does not distinguish between superiority and dominium utile. But it describes the subject-matter of the conveyance, and, in so far as regards the subject-matter, a conveyance of land means the same thing, whether it occurs in an original grant, in a disposition by the vassal, or in a disposition by the superior. There is nothing, therefore, in the nature of the superior’s right to justify a reference to the other clauses of the deed for the purpose of ascertaining the subject of the conveyance. But if these other clauses are referred to, they are all, except the narrative, in perfect conformity with the dispositive clause. There is not one of the operative clauses which would have been expressed otherwise, if the minerals had been conveyed in terms. It is the narrative clause alone which creates any ambiguity. The argument therefore is that the dispositive clause is ambiguous, because it is not in conformity with the narrative, and that the narrative clause may be called in to control the dispositive, because the dispositive clause is ambiguous.

The pursuer's argument is, in substance, that the two clauses being in conflict, the narrative must prevail. I am not satisfied that there is any conflict; because, although the minerals are not accurately described as a part of the superiority, they are undoubtedly part of the superior's estate, and the subject of the two clauses may be substantially the same, in the framer's intention, although it is described imperfectly or inaccurately in the one, and more correctly in the other. But if the intention of the narrative were clearly repugnant to that of the dispositive clause, it is the latter that, according to the established canon of construction, must necessarily receive effect.

The question is not whether the deed confers dominium utile in the minerals, or dominium directum, but whether the minerals are conveyed at all; and the narrative is not invoked for the purpose of clearing up the point on which the dispositive clause is said to be inexplicit, and defining the feudal character of the right which the deed confers in the subject conveyed. Even for this purpose I should not think it legitimate to control the operative clauses by the narrative, if the operative clauses themselves are not ambiguous. But it is used, in fact, for the purpose of excluding altogether from the operation of the dispositive clause a subject which falls within its terms. The dispositive clause, according to the ordinary rules of construction, includes minerals, and the narrative is relied upon to exclude minerals from the conveyance.

It is said to have this effect because the conveyance is of a superiority, and a superiority cannot include minerals which have not been made the subject of a feu-right. The answer is that the deed does not convey a superiority, or a dominium utile. It conveys lands to be held of the granter's superior, subject to existing subaltern rights. If the subaltern rights are not coextensive with the lands included in the granter's infeftment, the property of that part of the estate which has not been feued is conveyed with effect, as the whole estate is conveyed in form, by the dispositive clause.

But the deed, as I have observed, is not to be construed as a disposition by a proprietor infeft. It is a disposition and assignation of a personal right, and the operative part of it is the assignation of the crown charter. The argument upon this point appears to have been misunderstood. The assignation of writs, when it occurs in a disposition, is merely subsidiary. Its purpose is to fortify the right conveyed by the dispositive clause; and accordingly it is said that the assignation of the charter can have no other effect than to warrant infeftment in the subjects already disposed. But when, as in the present case, the granter has no power to dispoise, the assignation of a charter and open precept is the only part of the deed which has any operative force and effect. If there were any conflict between the clause which formally dispoises the lands and the clause which effectually assigns the right, it might be a question which should prevail. But they are in perfect conformity with one another, and both of them include the whole lands, without exception of the minerals, as conveyed by the crown charter. The material point is that the seller, who is supposed have intended a reservation of minerals, has not only conveyed the estate without reservation by his own deed, but has also made over to his purchaser, absolutely and without qualification, the crown charter and precept which alone made it possible to complete a title in any part of the estate. The argument is that the superiority only was conveyed, and that the minerals remained in the grantor's title. But the grantor had no title either to the minerals or to the superiority; and if he had intended to complete a title to the minerals, he must have reserved right to make use of the crown precept for that purpose.

I do not think that the case of Fleeming v. Howden rules the present case. A decision on the construction of one instrument cannot be a precedent for the construction of another and different instrument; and the difference between the deed in Fleeming v. Howden and the deed now in question appears to me to be very material, for Charles Fleeming and his commissioners had no power to sell the minerals, and their want of power was clear on the face of the deed. The decision, therefore, was that a conveyance of lands will not carry minerals which it appears from the deed the grantor has no power to convey. It may be that an explicit statement of a limitation of the grantor's powers may be equivalent to an express declaration of intention to confine the scope of the conveyance. But that is not a reason for qualifying a conveyance, when the grantor's powers are not limited in any other way than by express reservation. There is no such reservation, even in the narrative of the deed now in question. The utmost that can be said is that the narrative imports an intention to convey a superiority, and no other intention; and therefore that the narrative would be satisfied if nothing more than a superiority were conveyed. But the dispositive clause does, in fact, convey a superiority, and something more. The question would be precisely the same if it had conveyed the minerals in terms. The argument, in that case, would probably have been stated in a different form; and the pursuer's contention would have been in terms—as I think it is now in substance—not that the dispositive clause, when properly construed, is insufficient to convey minerals, but that in so far as it bears to convey minerals it is invalid and ineffectual, since the narrative shews that it was not intended that minerals should be conveyed. It appears to me to be a sufficient ground of judgment that an unambiguous conveyance cannot be overruled by an inference, to be collected from the narrative, that something less was intended than has been actually conveyed.

LORD WELLWOOD.—In judging whether the coal in the lands of Hillfoot and others was carried by the disposition by Mr R. E. Scott to J. M'Arthur Moir of 28th July 1837, it is legitimate and necessary to consider the state of the disponent's title at that date. He, as trustee on the sequestrated estates of Crawford Tait, was vested (1) in the plenum dominium of the coal, and (2) in the superiority of the surface which had been feued out to the defender's predecessor. Thus while he had the full and undivided estate of the coal, he had also the superiority of the surface, including right to the feu-duty payable by the proprietor of the surface, who happened to be at that date the disponent, Mr John M'Arthur Moir.

Keeping in view this state of the titles, I next proceed to consider the terms of the disposition, reading it in its natural order. It proceeds on the narrative of the disponent's right as trustee to, inter alia, "the superiority and feu-duty of the lauds of Hillfoot and others lying in the parish of Dollar and county of

No. 129. Clackmannan, belonging in property to Mr John M'Arthur Moir of Hillfoot"
 Mar. 18, 1892. I observe in passing that Mr Moir was proprietor of the surface only, and not Orr v. Moir's of the minerals; it is therefore reasonable to infer that the word "superiority"
 Trustees. is used with special reference to the rights of the superior in relation to J.
 M'Arthur Moir's right of property which was limited to the surface. The deed then proceeds to narrate that the disposer having exposed, inter alia, "the said superiority and feu-duty of the lands of Hillfoot to public roup and sale, Mr Moir had been preferred to the purchase, being the highest offerer, and that he had paid the purchase price; and had also, by private bargain, purchased "the superiority and feu-duty of the lands of Lochyfaulds and others." The deed then proceeds: "Therefore I as trustee foresaid have sold, alienated, and dis-poned, as I with consent foresaid do hereby sell, alienate, and dispose from me and my successors in office or in the said lands and others to and in favour of the said John M'Arthur Moir, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole the town and lands of Hillfoot," &c., "all as at present possessed by the said John M'Arthur Moir and his tenants; as also
 All and Whole the lands of Lochyfaulds, . . . formerly possessed by James Sharp, smith, and Thomas Hall, weaver, with the whole parts, pendicles, and pertinents thereof, all as more particularly described in the ancient rights and infeftments thereof." In the warrandice clause there is the following exception: "Excepting always from this warrandice the feu-rights or infeftments of property of the said lands granted by my predecessors and authors to the feuars and vassals thereof."

It is maintained by the defender that, the coal not having been expressly reserved, the dispositive clause carried everything which the disposer had to convey, including the coal.

1. I shall assume, in the meantime, that the dispositive clause, if taken by itself, is unqualified and ex facie wide enough to carry all the disposer's rights in the lands of Hillfoot and others. It is impossible, however, to read the narrative and the dispositive clause together without seeing that the narrative is not consistent with this construction of the dispositive clause. The deed proceeds on the narrative of the sale of "superiority and feu-duty" of lands belonging in property to Moir, the donee; while the dispositive clause ex hypothesi is wide enough to convey the whole estate, which still remained in the disposer, including the coal, which did not belong in property to Moir, but to the disposer. How are the two clauses to be reconciled?

It is settled law that the dispositive clause in a conveyance cannot be contradicted by subsidiary clauses; and if they conflict with it, it must rule. But it is equally well settled that the dispositive clause admits of construction; and that if it can be reconciled with other clauses in the deed which are unambiguous, it may be construed and qualified so as to be read in accordance with them.

The solution in the present case, I think, is that a conveyance of the land is the appropriate way of conveying various and distinct rights. It is equally suitable for conveying the dominium plenum and the dominium utile. Again, it is a known and habile way of conveying a bare superiority. It is not only a habile way of doing so, but the more correct and appropriate form of conveyance; although it has been held to be also competent to convey the superiority or dominium directum in express terms. In each case you must examine the other clauses in the deed in order to ascertain the character and extent of the right conveyed.

The form of the dispositive clause, therefore, being equally applicable to a No. 129.
conveyance of the superiority and a conveyance of all that remained in the disponer, I think it is legitimate to ascertain from the narrative and other clauses Mar. 18, 1892.
of the deed and the titles which of the two the disponent intended to convey. Orr v. Moir's
Trustees.

The narrative is not, in my opinion, ambiguous. The word "superiority" is not properly used as meaning all that remains in the superior after he has feued out part only of the dominium utile. It is a relative term, and is and should in legal language be exclusively used (as here) in relation to and as contrasted with the dominium utile of the lands or those portions of them which have been feued out. "Superiority" implies a previous severance of the dominium utile or part of it, and the consequent existence of a vassal holding of the superior. In this case the only vassal whom the disponent had in Hillfoot was the proprietor of the dominium utile of the surface; and when the deed speaks of the superiority and feu-duty of lands belonging in property to the vassal, I think that the word superiority must be referred to the only portion of the lands of Hillfoot which had been feued out and belonged to the vassal, and that it cannot be held as intended to include that portion of the dominium utile which had been expressly reserved and never been feued out.

This use of the word is justified by reference to the origin of the terms dominium directum and dominium utile, which were invented, I think, to express the two estates resulting from the creation of a feu; dominium directum meaning the bare right or interest left with the grantor—(2 Ross's Lect., 147, 148).

Apart from the narrative, other subsidiary clauses of the deed are appropriate to and indicate a conveyance of an estate of superiority. In particular, the obligation to infeft, the exception of the feu-rights, and the assignation to the duties.

Therefore, interpreting the dispositive clause by the narrative, I think it is clear that only the bare superiority was conveyed, and not the coal, unless, indeed, there is an insuperable conveyancing objection to adopting such a construction. In my opinion no such objection exists, because the disponent's estate in the coal was distinct and separate from the superiority conveyed.

The case of Fleeming v. Howden (6 Macph. 782) is directly in point if regard be had to the conclusions of the action and the form of the judgment of the Inner-House, and also to the grounds of judgment not only of the Judges of the Inner-House, but of the Lord Ordinary, whose judgment they recalled.

The summons concluded not merely for declarator of the pursuer's right of property in the mines, metals, and minerals, but also for reduction of the disposition of 1811, and deeds following thereon, in so far as that deed, or the deeds following thereon, could be held to have disposed the said mines, metals, and minerals to the vassals in the lands. The Lord Ordinary found that under the deed of 1811, and deeds following thereon, the defender acquired an ex facie legal title to the minerals, and that the pursuer was barred by the negative description from challenging that disposition. He therefore assoilized the defender. In recalling this judgment the Inner-House did not find it necessary to reduce the deeds in question, but merely found and declared in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, in substance affirming the second plea in law for the pursuer,—“(2) Neither the disposition of the superiority of the defender's lands, granted in 1811, nor any of the other titles held as founded on by the defender, did, according to their sound meaning and true legal construction, convey the mines, metals, and minerals of the said lands, nor in any way exclude or impair the right thereto reserved by the titles to the property thereof, in favour of the heirs of entail of John Earl of Wigtown."

The Lord Ordinary's grounds of judgment are clearly expressed in his note (6 Macph. 785),—"Whatever may have been the intention of the parties, there seems no reason to doubt that the disposition of 1811 operated as a valid feudal conveyance, not only of the superiority, but of every reserved right in the lands belonging to the superior. According to the principles of our law, the dominium directum is a right to the lands themselves burdened only with the vassal's right, and whatever is reserved in the vassal's charter remains the property of the superior. The right to the minerals was never separated from the superiority, so as to constitute a separate tenement. Therefore, when the superiority was conveyed to Lord Elphinstone in 1811, in the usual form of a disposition to the lands, with all right, title, and interest which the superior had in the lands, subject only to the burden of the feu-right, the right to the mines and minerals necessarily passed to the disponee along with the dominium directum, and no right of any kind remained in the grantor, for where lands are conveyed without reservation a right to the minerals, as well as to the soil, is understood to be given, and if this is not intended, the minerals must be expressly excepted from the grant. If this view be correct, the disposition carried every right in the lands which the superior had, including the property of the minerals, which had been reserved in the original feu-right." Those grounds of judgment, which form the backbone of the defender's argument in this case, were rejected by the Inner-House.

Before considering the reasons given by the Judges of the First Division, I should mention that the disposition of 1811 was couched in practically the same terms as the deed now under consideration. The deed, after narrating the circumstances under which the superiorities were being sold, ran as follows:—"We, James Lord Elphinstone, proprietor of the lands and others after mentioned, desirous of purchasing the superiorities, casualties, and feu-duties which are part of the said entailed estates, we have resolved to sell the same to the highest bidder of the powers given to us by the foresaid commissary, and then, after payment of £480—as the price of the superiorities, casualties, and duties to be paid and others after mentioned belonging in property to the said estates, to the said and whole the lands in question, and all right title and interest they had therein. It will be observed that although the narrative of the deed is more redundant, it closely resembles that in the deed of 1811, and especially in this, that the superiority to be conveyed was the superiority of the lands of which the disponee already possessed, and that he was to have the same as he had the property were, as in the deed of 1811. The question to be decided was whether that deed carried the minerals which had been reserved by the earlier titles as in the deed of 1811.

The Inner-House affirmed two propositions:—First, that where a proprietor of lands feu'd to a vassal reserves the minerals the latter are erected into a separate tenement, and the conveyance admits of construction, and that the phrase "the lands" being a habile way of referring to the lands, the holder is to be held to carry such reserved right if he does not expressly declare a negative intention to do so.

In regard to the first point, it is, I think, immaterial whether the original owner's interest reserved in the minerals is regarded as plenum dominium, or as consisting of (1) dominium directum, and (2) dominium utile, although I think the former view is the more correct; in either view it is distinct from the superiority of the surface. Compare the opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) in Hutton v. Macfarlane, 2 Macph. 85; and that of Lord Curriehill in Fleeming v. Howden, 6 Macph. 790. No. 129.
Mar. 18, 1892.
Trustees.

The more important passages in the opinions of the Judges are so fully quoted in the cases that I do not think it necessary to quote them again here; but as bearing out what I have given as the import of the judgment, I may refer particularly to the opinion of Lord Curriehill, pp. 790, 791, and the concise opinion of Lord Deas on pp. 794, 795.

They held that, ex facie of the deed, the minerals were not carried. Lord Curriehill, for instance, states the first question thus, p. 791,—“Whether or not, according to the true meaning and construction of the disposition of 1811, the mines were included in the subjects thereby disposed?” The answer of that question in the negative was the result at which the Court arrived.

Lord Deas, again, says that, looking at the deed of 1811, it was so perfectly clear on the face of it that it was not intended to convey the minerals, that it would be only waste of time to go over its terms,—“It professes to be granted on terms of the Act of Parliament, 20 Geo. II. c. 51, which gives power to heirs of entail to convey the superiority of lands to purchasers, but nothing else.” He then proceeds (p. 795),—“The question remains, whether—because the dispositive clause conveys the lands in general terms—this in point of law creates a conveyance of the minerals, whatever the intention of the parties may have been. I know nothing to warrant such a construction. Take the case already put, where one person has a feudal title to the minerals, and another to the lands; it does not follow that the minerals are conveyed with the lands, though they are not expressly excepted. The ordinary form of a disposition of superiority shews that the dispositive clause is subject to construction not only by the rest of the deed, but sometimes by other deeds. A disposition limited to the superiority has been sustained. But the usual and correct form is to dispose the lands themselves, and the feu-rights would stand good, even although they were not excepted (as they usually are) in the clause of warrandice.”

It must be conceded in favour of the defenders in the present case that in Fleeming v. Howden the Court founded strongly upon the fact that the commissioners had no power to convey anything but the superiority of the vassal's lands, and that this was patent on the face of the deed and the statute referred to; and in the present case the disponent had power, if he chose, to disponent the minerals. But that was only one conspicuous indication of intention which strengthened a construction of the deed, which was sufficiently clear without it. Fleeming v. Howden at least enables us to construe the word “superiority.” It is an authority for this, that it is not to be inferred from a narrative of power well to a vassal the “superiority” of lands owned by him, followed by a narrative that the vassal has agreed to purchase the superiority, that anything more is to be conveyed than the bare superiority of that portion of the estate which the vassal already possesses.

As to the older case of Erskine v. Shaw, we are under the disadvantage of having a very imperfect report of the opinions of the Judges. The case un-tion, convey the mines, metals, and minerals of the said lands, nor in any way exclude or impair the right thereto reserved by the titles to the property thereof, in favour of the heirs of entail of John Earl of Wigtown."

The Lord Ordinary's grounds of judgment are clearly expressed in his note (6 Macph. 785),—"Whatever may have been the intention of the parties, there seems no reason to doubt that the disposition of 1811 operated as a valid feudal conveyance, not only of the superiority, but of every reserved right in the lands belonging to the superior. According to the principles of our law, the dominium directum is a right to the lands themselves burdened only with the vassal's right, and whatever is reserved in the vassal's charter remains the property of the superior. The right to the minerals was never separated from the superiority, so as to constitute a separate tenement. Therefore, when the superiority was conveyed to Lord Elphinstone in 1811, in the usual form of a disposition to the lands, with all right, title, and interest which the superior had in the lands, subject only to the burden of the feu-right, the right to the mines and minerals necessarily passed to the disponee along with the dominium directum, and no right of any kind remained in the grantor, for where lands are conveyed without reservation a right to the minerals, as well as to the soil, is understood to be given, and if this is not intended, the minerals must be expressly excepted from the grant. If this view be correct, the disposition carried every right to the lands which the superior had, including the property of the minerals, which had been reserved in the original feu-right." Those grounds of judgment, which form the backbone of the defender's argument in this case, were rejected by the Inner-House.

Before considering the reasons given by the Judges of the First Division, I should mention that the disposition of 1811 was couched in practically the same terms as the deed now under consideration. The deed, after narrating the commission under which the superiorities were being sold, ran as follows:—"Seeing that John Lord Elphinstone, proprietor of the lands and others after mentioned, is desirous of purchasing the superiorities, casualties, and feu-duties thereof, which are part of the said entailed estates, we have resolved to sell the same to him in virtue of the powers given to us by the foresaid commission"; and then, after narrating payment of £480 "as the price of the superiorities, feu-duties, and others of the lands and others after mentioned belonging in property to him," conveyed to him all and whole the lands in question, and all right, title, and interest they had therein. It will be observed that although this narrative is rather fuller and more redundant, it closely resembles that in the deed under consideration, especially in this, that the superiority to be conveyed was the superiority of lands the property of which the disponee already possessed, and that the only "lands" of which he had the property were, as here, the surface. The question to be decided was whether that deed carried the minerals which had been specially reserved by the earlier titles as in the present case.

I think that the judgment of the Inner-House affirmed two propositions:—which ample authority was quoted. First, that where a proprietor of lands feu out the surface, reserving the minerals, the latter are erected into a separate estate; secondly, that the dispositive clause admits of construction, and that a conveyance in the dispositive clause of "the lands" being a habile way of conveying a bare superiority, will not be held to carry such reserved right if the context and the history of the titles negative an intention to do so.

In regard to the first point, it is, I think, immaterial whether the original owner's interest reserved in the minerals is regarded as plenum dominium, or as consisting of (1) dominium directum, and (2) dominium utile, although I think the former view is the more correct; in either view it is distinct from the superiority of the surface. Compare the opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) in Hutton v. Macfarlane, 2 Macph. 85; and that of Lord Curriehill in Fleeming v. Howden, 6 Macph. 790.

Orr v. Moir's Trustees.

The more important passages in the opinions of the Judges are so fully quoted in the cases that I do not think it necessary to quote them again here; but as bearing out what I have given as the import of the judgment, I may refer particularly to the opinion of Lord Curriehill, pp. 790, 791, and the concise opinion of Lord Deas on pp. 794, 795.

They held that, ex facie of the deed, the minerals were not carried. Lord Curriehill, for instance, states the first question thus, p. 791,—“Whether or not, according to the true meaning and construction of the disposition of 1811, the mines were included in the subjects thereby disposed?” The answer of that question in the negative was the result at which the Court arrived.

Lord Deas, again, says that, looking at the deed of 1811, it was so perfectly clear on the face of it that it was not intended to convey the minerals, that it would be only waste of time to go over its terms,—“It professes to be granted in terms of the Act of Parliament, 20 Geo. II. c. 51, which gives power to heirs of entail to convey the superiority of lands to purchasers, but nothing else.” He then proceeds (p. 795),—“The question remains, whether—because the dispositive clause conveys the lands in general terms—this in point of law operates a conveyance of the minerals, whatever the intention of the parties may have been. I know nothing to warrant such a construction. Take the case already put, where one person has a feudal title to the minerals, and another to the lands; it does not follow that the minerals are conveyed with the lands, though they are not expressly excepted. The ordinary form of a disposition of superiority shews that the dispositive clause is subject to construction not only by the rest of the deed, but sometimes by other deeds. A disposition limited to the superiority has been sustained. But the usual and correct form is to dispose the lands themselves, and the feu-rights would stand good, even although they were not excepted (as they usually are) in the clause of warrantance.”

It must be conceded in favour of the defenders in the present case that in Fleeming v. Howden the Court founded strongly upon the fact that the commissioners had no power to convey anything but the superiority of the vassal's lands, and that this was patent on the face of the deed and the statute referred to; while in the present case the disponent had power, if he chose, to dispose the minerals. But that was only one conspicuous indication of intention which strengthened a construction of the deed, which was sufficiently clear without it. Fleeming v. Howden at least enables us to construe the word “superiority.” It is an authority for this, that it is not to be inferred from a narrative of power granted to a vassal the “superiority” of lands owned by him, followed by a narrative that the vassal has agreed to purchase the superiority, that anything more is to be conveyed than the bare superiority of that portion of the estate which the vassal already possesses.

As to the older case of Erskine v. Schau, we are under the disadvantage of having a very imperfect report of the opinions of the Judges. The case undoubtedly seems to be in point in so far as regards the terms of the deed. But the opinions of several of the majority of the Judges seem to proceed to a considerable extent upon the subsequent actings of the parties and their presumed intention in entering into the transaction. By far the most detailed opinion reported in Sir Hay Campbell's notes is that of Lord Eskgrove, which expresses distinctly and clearly the material heads of the argument for the pursuer in this case.

Having to choose between the two decisions, I prefer the reasoned judgment in the case of Fleeming v. Houden to that in the older case of Erskine v. Schaw.

2. In the view which I have expressed it is unnecessary to consider the effect of the words in the dispositive clause which occur in the conveyance of the lands of Hillfoot and others, but not in that of the lands of Lochyfaulds and others, "all as at present possessed by the said John M'Arthur Moir and his tenants." There is authority for holding that such a description is taxative as regards the superficial boundaries of the lands conveyed (1 Bell's Lect. 586, and Murray v. Oliphant's Wife, M. 2262); and it may be that they are also taxative as regards the different strata. On this question I prefer to reserve my opinion. The words, however, are at least quite consistent with, and indeed confirm, the interpretation which the pursuer places on the narrative.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and decree given in favour of the pursuer.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to decree. The disposition of 1837 is, in my opinion, a disposition of a mere superiority, and I am unable to hold that the property of the minerals formed, or could form, part of that superiority. The view I take of the case is shortly this:—

I first inquire, What is the legal construction of the disposition—construing it according to its terms, and without reference to anything not appearing on its face?

The deed begins with a narrative which recites, carefully and at length, two contracts of sale which it is the object of the disposition to carry out. Those contracts of sale are set forth as the sole inducing causes of the disposition. And the subject sold is in each case declared to be the "superiority and feudal duty" of certain described lands. There is nothing about minerals or about any estate of property. The narrative recites simply the purchase of a superiority—a superiority assumed, if not expressed, to be coextensive with the described lands.

With such a narrative, one certainly expects to find that the other and operative clauses of the deed are appropriate to the conveyance of a mere superiority—that is to say, are expressed in the manner in which such a conveyance usually and properly expressed. Are then the other clauses in conformity with the narrative? Or do they go beyond the narrative and embrace a subject which had not been sold?

Neglecting in the meantime the dispositive clause, it can hardly, I think, be doubted that the other clauses of the deed are appropriate to the conveyance of a mere superiority, and have all the usual notes of such a conveyance. In particular, the warrandice contains an exception of subaltern rights. The obligation to infeft is a me, and not a me vel de me. There is no assignation of rents, but only an assignation of feu-duties and casualties. The assignation of warrandice (which includes an assignation to an unexecuted precept in a crown charter resignation) is qualified, so as to assign the precept only so far as applicable "to the town and lands of Hillfoot and others above disposed," and it is only granted "to the end that the disponee may be more readily seized and infeft in the premises." But, with or without such qualification, the clause is appropriate, on the assumption expressed in the narrative, to operate an infeftment in a superiority and in nothing else.

No. 129.

Turning next to the dispositive clause, it also is in appropriate terms. It conveys the superiority of the lands in the usual and appropriate mode, viz., by conveying the lands. It makes no exception of minerals, because, in point of construction, and according to the scheme of the deed, the conveyance included the superiority of the minerals. On the other hand, it omits the words (usual in a conveyance of plenum dominium) by which the granter conveys his whole right, title, and interest, present and future, in the subjects.

In short, I do not think it can well be doubted that, simply reading the disposition, and not going outside it, any Scotch conveyancer would at once recognise it as a quite typical disposition of a superiority, every clause being expressed exactly as it ought to be, on the assumption that it was desired to convey, or attempt to convey, a superiority over the whole lands described, and nothing more than such a superiority.

Within the deed therefore there is, if I am so far right, no ambiguity. But then it is said—and this I think raises the real question in the case—that on going outside the deed, and investigating the granter's title, it appears that ~~word~~ one part of the lands described, viz., the minerals, there was in fact no superiority, but only a dominium plenum, which had never been "split," so as ~~validly~~ to create a superiority. In other words, it is said that the assumption of the deed, viz., that the superiority extended to the minerals as well as the surface, was erroneous, whence it is said to follow that the deed must be reconstructed in the light of this circumstance, and must be held to operate a conveyance of the plenum dominium of the minerals, because the language of the dispositive clause is apt to carry such plenum dominium, and if it does not do so, must be held, as regards the minerals, to carry nothing. It is further said that when once it is known that the minerals were held in plenum dominium, it becomes impossible to read the assignation to the precept in the crown charter except as contemplating an infeftment in such plenum dominium, because otherwise, just as with the dispositive clause, the assignation would, ~~quoad~~ the minerals, operate nothing.

Now, I am not prepared to admit that the disposition, taking it as a disposition confined to the superiority of the minerals, operated nothing. It certainly did not, as the title stood, warrant any infeftment in the minerals; and if the infeftment which followed upon it was so expressed as to apply to the minerals, it was infeftment beyond its warrant, and therefore so far inoperative. But the disposition at least imported an obligation by the disponent to vest the disponee in the superiority of the minerals, and I suppose it is not doubtful that the necessary "split" between the property and superiority of the minerals could have been quite easily effected if the disponent was willing or could be compelled to bear the expense of a not unfamiliar conveyancing operation. That operation might have been performed in various ways. The simplest way would have been for the disponent to grant a corroborative disposition of the minerals in exchange for a feu-charter by the disponee reconveying the dominium utile of the minerals. Or the disponent might have made up his title to the minerals

No. 129. (assumed to be not validly conveyed) and have then granted a feu-charter to his agent, and thereafter made a new and valid disposition of the superiority in favour of the disponee. In short, reading the disposition as I read it, it was not at all inoperative, but only as regards the minerals incomplete. It transferred the right, but something more was required to transfer the title, the disposer being however bound, and having it in his power, to do what was necessary for that purpose.

But further, and even assuming that the disposition, read as a conveyance of a mere superiority, was as regards the minerals inoperative, I cannot assent to the argument that this in itself warrants an enlargement of the construction so as to make the deed read, quoad the minerals, as a conveyance of a plenum dominium. It may be that, if you discard the narrative, and also the assignment to feu-duties and casualties, the other clauses of the disposition are not inconsistent with a conveyance of plenum dominium. It may also be, that if you assume such a conveyance, the disposition becomes operative throughout. But the question after all is, What did the parties to the disposition mean? and if the narrative is clear, and the operative clauses are consistent with the narrative—though also it may be consistent with something else—that something else is not necessarily to be assumed, merely because it turns out that otherwise the deed will in some particular fail of effect. The construction of a deed is one thing, its effect is another. The results of a given construction may no doubt be an element for or against such construction, but they cannot override the language of the deed, or the scheme of the deed, if such scheme is clear upon its face. Supposing one has to choose between, on the one hand, ignoring the narrative of a deed, and, on the other hand, acknowledging that the deed professes to do more than it validly effects, I confess I see no reason why the former alternative should necessarily be preferred to the latter.

In this case, as I have already said, I think the scheme of this disposition is sufficiently clear on its face. The narrative, I think, plainly implies, if indeed it does not express, the assumption that the superiority disposed is coextensive with the lands. That is to say, it plainly assumes that there has been a "split" both in the surface and in the minerals. The superiority sold is said to be the superiority of the lands, i.e., the whole lands, and that cannot, I think, mean less than that the disposition proceeded on the footing that such superiority existed. Now, suppose that that had been expressed in so many words, suppose that it had been set forth in terms that the superiority and property of the surface and minerals had been, or were believed to have been, validly split, and that then the deed had proceeded, in the terms in which it does proceed (perfectly apt terms), to convey that superiority, could the disponee in that case be heard to claim the plenum dominium of the minerals on the ground which is now suggested? I cannot think so, but yet, if I am right, that is in substance the case with which we have to deal.

In truth, the defenders' argument may really be illustrated thus. It was formerly, as we know, the practice for landowners in Scotland to split the superiority and property of their estates for voting purposes, and to divide the superiority among their friends and relatives. The dispositions conveying the superiorities were expressed exactly as the disposition here. But it was occasionally discovered, sometimes long afterwards, that the original split had been badly performed, so that there was really no superiority which could be effectually conveyed. What was the position of the landowners who had in their circumstances granted those dispositions? According to the defenders they had No. 129.

divested themselves of their whole estate. The dispositions were ineffectual as Mar. 18, 1892.
dispositions of a superiority. They were effectual if read as dispositions of plenum Ott v. Moir's dominium. Therefore, however clear may have been the narrative, however Trustees.

appropriate to that narrative may have been the operative clauses, each disposition, so soon as the state of the title was discovered, became a disposition of a plenum dominium, dividing the landowner's estate among his friends.

I come therefore to the conclusion that it is not always safe to go outside deeds of this description in order to construe them by the state of the title. It may be sometimes necessary to do so; but not, I venture to think, when, without doing so, and taking the narrative and operative clauses together, the intention and scheme of the instrument are sufficiently clear.

I may note one or two observations on certain points which have more or less come up in the argument.

It has been suggested that the expression "superiority and feu-duty," as used in the narrative, may be read as covering the whole estate possessed by the superior in the lands, including reserved (or acquired) minerals held in plenum dominium. I do not myself think it possible so to hold. A superiority cannot exist except as relative to a dominium utile, and cannot extend to a subject of which the superiority and property remain unsplit. Nor do I think it possible to regard the right to minerals as a mere accessory right—not amounting to a right of property. I think it must now be held as settled that minerals form, or may form, a separate estate, capable of separate infeftment, and in no respect less capable than the surface of being held as a separate estate.

It seems also to be suggested—at least the suggestion runs through the defenders' argument—that undue liberty is taken with the dispositive clause in holding it to be open to construction. In other words, it is said that a disposition of lands—if made without exception or reservation—conveys, as matter of construction, every estate existing in the lands, and conveys with effect every estate possessed, or that may come to be possessed, by the disponent. In short, the dispositive clause here is said to be clear and unambiguous, necessarily conveying, inter alia, the plenum dominium of the minerals, and not capable of being controlled by the narrative even if the narrative is clear.

The answer to this seems to be that there are, according to feudal law, three estates or dominia which may exist in or over lands,—(1) the dominium plenum; (2) the dominium directum; and (3) the dominium utile; and that according to settled practice the disposition is expressed in exactly the same terms whichever of these estates is intended to be conveyed. In each case, the clause simply disposes the lands, making no exception or reservation either of subaltern rights or over-superiorities. On this matter reference may be made, inter alia, to the Juridical Styles (vol. 1, pp. 113 and 125), and Duff's Feudal Conveyancing, p. 191. In both of those works—works of the highest authority in such matters—it is carefully explained that as between property and superiority there is no difference in the terms of the disposition; the differences to be noted by the conveyancer being only the difference in the warrandice, the assignation to rents, and other ancillary clauses. And if it be asked how this ambiguity (or indeterminateness) of the dispositive clause is to be solved, the answer is just this—that the context of the deed, and particularly the narrative and ancillary clauses, must be appealed to; and if, as may happen, the matter still remains doubtful, then recourse must be had to the state of the title—the inference in dubio being referred to, they are all, except the narrative, in perfect conformity with the dispositive clause. There is not one of the operative clauses which would have been expressed otherwise, if the minerals had been conveyed in terms. It is the narrative clause alone which creates any ambiguity. The argument therefore is that the dispositive clause is ambiguous, because it is not in conformity with the narrative, and that the narrative clause may be called in to control the dispositive, because the dispositive clause is ambiguous.

The pursuer's argument is, in substance, that the two clauses being in conflict, the narrative must prevail. I am not satisfied that there is any conflict; because, although the minerals are not accurately described as a part of the superiority, they are undoubtedly part of the superior's estate, and the subject of the two clauses may be substantially the same, in the framer's intention, although it is described imperfectly or inaccurately in the one, and more correctly in the other. But if the intention of the narrative were clearly repugnant to that of the dispositive clause, it is the latter that, according to the established canon of construction, must necessarily receive effect.

The question is not whether the deed confers dominium utile in the minerals, or dominium directum, but whether the minerals are conveyed at all; and the narrative is not invoked for the purpose of clearing up the point on which the dispositive clause is said to be inexplicit, and defining the feudal character of the right which the deed confers in the subject conveyed. Even for this purpose I should not think it legitimate to control the operative clauses by the narrative, if the operative clauses themselves are not ambiguous. But it is used, in fact, for the purpose of excluding altogether from the operation of the dispositive clause a subject which falls within its terms. The dispositive clause, according to the ordinary rules of construction, includes minerals, and the narrative is relied upon to exclude minerals from the conveyance.

It is said to have this effect because the conveyance is of a superiority, and a superiority cannot include minerals which have not been made the subject of a feu-right. The answer is that the deed does not convey a superiority, or a dominium utile. It conveys lands to be held of the granter's superior, subject to existing subaltern rights. If the subaltern rights are not coextensive with the lands included in the granter's infeftment, the property of that part of the estate which has not been feued is conveyed with effect, as the whole estate is conveyed in form, by the dispositive clause.

But the deed, as I have observed, is not to be construed as a disposition by a proprietor infeft. It is a disposition and assignation of a personal right, and the operative part of it is the assignation of the crown charter. The argument upon this point appears to have been misunderstood. The assignation of writs, when it occurs in a disposition, is merely subsidiary. Its purpose is to fortify the right conveyed by the dispositive clause; and accordingly it is said that the assignation of the charter can have no other effect than to warrant infeftment in the subjects already disposed. But when, as in the present case, the granter has no power to dispoise, the assignation of a charter and open precept is the only part of the deed which has any operative force and effect. If there were any conflict between the clause which formally dispoises the lands and the clause which effectually assigns the right, it might be a question which should prevail. But they are in perfect conformity with one another, and both of them include the whole lands, without exception of the minerals, as conveyed by the crown charter. The material point is that the seller, who is supposed to have intended a reservation of minerals, has not only conveyed the estate without reservation by his own deed, but has also made over to his purchaser, absolutely and without qualification, the crown charter and precept which alone made it possible to complete a title in any part of the estate. The argument is that the superiority only was conveyed, and that the minerals remained in the granter's title. But the granter had no title either to the minerals or to the superiority; and if he had intended to complete a title to the minerals, he must have reserved right to make use of the crown precept for that purpose.

Trustees.

I do not think that the case of Fleeming v. Howden rules the present case. A decision on the construction of one instrument cannot be a precedent for the construction of another and different instrument; and the difference between the deed in Fleeming v. Howden and the deed now in question appears to me to be very material, for Charles Fleeming and his commissioners had no power to sell the minerals, and their want of power was clear on the face of the deed. The decision, therefore, was that a conveyance of lands will not carry minerals which it appears from the deed the granter has no power to convey. It may be that an explicit statement of a limitation of the granter's powers may be equivalent to an express declaration of intention to confine the scope of the conveyance. But that is not a reason for qualifying a conveyance, when the granter's powers are not limited in any other way than by express reservation. There is no such reservation, even in the narrative of the deed now in question. The utmost that can be said is that the narrative imports an intention to convey a superiority, and no other intention; and therefore that the narrative would be satisfied if nothing more than a superiority were conveyed. But the dispositive clause does, in fact, convey a superiority, and something more. The question would be precisely the same if it had conveyed the minerals in terms. The argument, in that case, would probably have been stated in a different form; and the pursuer's contention would have been in terms—as I think it is now in substance—not that the dispositive clause, when properly construed, is insufficient to convey minerals, but that in so far as it bears to convey minerals it is invalid and ineffectual, since the narrative shews that it was not intended that minerals should be conveyed. It appears to me to be a sufficient ground of judgment that an unambiguous conveyance cannot be overruled by an inference, to be collected from the narrative, that something less was intended than has been actually conveyed.

LORD WELLWOOD.—In judging whether the coal in the lands of Hillfoot and others was carried by the disposition by Mr R. E. Scott to J. McArthur Moir of 28th July 1837, it is legitimate and necessary to consider the state of the disponent's title at that date. He, as trustee on the sequestrated estates of Crawford Tait, was vested (1) in the plenum dominium of the coal, and (2) in the superiority of the surface which had been feued out to the defender's predecessor. Thus while he had the full and undivided estate of the coal, he had also the superiority of the surface, including right to the feu-duty payable by the proprietor of the surface, who happened to be at that date the disponent, Mr John McArthur Moir.

Keeping in view this state of the titles, I next proceed to consider the terms of the disposition, reading it in its natural order. It proceeds on the narrative of the disponent's right as trustee to, inter alia, “the superiority and feu-duty of the lands of Hillfoot and others lying in the parish of Dollar and county of

No. 129. Clackmannan, belonging in property to Mr John M'Arthur Moir of Hillfoot.
 Mar. 18, 1892. I observe in passing that Mr Moir was proprietor of the surface only, and not Orr v. Moir's of the minerals ; it is therefore reasonable to infer that the word "superiority"
 Trustees. is used with special reference to the rights of the superior in relation to J.
 M'Arthur Moir's right of property which was limited to the surface. The deed then proceeds to narrate that the disposer having exposed, inter alia, "the said
 superiority and feu-duty of the lands of Hillfoot to public roup and sale, Mr Moir had been preferred to the purchase, being the highest offerer, and that he had paid the purchase price ; and had also, by private bargain, purchased "the superiority and feu-duty of the lands of Lochyfaulds and others." The deed then proceeds : "Therefore I as trustee foresaid have sold, alienated, and disposed, as I with consent foresaid do hereby sell, alienate, and dispoⁿe from me and my successors in office or in the said lands and others to and in favour of the said John M'Arthur Moir, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole the town and lands of Hillfoot," &c., "all as at present possessed by the said John M'Arthur Moir and his tenants ; as also,
 All and Whole the lands of Lochyfaulds, . . . formerly possessed by James Sharp, smith, and Thomas Hall, weaver, with the whole parts, pendicles, and pertinents thereof, all as more particularly described in the ancient rights and infeftments thereof." In the warrandice clause there is the following exception : "Excepting always from this warrandice the feu-rights or infeftments of property of the said lands granted by my predecessors and authors to the feuars and vassals thereof."

It is maintained by the defender that, the coal not having been expressly reserved, the dispositive clause carried everything which the disposer had to convey, including the coal.

1. I shall assume, in the meantime, that the dispositive clause, if taken by itself, is unqualified and ex facie wide enough to carry all the disposer's rights in the lands of Hillfoot and others. It is impossible, however, to read the narrative and the dispositive clause together without seeing that the narrative is not consistent with this construction of the dispositive clause. The deed proceeds on the narrative of the sale of "superiority and feu-duty" of lands belonging in property to Moir, the dispoⁿee ; while the dispositive clause ex hypothesi is wide enough to convey the whole estate, which still remained in the disposer, including the coal, which did not belong in property to Moir, but to the disposer. How are the two clauses to be reconciled ?

It is settled law that the dispositive clause in a conveyance cannot be contradicted by subsidiary clauses ; and if they conflict with it, it must rule. But it is equally well settled that the dispositive clause admits of construction ; and that if it can be reconciled with other clauses in the deed which are unambiguous, it may be construed and qualified so as to be read in accordance with them.

The solution in the present case, I think, is that a conveyance of the lands is the appropriate way of conveying various and distinct rights. It is equally suitable for conveying the dominium plenum and the dominium utile. Again, it is a known and habile way of conveying a bare superiority. It is not only a habile way of doing so, but the more correct and appropriate form of conveyance ; although it has been held to be also competent to convey the superiority or dominium directum in express terms. In each case you must examine the other clauses in the deed in order to ascertain the character and extent of the right conveyed.

The form of the dispositive clause, therefore, being equally applicable to a No. 129.
conveyance of the superiority and a conveyance of all that remained in the disponer, I think it is legitimate to ascertain from the narrative and other clauses Mar. 18, 1892.
of the deed and the titles which of the two the disposer intended to convey. Orr v. Moir's
Trustees.

The narrative is not, in my opinion, ambiguous. The word "superiority" is not properly used as meaning all that remains in the superior after he has feued out part only of the dominium utile. It is a relative term, and is and should in legal language be exclusively used (as here) in relation to and as contrasted with the dominium utile of the lands or those portions of them which have been feued out. "Superiority" implies a previous severance of the dominium utile or part of it, and the consequent existence of a vassal holding of the superior. In this case the only vassal whom the disposer had in Hillfoot was the proprietor of the dominium utile of the surface; and when the deed speaks of the superiority and feu-duty of lands belonging in property to the vassal, I think that the word superiority must be referred to the only portion of the lands of Hillfoot which had been feued out and belonged to the vassal, and that it cannot be held as intended to include that portion of the dominium utile which had been expressly reserved and never been feued out.

This use of the word is justified by reference to the origin of the terms dominium directum and dominium utile, which were invented, I think, to express the two estates resulting from the creation of a feu; dominium directum meaning the bare right or interest left with the grantor—(2 Ross's Lect., 147, 148).

Apart from the narrative, other subsidiary clauses of the deed are appropriate to and indicate a conveyance of an estate of superiority. In particular, the obligation to infeft, the exception of the feu-rights, and the assignation to the duties.

Therefore, interpreting the dispositive clause by the narrative, I think it is clear that only the bare superiority was conveyed, and not the coal, unless, indeed, there is an insuperable conveyancing objection to adopting such a construction. In my opinion no such objection exists, because the disposer's estate in the coal was distinct and separate from the superiority conveyed.

The case of Fleeming v. Howden (6 Macph. 782) is directly in point if regard be had to the conclusions of the action and the form of the judgment of the Inner-House, and also to the grounds of judgment not only of the Judges of the Inner-House, but of the Lord Ordinary, whose judgment they recalled.

The summons concluded not merely for declarator of the pursuer's right of property in the mines, metals, and minerals, but also for reduction of the disposition of 1811, and deeds following thereon, in so far as that deed, or the deeds following thereon, could be held to have disposed the said mines, metals, and minerals to the vassals in the lands. The Lord Ordinary found that under the deed of 1811, and deeds following thereon, the defender acquired an ex facie valid title to the minerals, and that the pursuer was barred by the negative prescription from challenging that disposition. He therefore assoilzied the defender. In recalling this judgment the Inner-House did not find it necessary to reduce the deeds in question, but merely found and declared in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, in substance affirming the second plea as law for the pursuer,—“(2) Neither the disposition of the superiority of the defender's lands, granted in 1811, nor any of the other titles held as founded on by the defender, did, according to their sound meaning and true legal construction, convey the mines, metals, and minerals of the said lands, nor in any way exclude or impair the right thereto reserved by the titles to the property thereof, in favour of the heirs of entail of John Earl of Wigtown."

The Lord Ordinary's grounds of judgment are clearly expressed in his note (6 Macph. 785),—"Whatever may have been the intention of the parties, there seems no reason to doubt that the disposition of 1811 operated as a valid feudal conveyance, not only of the superiority, but of every reserved right in the lands belonging to the superior. According to the principles of our law, the dominium directum is a right to the lands themselves burdened only with the vassal's right, and whatever is reserved in the vassal's charter remains the property of the superior. The right to the minerals was never separated from the superiority, so as to constitute a separate tenement. Therefore, when the superiority was conveyed to Lord Elphinstone in 1811, in the usual form of a disposition to the lands, with all right, title, and interest which the superior had in the lands, subject only to the burden of the feu-right, the right to the mines and minerals necessarily passed to the disponee along with the dominium directum, and no right of any kind remained in the grantor, for where lands are conveyed without reservation a right to the minerals, as well as to the soil, is understood to be given, and if this is not intended, the minerals must be expressly excepted from the grant. If this view be correct, the disposition carried every right to the lands which the superior had, including the property of the minerals, which had been reserved in the original feu-right." Those grounds of judgment, which form the backbone of the defender's argument in this case, were rejected by the Inner-House.

Before considering the reasons given by the Judges of the First Division, I should mention that the disposition of 1811 was couched in practically the same terms as the deed now under consideration. The deed, after narrating the commission under which the superiorities were being sold, ran as follows:—"Seeing that John Lord Elphinstone, proprietor of the lands and others after mentioned, is desirous of purchasing the superiorities, casualties, and feu-duties thereof, which are part of the said entailed estates, we have resolved to sell the same to him in virtue of the powers given to us by the foresaid commission"; and then, after narrating payment of £480 "as the price of the superiorities, feu-duties, and others of the lands and others after mentioned belonging in property to him," conveyed to him all and whole the lands in question, and all right, title, and interest they had therein. It will be observed that although this narrative is rather fuller and more redundant, it closely resembles that in the deed under consideration, especially in this, that the superiority to be conveyed was the superiority of lands the property of which the disponee already possessed, and that the only "lands" of which he had the property were, as here, the surface. The question to be decided was whether that deed carried the minerals which had been specially reserved by the earlier titles as in the present case.

I think that the judgment of the Inner-House affirmed two propositions for which ample authority was quoted. First, that where a proprietor of lands feus out the surface, reserving the minerals, the latter are erected into a separate estate; secondly, that the dispositive clause admits of construction, and that a conveyance in the dispositive clause of "the lands" being a habile way of conveying a bare superiority, will not be held to carry such reserved right if the context and the history of the titles negative an intention to do so.

In regard to the first point, it is, I think, immaterial whether the original owner's interest reserved in the minerals is regarded as plenum dominium, or as consisting of (1) dominium directum, and (2) dominium utile, although I think the former view is the more correct; in either view it is distinct from the superiority of the surface. Compare the opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) in Hutton v. Macfarlane, 2 Macph. 85; and that of Lord Curriehill in Fleeming v. Howden, 6 Macph. 790.

The more important passages in the opinions of the Judges are so fully quoted in the cases that I do not think it necessary to quote them again here; but as bearing out what I have given as the import of the judgment, I may refer particularly to the opinion of Lord Curriehill, pp. 790, 791, and the concise opinion of Lord Deas on pp. 794, 795.

They held that, ex facie of the deed, the minerals were not carried. Lord Curriehill, for instance, states the first question thus, p. 791,—“Whether or not, according to the true meaning and construction of the disposition of 1811, the mines were included in the subjects thereby disposed?” The answer of that question in the negative was the result at which the Court arrived.

Lord Deas, again, says that, looking at the deed of 1811, it was so perfectly clear on the face of it that it was not intended to convey the minerals, that it would be only waste of time to go over its terms,—“It professes to be granted in terms of the Act of Parliament, 20 Geo. II. c. 51, which gives power to heirs of entail to convey the superiority of lands to purchasers, but nothing else.” He then proceeds (p. 795),—“The question remains, whether—because the dispositive clause conveys the lands in general terms—this in point of law operates a conveyance of the minerals, whatever the intention of the parties may have been. I know nothing to warrant such a construction. Take the case already put, where one person has a feudal title to the minerals, and another to the lands; it does not follow that the minerals are conveyed with the lands, though they are not expressly excepted. The ordinary form of a disposition of superiority shews that the dispositive clause is subject to construction not only by the rest of the deed, but sometimes by other deeds. A disposition limited to the superiority has been sustained. But the usual and correct form is to dispose the lands themselves, and the feu-rights would stand good, even although they were not excepted (as they usually are) in the clause of warrantice.”

It must be conceded in favour of the defenders in the present case that in Fleeming v. Howden the Court founded strongly upon the fact that the commissioners had no power to convey anything but the superiority of the vassal's lands, and that this was patent on the face of the deed and the statute referred to; while in the present case the disponent had power, if he chose, to dispose the minerals. But that was only one conspicuous indication of intention which strengthened a construction of the deed, which was sufficiently clear without it. Fleeming v. Howden at least enables us to construe the word “superiority.” It is an authority for this, that it is not to be inferred from a narrative of power given to a vassal the “superiority” of lands owned by him, followed by a narrative that the vassal has agreed to purchase the superiority, that anything more is to be conveyed than the bare superiority of that portion of the estate which the vassal already possesses.

As to the older case of Erskine v. Schaw, we are under the disadvantage of having a very imperfect report of the opinions of the Judges. The case un-

No. 129. doubtedly seems to be in point in so far as regards the terms of the deed. But the opinions of several of the majority of the Judges seem to proceed to a considerable extent upon the subsequent actings of the parties and their presumed intention in entering into the transaction. By far the most detailed opinion reported in Sir Ilay Campbell's notes is that of Lord Eskgrove, which expresses distinctly and clearly the material heads of the argument for the pursuer in this case.

Having to choose between the two decisions, I prefer the reasoned judgment in the case of Fleeming v. Howden to that in the older case of Erskine v. Shaw.

2. In the view which I have expressed it is unnecessary to consider the effect of the words in the dispositive clause which occur in the conveyance of the lands of Hillfoot and others, but not in that of the lands of Lochyfaulds and others, "all as at present possessed by the said John M'Arthur Moir and his tenants." There is authority for holding that such a description is taxative as regards the superficial boundaries of the lands conveyed (1 Bell's Lect. 586, and Murray v. Oliphant's Wife, M. 2262); and it may be that they are also taxative as regards the different strata. On this question I prefer to reserve my opinion. The words, however, are at least quite consistent with, and indeed confirm, the interpretation which the pursuer places on the narrative.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and decree given in favour of the pursuer.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to decree. The disposition of 1837 is, in my opinion, a disposition of a mere superiority, and I am unable to hold that the property of the minerals formed, or could form, part of that superiority. The view I take of the case is shortly this:—

I first inquire, What is the legal construction of the disposition—construing it according to its terms, and without reference to anything not appearing on its face?

The deed begins with a narrative which recites, carefully and at length, two contracts of sale which it is the object of the disposition to carry out. These contracts of sale are set forth as the sole inducing causes of the disposition. And the subject sold is in each case declared to be the "superiority and feudal duty" of certain described lands. There is nothing about minerals or about any estate of property. The narrative recites simply the purchase of a superiority—a superiority assumed, if not expressed, to be coextensive with the described lands.

With such a narrative, one certainly expects to find that the other and operative clauses of the deed are appropriate to the conveyance of a mere superiority—that is to say, are expressed in the manner in which such a conveyance usually and properly expressed. Are then the other clauses in conformity with the narrative? Or do they go beyond the narrative and embrace a subject which had not been sold?

Neglecting in the meantime the dispositive clause, it can hardly, I think, be doubted that the other clauses of the deed are appropriate to the conveyance of a mere superiority, and have all the usual notes of such a conveyance. In particular, the warrandice contains an exception of subaltern rights. The obligation to infeft is a me, and not a me vel de me. There is no assignation of rents, only an assignation of feu-duties and casualties. The assignation of warrandice (which includes an assignation to an unexecuted precept in a crown charter resignation) is qualified, so as to assign the precept only so far as applicable "to No. 129.

the town and lands of Hillfoot and others above disposed," and it is only granted "to the end that the disponee may be more readily seized and infeft in Mar. 18, 1892.
the premises." But, with or without such qualification, the clause is appropriate, on the assumption expressed in the narrative, to operate an infeftment in a superiority and in nothing else. Orr v. Moir's Trustees.

Turning next to the dispositive clause, it also is in appropriate terms. It conveys the superiority of the lands in the usual and appropriate mode, viz., by conveying the lands. It makes no exception of minerals, because, in point of construction, and according to the scheme of the deed, the conveyance included the superiority of the minerals. On the other hand, it omits the words (usual in a conveyance of plenum dominium) by which the granter conveys his whole right, title, and interest, present and future, in the subjects.

In short, I do not think it can well be doubted that, simply reading the disposition, and not going outside it, any Scotch conveyancer would at once recognise it as a quite typical disposition of a superiority, every clause being expressed exactly as it ought to be, on the assumption that it was desired to convey, or attempt to convey, a superiority over the whole lands described, and nothing more than such a superiority.

Within the deed therefore there is, if I am so far right, no ambiguity. But then it is said—and this I think raises the real question in the case—that on going outside the deed, and investigating the granter's title, it appears that good one part of the lands described, viz., the minerals, there was in fact no superiority, but only a dominium plenum, which had never been "split," so as validly to create a superiority. In other words, it is said that the assumption of the deed, viz., that the superiority extended to the minerals as well as the surface, was erroneous, whence it is said to follow that the deed must be reconstructed in the light of this circumstance, and must be held to operate a conveyance of the plenum dominium of the minerals, because the language of the dispositive clause is apt to carry such plenum dominium, and if it does not do so, must be held, as regards the minerals, to carry nothing. It is further said that when once it is known that the minerals were held in plenum dominium, it becomes impossible to read the assignation to the precept in the crown charter except as contemplating an infeftment in such plenum dominium, because otherwise, just as with the dispositive clause, the assignation would, quoad the minerals, operate nothing.

Now, I am not prepared to admit that the disposition, taking it as a disposition confined to the superiority of the minerals, operated nothing. It certainly did not, as the title stood, warrant any infeftment in the minerals; and if the infeftment which followed upon it was so expressed as to apply to the minerals, it was infeftment beyond its warrant, and therefore so far inoperative. But the disposition at least imported an obligation by the disponent to vest the disponee in the superiority of the minerals, and I suppose it is not doubtful that the necessary "split" between the property and superiority of the minerals could have been quite easily effected if the disponent was willing or could be compelled to bear the expense of a not unfamiliar conveyancing operation. That operation might have been performed in various ways. The simplest way would have been for the disponent to grant a corroborative disposition of the minerals in exchange for a feu-charter by the disponee reconveying the dominium utile of the minerals. Or the disponent might have made up his title to the minerals

No. 129. (assumed to be not validly conveyed) and have then granted a feu-charter to his agent, and thereafter made a new and valid disposition of the superiority in favour of the disponee. In short, reading the disposition as I read it, it was not at all inoperative, but only as regards the minerals incomplete. It transferred the right, but something more was required to transfer the title, the disponent being however bound, and having it in his power, to do what was necessary for that purpose.

But further, and even assuming that the disposition, read as a conveyance of a mere superiority, was as regards the minerals inoperative, I cannot assent to the argument that this in itself warrants an enlargement of the construction so as to make the deed read, quoad the minerals, as a conveyance of a plenum dominium. It may be that, if you discard the narrative, and also the assignation to feu-duties and casualties, the other clauses of the disposition are not inconsistent with a conveyance of plenum dominium. It may also be, that if you assume such a conveyance, the disposition becomes operative throughout. But the question after all is, What did the parties to the disposition mean? and if the narrative is clear, and the operative clauses are consistent with the narrative—though also it may be consistent with something else—that something else is not necessarily to be assumed, merely because it turns out that otherwise the deed will in some particular fail of effect. The construction of a deed is one thing, its effect is another. The results of a given construction may no doubt be an element for or against such construction, but they cannot override the language of the deed, or the scheme of the deed, if such scheme is clear upon its face. Supposing one has to choose between, on the one hand, ignoring, i.e., the narrative of a deed, and, on the other hand, acknowledging that the deed professes to do more than it validly effects, I confess I see no reason why the former alternative should necessarily be preferred to the latter.

In this case, as I have already said, I think the scheme of this disposition is sufficiently clear on its face. The narrative, I think, plainly implies, if indeed it does not express, the assumption that the superiority disposed is coextensive with the lands. That is to say, it plainly assumes that there has been a "split" both in the surface and in the minerals. The superiority sold is said to be the superiority of the lands, i.e., the whole lands, and that cannot, I think, mean less than that the disposition proceeded on the footing that such superiority existed. Now, suppose that that had been expressed in so many words, suppose that it had been set forth in terms that the superiority and property of the surface and minerals had been, or were believed to have been, validly split, and that then the deed had proceeded, in the terms in which it does proceed (perfectly apt terms), to convey that superiority, could the disponee in that case be heard to claim the plenum dominium of the minerals on the ground which is now suggested? I cannot think so, but yet, if I am right, that is in substance the case with which we have to deal.

In truth, the defenders' argument may really be illustrated thus. It was formerly, as we know, the practice for landowners in Scotland to split the superiority and property of their estates for voting purposes, and to divide the superiority among their friends and relatives. The dispositions conveying the superiorities were expressed exactly as the disposition here. But it was occasionally discovered, sometimes long afterwards, that the original split had been badly performed, so that there was really no superiority which could be effectually conveyed. What was the position of the landowners who had in these circumstances granted those dispositions? According to the defenders they had divested themselves of their whole estate. The dispositions were ineffectual as dispositions of a superiority. They were effectual if read as dispositions of plenum dominium. Therefore, however clear may have been the narrative, however appropriate to that narrative may have been the operative clauses, each disposition, so soon as the state of the title was discovered, became a disposition of a plenum dominium, dividing the landowner's estate among his friends.

I come therefore to the conclusion that it is not always safe to go outside deeds of this description in order to construe them by the state of the title. It may be sometimes necessary to do so; but not, I venture to think, when, without doing so, and taking the narrative and operative clauses together, the intention and scheme of the instrument are sufficiently clear.

I may note one or two observations on certain points which have more or less come up in the argument.

It has been suggested that the expression "superiority and feu-duty," as used in the narrative, may be read as covering the whole estate possessed by the superior in the lands, including reserved (or acquired) minerals held in plenum dominium. I do not myself think it possible so to hold. A superiority cannot exist except as relative to a dominium utile, and cannot extend to a subject of which the superiority and property remain unsplit. Nor do I think it possible to regard the right to minerals as a mere accessory right—not amounting to a right of property. I think it must now be held as settled that minerals form, or may form, a separate estate, capable of separate infeftment, and in no respect less capable than the surface of being held as a separate estate.

It seems also to be suggested—at least the suggestion runs through the defenders' argument—that undue liberty is taken with the dispositive clause in holding it to be open to construction. In other words, it is said that a disposition of lands—if made without exception or reservation—conveys, as matter of construction, every estate existing in the lands, and conveys with effect every estate possessed, or that may come to be possessed, by the disponent. In short, the dispositive clause here is said to be clear and unambiguous, necessarily conveying, inter alia, the plenum dominium of the minerals, and not capable of being controlled by the narrative even if the narrative is clear.

The answer to this seems to be that there are, according to feudal law, three estates or dominia which may exist in or over lands,—(1) the dominium plenum; (2) the dominium directum; and (3) the dominium utile; and that according to settled practice the disposition is expressed in exactly the same terms whichever of these estates is intended to be conveyed. In each case, the clause simply disposes the lands, making no exception or reservation either of subaltern rights or over-superiorities. On this matter reference may be made, inter alia, to the Juridical Styles (vol. 1, pp. 113 and 125), and Duff's Feudal Conveyancing, p. 191. In both of those works—works of the highest authority in such matters—it is carefully explained that as between property and superiority there is no difference in the terms of the disposition; the differences to be noted by the conveyancer being only the difference in the warrandice, the assignation to rents, and other ancillary clauses. And if it be asked how this ambiguity (or indefiniteness) of the dispositive clause is to be solved, the answer is just this—that the context of the deed, and particularly the narrative and ancillary clauses, must be appealed to; and if, as may happen, the matter still remains doubtful, then recourse must be had to the state of the title—the inference in dubio being

No. 129. that the grantor gives what estate he has, and, on the other hand, does not give what he has not. In the present case it is not necessary to go beyond the context. If I am right, the narrative here is clear; and every other clause is in conformity with the narrative.

Mar. 18, 1892.
ORT v. Moir's
Trustees.

It may be pointed out that, if the defenders' construction of the dispositive clause were to prevail, some results would follow which would be startling. For example :—

(1) If a disposition of lands covers, as matter of construction, every estate in the lands, it would cover, for example, a mid-superiority not belonging to the grantor; and the grantor would not only be liable in warrandice, but would be bound to convey the mid-superiority if, at some subsequent period, he acquired it. Indeed accretion would operate the same result whether he conveyed it or not.

(2) Similarly, on the same hypothesis, a disposition of lands would cover the dominium utile of the lands, although in the clause of warrandice feu-rights exhausting the subject were expressly excepted. An exception from the warrandice is not at all the same thing as an exception from the conveyance. And so the grantor, on the supposed construction, would find himself divested not only of any feu-right which he happened to possess, but also of any feu-right which he happened afterwards to acquire. Other absurdities may be figured, and could only be obviated by the dispositive clause expressing—what in practice it never expresses—the particular estate or dominium which it is desired to convey. It will not do to suggest, as a solution, that a conveyance of “lands” conveys only such estate as the grantor possesses. The state of the grantor's title may no doubt aid the construction where the context fails; but it can never determine it. Otherwise, there would be no difference between the construction of a conveyance and its effect; and amongst other things the clause of warrandice would be meaningless.

As to the two previous decisions referred to in the argument, I am satisfied, on examining the reports, and particularly the interlocutor in the case of Fleeming v. Howden, that the point now in dispute was not only considered, but was the subject of express decision in that case—a case which I take leave to think is one of very high authority. The decision proceeded solely on the construction of the disposition and of the infestment which followed; and having procured and examined the disposition, I can find no substantial difference between it and the deed here. The narrative, no doubt, made it very clear that a superiority only was intended to be conveyed; but so, I think, does the narrative here. Similarly, the disponers being there infest, the donee's title was made up by procuratory and charter of resignation, instead of as here by assignation to an unexecuted precept in such a charter. But that can hardly be thought material. And, subject to these differences, every point of difficulty which has been suggested here—both with reference to the construction of the disposition and the construction and effect of the infestment which followed—occurred equally in the case of Fleeming. With respect to the old and unreported case of Erskine, I can only say that, if it were necessary to choose as between that case and the case of Fleeming, I prefer the latter; but I observe in the case of Erskine that stress was laid on the actings of parties subsequent to the disposition, and also that the dispositive clause there under construction not only conveyed the lands in general terms as here, but also conveyed all right, title, and interest, present and future, belonging to the grantor. I do not say it was so, but it may have been that those words made it difficult—notwithstanding the terms of the narrative—to say that the mineral estate belonging to the grantor was excluded from the disposition.

No. 129.]

Mar. 18, 1892.
Orr v. Moir's
Trustees.

It remains to notice in a word the alternative argument for the pursuer, noticed by the Lord Ordinary—viz., that the disposition is on its just construction confined to the superiority of such subjects (surface or minerals) as were already held in property by the disponent; the narrative reciting a purchase of the superiority of lands “belonging in property” to the disponent, and the dispositive clause disposing “the lands of Hillfoot, &c.,” “all as at present possessed by the disponent and his tenants.” The pursuer urges, and I think with force, that this reading—which is the literal reading—reconciles the narrative and dispositive clauses; and is at least preferable to the defenders’ reading, which makes the dispositive clause go beyond the narrative. He points out that although the words quoted appear to apply only to the lands of “Hillfoot and others,” these lands in fact include (as shewn by the titles) the small pendicles (Lochyfauld, &c.) separately disposed; and are indeed the only lands mentioned in the crown charter of resignation, the precept in which is assigned.

Now, as already said, I myself prefer the construction which makes the narrative and the dispositive clauses deal each with the whole lands (surface and minerals), but deal each with the mere superiority of the whole lands. But if that construction be rejected, then I have no hesitation in preferring the alternative construction now suggested to that of the defenders. One thing I consider must be presumed—that the narrative and dispositive clauses apply to the same subject. Accordingly, if, contrary to my view, it is necessary, in order to make their language square, to read the references to “property” and “possession” as looking both to vertical and lateral boundaries, I see, I confess, no particular difficulty. It may, I think, quite fairly be held that the minerals are excepted from the narrative as not being held in property by the disponent; and are excepted from the dispositive clause as not being possessed by him or his tenants.

I have purposely abstained from saying anything as to the pursuer’s title to the land. That title has not been challenged either in argument or on the record. It has throughout the case been taken for granted—and I assume rightly so—that the pursuer has had transmitted to him all rights which remained vested in Crawford Tait’s trustee after the disposition of 1837 had been executed. The sole question before the Court is as to the defender’s title under that disposition. If, on the just construction of that disposition, the minerals were not conveyed to the defender, it appears to be common ground that they now belong to the pursuer.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—The first question is, whether the coal under the lands of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds was carried by a disposition of these lands, dated 28th July 1837, granted by the trustee on the sequestrated estate of Crawford Tait, in favour of John M’Arthur Moir.

The state of the titles was as follows,—Treating the lands of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds as one subject, it was vested in the Duke of Argyll as one undivided tenement and estate, including the minerals, by virtue of his title to the lands. He granted feu-charters of the lands, reserving all coals and coalheughs. The effect of these feu-charters was to convert the subject into two separate subjects or tenements. The one of these tenements was the coal, and the other the sur-

No. 129. face and all below the surface which was not coal—in other words, the lands except the coal. There were two proprietors of the latter tenements; the vassal, Mar. 18, 1892. who was in right of the dominium utile of the tenement, and the Duke of Argyll, Orr v. Moir's the superior, who was in right of the dominium directum of the tenement. The Trustees. former tenement—the coal—belonged to the Duke of Argyll alone. The superior thus retained two separate subjects or tenements—the coal, which he had in plenum dominium, and the lands, minus the coal, of which he had only the dominium directum. These two tenements, however, formed only one estate, and the superior retained them under one title, his original title to the lands. The expression, the lands of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds, when occurring in his titles, comprehended the coal.

The dominium utile brought into existence by these feu-charters became vested by a series of titles in John M'Arthur Moir, predecessor of the defender, and belonged to him in 1837.

The other estate came to vest in the trustee on Tait's sequestrated estate, as it had been vested in the Duke of Argyll. Neither Tait nor his trustee were infert. On 28th July 1837, the trustee granted the disposition on which this case depends.

There was nothing unusual in this state of the titles. It is very common for minerals to be separated from the land in this precise manner, and therefore a question as to the proper and appropriate deed to be granted by the superior when he desires to sell the dominium directum with or without the minerals is of general importance.

Both parties are agreed that this disposition carried the superiority of the subject feued. The pursuer's case is that it carried nothing else; the defenders', that it carried the coal also.

There is no doubt that the disposition in question is of the character of a disposition of a superiority. Probably it is not framed according to the best style of a disposition of a superiority by the superior to his vassal. According to the style given in Ross's Lectures (ii. 276, 277), and also in the Style Book (2d ed. i. 134), the dispositive clause of such a deed should bear, after the description of the lands, some such words as these, "in the fee and property of which" the donee "stands vested and seized," words which, although not essential, would make the scope of the conveyance apparent from the dispositive clause, independently of the clause of warrandice (Ross's Lect. ii. 208). But, subject to that criticism, the deed may be regarded as the appropriate deed for conveying the dominium directum to the vassal. The exception of the feu-rights in the clause of warrandice, the obligation to infert a me, the reference to feu-duties and casualties, are all appropriate to, and indicative of, such a deed. All that is clear. It is just such a deed as might be granted to a vassal by a superior who had no interest in the lands except his right of superiority, and desired to convey all the interest which he had. But is it the appropriate deed to be granted by a superior who held under his title to the lands, not the superiority only, but the minerals also, and who desired to retain the minerals? I do not think so. It would be strange if precisely the same deed should suit circumstances so diverse. I know of no statement as to the practice in such a case more authoritative than the passage in Professor Bell's Lectures, quoted in the pleadings, where he says that if, in a disposition of a superiority by a superior, he does not expressly retain the minerals, they will be comprehended in the disposition (Bell's Lectures, i. 572). I think the deed is not well adapted to carry out the purpose which the pursuer maintains to have been intended, and from that circumstance the difficulty of the question arises. No. 129.

If the dispositive clause alone were considered, the conclusion that the disposition carried the coal could hardly be resisted. It bears that the granter disposes the town and lands of Hillfoot, "all as at present possessed by the said John M'Arthur Moir and his tenants, as also All and Whole the lands of Lochyfaulds within the dykes betwixt the Orchard on the west, Bogyetts on the east, and Lochydubs on the south parts." Certain other inconsiderable subjects are mentioned, and the general words follow, "with the whole parts, pendicles, and pertinents thereof, all as described in the ancient infeftments thereof." Mar. 18, 1892.
Orr v. Moir's
Trustees.

Nobody denies that a conveyance of lands prima facie includes the coal, if there be nothing inconsistent in the context. The addition of the words "including the coal" would have been surplusage. I think there is nothing in the dispositive clause which derogates from the prima facie meaning. I am satisfied that the words "as possessed by John M'Arthur Moir and his tenants" do not. It is true that the coal never was possessed by Mr Moir. But such a description is very common, and it is used generally, if not universally, to serve instead of a description by boundaries. The suggestion that these words were inserted of set purpose to indicate that the coal was not disposed of, seems inadmissible. For if there had been such a design present to the mind of the drawer of this deed, it cannot be doubted that he would have excepted the coal expressly. Further, if that had been intended, Lochyfaulds would have been described in the same manner. But it is not; it is described by boundaries; and there is no suggestion that the coal under Lochyfaulds was conveyed and the coal under Hillfoot not conveyed.

Further, the fact that the subject has been converted into two separate subjects or tenements does not seem of consequence in this question. "The lands" prima facie include the minerals, just as much whether the expression "the lands" comprehends two tenements or one; and if the description, "the lands of Hillfoot and Lochyfaulds," was used in this deed with the same meaning which it bore in the titles of the Duke of Argyll and of Mr Tait—that is to say, in the titles of the granter of the deed—as presumably it was, it most certainly comprehended the minerals.

Now the dispositive clause is in a real and practical sense the ruling and paramount clause of a disposition. It cannot be contradicted or readily explained; and, if unambiguous, it cannot be displaced or controlled by the other clauses. "The language in which these subsidiary clauses is expressed cannot be permitted to override plain words of disposition, although other clauses may legitimately be referred to for the purpose of solving any ambiguity which is raised by the terms of the dispositive clause."—Per Lord Watson in Lee v. Alexander (3d August 1883, 10 R., H. L., 91). Again, in Chancellor v. Mossman (19th July 1872, 10 Macph. 995), the Lord President says that if the expression of a dispositive clause "is clear and unambiguous, it is not allowable to go to any other parts of the deed in order to contradict or explain that clause."

But this case can hardly be put so high as that. I do not hold that the dispositive clause can be treated as unambiguous. Probably a dispositive clause is seldom unambiguous and self-explanatory in all its terms. There are various cases in which dispositive clauses, not obviously ambiguous, have been explained

No. 129. by the other clauses—as, for example, by the tenendas, in Bain v. Hamilton (10th Mar. 18, 1892. May 1865, 3 Macph. 821), and Lord Advocate v. Sinclair (7th Jan. 1867, 5 Orr v. Moir's Macph., H. L., 97). In the class of cases regarding the effect of a general conveyance on a previous special conveyance of particular lands, the Court in Scotland has looked even beyond the other clauses of the deed—see Campbell v. Campbell (8th July 1880, 7 R., H. L., 100); and, according to a practice which is quite common, in a conveyance of the superiority, the clause of warrandice, while it does not perhaps affect the construction of the dispositive clause, controls its effect. In Fleeming v. Howden the narrative clause was one of the elements which led the Court to the conclusion that the minerals were not carried by the dispositive clause.

In short, I think that this dispositive clause is open to construction, and further, that it may be legitimately construed as not including coal, if it appears by plain implication from the other clauses of the deed that it was intended not to convey the coal.

Keeping out of view at present the narrative clause, and attending to the other subordinate clauses, it appears that they are appropriate to a conveyance of a superiority, which, indeed, is a matter of course. They are, however, equally well adapted to carry the minerals also. It is true that there is no assignation to the rents, and no exception of leases in the warrandice clause. But this omission loses its significance when it is considered that there were no open coalfield, no leases, and no rents. There is nothing in the absence of a precept of sasine de me, because the granter was not infeft, and such a clause would have been plainly unsuitable in any view.

Further, the deed does not contain the words “with all rights, title, and interest.” Mr Bell mentions (Book iii., chap. 2, t. 1) a case where, in a gratuitous disposition by a granter who had in his person two separate feudal estates, the superiority and dominium utile, the use of these words had been held in consultation to be important. But in this case the disposer had only one feudal estate, although it embraced an interest in two separate tenements; and it has been decided that in onerous deeds these words are unnecessary and superfluous (Love v. Stone, 6th Nov. 1863, 2 Macph. 22).

On the other hand, there are some of the subordinate clauses which although fitting enough in a disposition by a superior who had nothing but the superiority, were, to say the least, unguarded and inappropriate in a disposition by a superior whose title included the minerals, if he did not mean to convey them. They indicate a devolution of the whole right of the disposer to the disponent. In particular, there is assigned a crown charter, “with the unexecuted precept of sasine therein contained, in so far as applicable to the town and lands of Hillfoot and others above mentioned.” This precept of sasine was undoubtedly a precept to infeft in the whole lands, including coal, and it is not readily to be assumed that, when infeftment was taken on the precept, on 6th July 1838, as appears from the notarial instrument in favour of John M'Arthur Moir, that precept remained unexhausted as regards the coal. Again, the disponent is surrogated and substituted in the full right of the premises of the disposer. It is true that the effect of these clauses must be limited by the dispositive clause; all that is suggested is that, if it had been in the view of the granter that the coal was not to be conveyed, they would have been expressed in more qualified terms.

On the whole, I think that, apart from the narrative clause, there is no sufficient ground for limiting the comprehension of the dispositive clause, and there No. 129.

appears little difficulty in reaching that conclusion.

But no doubt the narrative clause is of great importance in this question. I ^{Mar. 18, 1892.} Orr v. Moir's do not doubt that it is permissible to refer to it in order to obtain assistance in Trustees.
construing the dispositive clause, but I certainly think that that must be done with great caution.

The narrative clause is very inferior in importance to the dispositive clause, and, probably, is not always framed with the same caution and exactness. For it is not only inoperative, but in truth it is almost if not altogether superfluous and mere redundancy; and when used to interpret the dispositive clause, it is put to a use for which it was not intended.

It is not to be denied that the narrative clause, construed according to its prima facie meaning, sets forth a purchase and sale of a bare superiority and nothing else. But still, although that be so, it is not beyond the reach of construction; and I think that the term superiority may be ambiguous. No doubt, it primarily denotes the estate corresponding and relative to the dominium utile, and nothing more; but it is capable of meaning the whole interest in the lands within the title and infeftment of the superior. Such an interpretation seems countenanced by Lord Curriehill in Bain v. Duke of Hamilton (19th May 1865, 3 Macph. 827), where he says that "The right to work the minerals on the lands, although by law it would naturally go to the vassal as part of the dominium utile, may be reserved to the superior as part of the dominium directum, and in such a case the right of a superior depends not so much on the reservation in his favour as on his own antecedent right."

It is countenanced also in the notes of the opinions of some of the Judges in the case of Erskine v. Shaw, referred to in the pleadings, especially in those of Lord Monboddo and the Lord Justice-Clerk.

What the deed really says is, that the parties bought and sold the superiority, and that therefore the disponee disposed his whole remaining interest in the lands, putting the disponee in his place in regard to them; and the question arises, whether the narrative clause shall explain the dispositive clause, or the dispositive clause the narrative, both being open to construction.

Further, even if it should be assumed as certain that the narrative clause mentions nothing but the bare superiority, that proves nothing more than this, that the coal was not thought of as a valuable saleable subject, perhaps not as an existing subject. The deed bears the view that because the superiority, being the only estate of apparent value, was sold, the whole interest of the disponer was conveyed, no interest in the estate being reserved.

The question may be said to be narrowed to this, Was the coal not conveyed because not mentioned, or was it conveyed because not excepted? That appears a question difficult to solve, and it is therefore important to find that the precise point has been decided in the case of Erskine v. Shaw. That case, so far as the judgment depends on the deed, is absolutely in point. There is no material distinction between the two deeds. The note preserved of the judgments is intelligible, and the case, having regard to the eminence of the Judges who formed the Court, must be admitted to be important. No doubt some of the Judges refer to the conduct of the parties after the sale. But the judgment does not seem to have proceeded to any material extent on that ground. The chief grounds of judgment appear to have been—(1) that, prima facie, the dispositive clause included the minerals; (2) that the scope of the dispositive clause

No. 129. ought not readily to be narrowed by the narrative clause; (3) that it was possible
 Mar. 18, 1892. to read the narrative clause in accordance with the prima facie meaning of the Orr v. Moir's dispositive clause; and (4) that if the disponent intended to retain the minerals, Trustees. it was incumbent on him to have excepted them expressly. These grounds of judgment may all be applied to the present case, which can hardly be decided in favour of the pursuer without overruling that decision.

The only case which is said to be opposed to it is Fleeming v. Howden. But I think, in truth, it is not. In that case the Judges went on a great variety of considerations. But the one prominent point was undoubtedly this, that it appeared from the deed that the disponents had no power to dispose the minerals. The mere want of power was not of itself conclusive, because the question was with singular successors, but I think it formed the chief ground on which the Court proceeded in construing the deed, and therefore the main ground of judgment; and it distinguishes that case from the present and from Erskine v. Schaw. If this case were decided for the defender, that judgment, Erskine v. Schaw, and Fleeming v. Howden would all be consistent. For these reasons, I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

If, however, it shall be held that the disposition in question did not convey coal, the second question whether it was carried by the disposition in favour of the predecessor of the pursuer arises, and I am of opinion that it was.

LORD STORMONTH DARLING.—I remain of the opinion expressed in the interlocutor under review.

But I should like to explain one sentence in my former opinion, in which I say that "the superiority means simply the estate remaining in the superior." I agree with those of my brethren who hold that it is not an accurate use of language to describe reserved minerals as forming part of a superiority. But inasmuch as the minerals here formed part of the superior's estate, and were held on his original title, I think it may quite well have been intended to include them under the phrase "superiority," particularly in a clause like the narrative, which is non-operative, and does not demand such precision of language as the dispositive clause. I am, therefore, not satisfied that there is any real conflict between the two clauses, but if there is, I am clearly of opinion that the dispositive clause is unambiguous, and must prevail.

LORD LOW.—The disposition of 1837, even if the narrative clause be omitted, is framed in terms appropriate, according to established practice, to the conveyance of an estate of superiority. The obligation to infeft is a me only; in the warrandice clause feu-rights and infeftments of property are excepted; and there is an assignation, not to the rents, but to the feu-duties and casualties. These clauses are indicative of a disposition of an estate of superiority, and suggest that the disposition of the lands in the dispositive clause, although ex facie unlimited, is truly limited to an estate of superiority of the lands.

The narrative clause appears to me to be unambiguous. The cause of granting is there said to be the purchase by John M'Arthur Moir of "the superiority and feu-duty of the lands of Hillfoot and others . . . belonging in property" to him. I think that it can hardly be disputed that the usual and natural meaning of the word "superiority" is the dominium directum of lands, the dominium utile of which has been given out to a vassal. That the word is used here in that sense seems to me to be clear, because it is defined as being No. 129. the superiority of the lands "belonging in property to John M'Arthur Moir." Mar. 18, 1892.

 I do not see how a superiority so defined can be held to include an estate of plenum dominium, with which John M'Arthur Moir had no connection what- Orr v. Moir's Trustees.
 ever.

Thus, if the disposition alone is considered, the inference must be that it deals with an estate of superiority only. If it deals with an estate of superiority only, it is consistent throughout; if it deals in the operative clauses with something more than an estate of superiority, then there is a repugnancy between these clauses and the narrative clause.

In order therefore to ascertain what is the precise effect of the disposition, it is necessary to consider the state of the titles at the time when the disposition was granted. The titles disclose that the disponent was possessed of the superiority of the surface, and the plenum dominium of the minerals, both of which estates he held under the same title. The disponent, Mr Moir, was proprietor of the dominium utile of the surface only.

But although the disponent held the superiority of the surface and the plenum dominium of the minerals by virtue of the same title, these constituted two separate estates. When the surface of the lands was feued out, reserving the minerals, the latter became as much a separate estate from the surface of the lands as if they had been different lands altogether. The case of Fleeming v. Horden seems to be a direct authority for that proposition. But if that was the result in law of feuing the surface, under reservation of the minerals, it seems to me to follow that the estate of superiority of the surface was a separate estate from the minerals, because it was just the part which remained to the superior of the separate estate in the surface created by the granting of the feu-right.

So standing the titles, the question is whether the disposition conveys to Mr Moir only the superiority of the surface which he held in property, or that superiority plus the plenum dominium of the minerals.

Now I admit that, setting aside the narrative clause, the disposition is not only capable of carrying both the superiority of the surface and the plenum dominium of the minerals, but is framed in terms appropriate for that purpose, looking to the state of the titles. If a conveyancer had intended to convey both the estates (of superiority and in the minerals) possessed by the disponent, I do not think that he would have framed the disposition (of course apart from the narrative clause) in different terms from those which are actually used. He might have added an assignation to rents; but as the minerals had never been worked, he might have considered such a clause to be unnecessary.

The result is that, in my opinion, the operative clauses are, in the circumstances, appropriate to the conveyance either of the superiority of the lands only or of that estate and the plenum dominium of the minerals. But if both of the estates are held to be included in the disposition, then I think that it must also be affirmed that there is repugnancy between the narrative and the other clauses of the deed. The presumption is against such an interpretation of the deed, although if the operative clauses are not open to construction but must receive the widest effect of which they are capable, they must control the narrative clause, however clearly it may be expressed. I think, however, that the operative clauses are open to construction. I admit that they are habile, if taken alone, to carry both superiority and minerals; but they are also, as I have already said, the appropriate clauses, in my opinion, according to well-settled practice, for the conveyance of an estate of superiority only.

If, therefore, the disponent had been possessed of an estate of superiority co-extensive with the lands enumerated in the dispositive clause, I should, without much difficulty, have come to the conclusion that that estate alone was carried, because that view would have given effect to every clause in the disposition, and would have been inconsistent with none.

The disponent, however, had not an estate of superiority in the whole lands but only in the surface. How does that fact affect the construction of the disposition? It is said that it shews that the narrative and the operative clauses are in any view repugnant, because the former speaks only of the superiority of what Mr Moir held in property, while the latter clearly disposes an estate in the whole lands, whatever that estate may be. Assuming that that is the case, I cannot think that it necessitates a different construction of the disposition from that which I would otherwise put upon it. The disponent had an estate of superiority coextensive with the lands in one sense, and the disposition (read as a whole) bears to be, and is conceived in terms appropriate to, a disposition of an estate of superiority only. In these circumstances I think that it is more consistent with sound principle to hold, that although the dispositive clause was wider than the estate of superiority possessed by the disponent, it not the less dealt with an estate of superiority only, than to hold that the dispositive clause is to be stretched beyond the professed scope of the disposition altogether, and construed as including a separate estate of a character different from that in regard to which the parties contracted, and with which they allege that they are dealing.

I have arrived at this conclusion the more readily, because it seems to me to be the only one which is consistent with the judgment in Fleeming v. Howden—a judgment which I think must be regarded as an authority of the greatest weight. In that case the state of the titles, and the disposition under construction, were substantially identical with what they are here. It is true that there were elements in that case which there are not in the present, the most important being the want of power on the part of the disponent to convey the minerals. But the important point is that the Court held that the disposition was open to construction. If the disposition had not been open to construction, the fact that the disponent had no power to convey the minerals could never have enabled the Court to arrive at the conclusion which they did arrive at. Unless the dispositive clause had been capable of being construed as limited to the superiority, the want of power on the disponent's part would not have entitled the Court to give decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, although it might have formed a sufficient ground for reduction of the disposition.

I therefore consider the case of Fleeming v. Howden as a direct authority for saying that the operative clauses of the disposition now under consideration are open to construction, and must be held to carry either the whole estate of the disponent or the superiority only, according as the one view or the other is most consistent with the context of the deed, the state of the prior titles, and such circumstances as the actings of parties. Here the state of the title is exactly what it was in Fleeming's case, and can therefore create no bar to the view which I take; there are no actings of parties one way or the other; and the context of the deed appears to me to be absolutely clear and unambiguous. I am therefore of opinion that this case is ruled by that of Fleeming v. Howden.

In some respects, indeed, it seems to me that the present case is more favourable to the view that the minerals were not included than the case of Fleeming. In the first place, in that case the lands were disposed with "all right, title, and interest, claim of right, property, and possession, as well petitory as possessory, which we, as commissioners foresaid, or the said Honourable Charles Fleeming, his predecessors and authors, heirs and successors, have, had, or can any way pretend thereto in all time coming." There are no such words in the disposition in this case, and I do not think that it can be said that such words are altogether unimportant. In the second place, in the dispositive clause in Fleeming's case the description of the lands was not qualified in any way. In the present case the description of the lands of Hillfoot is limited by the words "all as at present possessed by John M'Arthur Moir." These words look very like the correlative in the dispositive clause, of the words "belonging in property to John M'Arthur Moir," which are used in the narrative clause as descriptive of the superiority which Mr Moir had purchased, and I should have been disposed so to read them, if it had not been that no such words are applied to the lands of Lochyfaulds. These lands, however, were originally part of Hillfoot, and had been conveyed to and possessed by Mr Moir's predecessor under the general name of Hillfoot, and the reason for their insertion as a separate subject in the disposition appears to have been this: Lochyfaulds was mentioned separately in the superiority title, and after the purchase by Mr Moir at the public roup of the superiority of Hillfoot a question seems to have arisen whether the superiority of Lochyfaulds was included. Mr Moir accordingly, by a private transaction, paid £30 for the superiority of Lochyfaulds, and these lands were therefore inserted in the dispositive clause as a separate subject. They were also described by boundaries, and that fact is legitimately relied on in support of the view that the words referring to the possession of Hillfoot were intended to do no more than indicate superficial boundaries. I feel the force of this view, and therefore I do not lay much stress upon the limiting words in the dispositive clause, although I think that they constitute an element which should not be altogether left out of consideration.

It is said that the view which I have expressed is inconsistent with the assignment in the disposition to the charter of resignation and confirmation of 1811, with the unexecuted precept of sasine therein contained, and the infeftment following thereon. But the charter and precept are assigned only in so far as applicable to the lands disposed, and to the end that John M'Arthur Moir "may be the more readily infeft and seased in the premises." The assignation, therefore, is only to the extent necessary to operate infeftment in what was disposed—i.e., an estate of superiority—and was not, in my judgment, a warrant for infeftment in anything more. I may point out that in the disposition in Fleeming's case, although there was not an assignation to an open precept, there was a procuratory of resignation; and it seems to me that any argument which can be founded upon the assignation of the open precept in this case would have been equally available in that case upon the procuratory.

In regard to the unreported case of Erskine I agree with Lord Wellwood and Lord Kyllachy that, if it conflicts with the unanimous judgment in Fleeming, the latter is to be followed. I observe, however, that in the disposition in Erskine's case there was an unusually exhaustive conveyance of all right, title, and interest in the lands, or any part or portion thereof, and that the majority

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur in the opinion of Lord Rutherford Clark, which I have seen. I could add nothing to the weight of that opinion by any remarks of my own.

LORD YOUNG.—I was not present when this case was originally argued, and I was no party to sending it for consideration by the whole Court. I had, however, to read the papers and to form an opinion. I did so, and wrote this opinion, which may be taken as the opinion of a consulted Judge. It was, indeed, prepared before any of the opinions of these Judges were lodged.

The question in this case regards not the construction of the disposition of 1837 to the defenders' author, but the identity of the subject thereby conveyed. For the construction of a deed of conveyance extrinsic evidence is generally (not always) inadmissible. For the identification of the subject such evidence is always admissible. Prior to the deed of 1837 the defenders' author held the lands of Hillfoot as vassal first under the Duke of Argyll, and subsequently of Mr Tait and his trustee in bankruptcy, and it is not doubtful that, but for an express reservation, he would have held the coal therein. That being an express reservation he had (at least prior to the deed of 1837), no dominium in the coal. Whether that deed gave him dominium therein is the question in the case.

It seems to be settled law that a reservation of coal in a feu-charter or disposition has the effect of making a separatum tenementum of the estate in such coal. It might, perhaps, not unreasonably have been otherwise regarded. But the decisions and judicial dicta are irresistible to the effect I have stated. On such reservation the minerals, says the Lord President in the case of Fleeming v. Howden, are "as completely a separate subject as if they had been a distinct portion of land." To the same effect Lord Curriehill says: "One practical effect of that proceeding"—the reservation—"was to split the solum of these lands from the subjacent mines into separata tenementa, it being established law that land may be separated into different tenements not only superficially but likewise vertically." Also Lord Westbury, who asserts "as beyond the possibility of doubt," that coal separated in title by reservation is a distinct feudal estate, "to which all the privileges and all the incidents of the ownership of an estate belong."

Applying these dicta I must hold that, down to 1837, the coal in Hillfoot constituted a separatum tenementum, a distinct feudal estate, "to which all the privileges and all the incidents of the ownership of an estate belong," and, "as completely a separate subject as if they" (the coals) "had been a distinct portion of land," as, for example, a farm of 1000 acres, or a mansion-house and policies of similar extent, for, as Lord Curriehill observes, there is no legal distinction between superficial and vertical separation. The separation here happens to be vertical. Suppose it had been superficial, and that the reservation in the feu-charter to the defenders' author had been of the mansion-house and policies (of the estate of Hillfoot), extending to say 1000 acres, and quite capable of being identified, of course by extrinsic evidence. Without the reservation the charter conveying the lands of Hillfoot to the defenders' author would, I assume, have carried the mansion-house and policies. With it, and by reason of it, the mansion and policies are a separatum tenementum to the plenum dominium of which, under the Crown, the granter of the charter has right. No. 129.

Suppose, then, that the vassal by the charter possesses the lands of Hillfoot (of course exclusive of the mansion and policies, to which he has no title), for, say, fifty years, and then, in 1837, purchases from his superior "the superiority and feu-duty of the lands of Hillfoot," and in implement and execution of the contract of sale obtains from his superior a disposition of "the lands of Hillfoot, all as at present possessed" by himself, and that he thereupon asserts right to the mansion-house and policies, as being, on a just construction of the disposition, included in the conveyance. Would it, or not, be a good answer that he did not purchase the mansion-house and policies, that he had no previous title thereto or seisin therein, and that these, therefore, were not included in the disposition of the lands of Hillfoot as at present possessed by him and his tenants? But the case thus put is, I think, indistinguishable from the present as regards the law applicable to it. It is legitimate and familiar to define and limit a general disposition of lands by reference to existing possession on an existing title, and there can, I should think, be no more natural and legitimate occasion for such limitation than in a disposition by a superior to his vassal in implement of a sale of the superiority, the plain purpose of which is not to enlarge the subject of the original grant to the vassal but only to give him the dominium directum of the very subject of which he was already in possession on a title to the dominium utile. Mar. 18, 1892. Orr v. Moir's Trustees.

But the validity of such limitation is not doubtful, and it certainly occurs in the disposition of 1837 to the defenders' predecessor. It disposes the lands of Hillfoot quite generally to John M'Arthur Moir "all as at present possessed by the said John M'Arthur Moir and his tenants." Now, was he, by himself or his tenants, then in possession of that part of those lands of Hillfoot which consisted of coal? That this question must be answered in the negative is clear and indisputable, for as the coal had never been worked (and has not yet been), there could be no possession of it other than seisin on a title that comprehended coal, and John M'Arthur Moir had no such title or seisin. The estate in the coal of the lands had fifty years before been erected into a separatum tenementum or distinct and separate estate or property to which John M'Arthur Moir had no title, and of which he had and could have no possession.

This is, in my opinion, conclusive of the case in the most strict technical view of the title to which the defenders appeal.

The cases which might be put in illustration of the extravagant results to which the defenders' argument would, or might, lead, are perhaps too obvious to warrant a consumption of time in stating them. But let me put one. Suppose the superior was himself working or had let to tenants the coal in the lands, and was drawing therefrom say £1000 a-year. He sells the superiority of the surface estate to his vassal therein for £400, being the fair market price of his superiority rights, viz., the feu-duty of £11 and possible casualties. The disposition in implement is, I assume, expressed exactly as that before us. According to the defenders' a cælo ad centrum argument, the vassal would take the estate in the coal, with of course the position of landlord in the coal lease. Nor would the result be different if the surface superiority and coal estate had been exposed to sale by auction in separate lots on the same day, the superiority lot being bought by the vassal for £400, and the coal lot by the coal company (a company) for £10,000. The vassal would take the coal as well as

No. 129. the superiority, at least if his disposition (in the same terms as here) was a day earlier in date or the soonest recorded. No reference to the sale contracts, although truly narrated in the disposition, or to the limitation of the conveyances by reference in the dispositive clauses to existing possession would be legitimate, if the defenders' argument is sound. Sensus moresque repugnant.

The reservation expressed in the original feu-right might have been repeated in the disposition of 1837, and such repetition might have been prudently cautious. But it would have been, strictly speaking, inaccurate, and I think superfluous, having regard to the reference to the disponees' possession, which was necessarily under the title containing the reservation. Whether, having regard to the original relation of superior and vassal between the disponent and disponee, and the contract narrated in the disposition, such references to the vassals' existing right and possession would have been implied without expression, I have no occasion to consider. Such a question seems to have occurred, and occasioned a difference of opinion, in the case of Erskine v. Schaw, referred to in the case for the defenders. I am not disposed to take any account of that case, which is unreported, and so was never before the profession. But I may notice that the dispositive clause there was not limited by a reference to the existing possession of the disponee. A minority of the Judges appear to have thought (and I am disposed to agree with them) that it might reasonably be implied. Had it been expressed, as here, the case would have been different, unless it could be held that such reference is immaterial.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The question in this case is whether, under the disposition of 1837, Mr M'Arthur Moir, whose trustees are the defenders, acquired right to the coal under the lands thereby conveyed. It was conceded by both parties that this question must be determined by reference to the titles alone.

At the date of the disposition Mr Moir held these lands in feu. The coal did not form a part of the feu. It was expressly reserved by the superior. Mr Moir purchased the superiority, and the disposition was granted in implement of the purchase.

A good deal has been said about the manner in which Mr Moir feudalised this disposition, and in reference to the fact that he used for this purpose a crown charter into which he had been assigned. I confess that I cannot see the importance of it. The mode in which his title was completed cannot, in my opinion, enlarge the conveyance, or aid in its interpretation. It is true that the disponent was not himself infeft in the superiority. But his disposition is not the less the only measure of the right conveyed.

The disposition recites the two contracts of sale under which Mr Moir purchased the superiority. There cannot, I think, be a doubt of the subject of the sale. It was the "superiority and feu-duty" of the lands, which were then held by Mr Moir in feu. In other words, the sale comprised a dominium directum, and nothing else. It did not comprise, and could not comprise, the coal which had not been feued. For the dominium directum can never comprehend a subject which is not contained in the dominium utile.

The disposition was granted in order to convey the subjects which were sold. It recites the contracts and the payment of the price. It then proceeds,— "Therefore I, as trustee foresaid, have sold, alienated, and disposed," &c. To my mind nothing could be clearer. The disponent disposes because he has sold.

the superiority, and received the price. He has to perform his part of the contract, and he can only do so by conveying what he has sold. If we read the disposition as including the coal, we are holding that it conveys more than the disposer was bound to convey, and as I think more than by his disposition he undertakes to convey. Orr v. Moir's
Trustees.

This is precisely what the defenders maintain. They claim the coal by virtue of the disposition, though they admit that the superiority did not contain it. It may be noticed that the disposition was granted by a trustee in bankruptcy, and it would be strange if he conveyed more than he was bound to convey. The case of the defenders depends on the one consideration, that the lands are conveyed without any reservation of the coal. They contend that the disposition had the double effect of conveying, first, the estate of superiority, and second, the plenum dominium of the coal.

It must be kept in view that the disposition is in the ordinary and appropriate form for conveying a superiority. It contains all the usual clauses applicable to such a conveyance, and it does not contain all the clauses usual in the conveyance of a dominium utile or dominium plenum.

In legal theory lands which have been feued remain within the title of the superior. The nature of his right in them is changed, inasmuch as from the date of the vassal's infeftment it is a dominium directum or superiority only. The vassal is infeft in the same lands, his estate being the dominium utile. When the superior desires to convey the superiority he conveys the lands which are comprised in the feu. In order to serve an important purpose in the feudal law, on which I need not dwell, there is no limitation in the conveyance. Feu-rights are excepted from the clause of warrandice. But this exception does not limit the conveyance. It merely excludes any action which might be brought on the warrandice on the theory that the disposition was absolute.

I see from the disposition in question that the disposer was bound to convey the superiority, and that he granted the disposition for the sole purpose of implementing his obligation. The disposition is, in my judgment, nothing more than a disposition of the superiority, though it takes the form of a conveyance of lands by reason of the legal theory to which I have adverted. It seems to me to follow that the description of the subjects conveyed was meant, and must be construed to be a description of the subjects comprised in the feu-right. For I think that the disposition contains a "declaration plain" to that effect. We are bound to read the deed so that it shall be, if possible, consistent in all its clauses, and to my mind it would be a violation of all just construction to read it as conveying what I think it clear the disposer did not undertake to convey.

Further, the lands are with one exception disposed as possessed by the vassal or those in his right. Inasmuch as they had been feued there could be no possession except by the vassal, and inasmuch as the coal was not within the feu there could be no possession of the coal, for there was no title to possess it. But when the possession of the vassal is appealed to as defining the subject conveyed, I think that I am justified in holding that a subject so defined should not be construed as including what the vassal had no title to possess.

It is said that if the disposer did not intend to convey the coal he should have reserved it. It might have been more prudent to do so, but in my opinion it was not necessary. I think that it was more incumbent on the disposer if he claimed right to the coal, to see that it was inserted in the dispositive clause in order that it might be made clear that it was conveyed. In my opinion it could not be shewn in any other way that the coal was conveyed by the disposition before us.

The argument of the defenders is that, as the coal is not reserved, it is comprised in the disposition of the lands. Let me shew what would be the necessary consequence of sustaining it. In this case the coal was at the date of the disposition vested in the disponent. But the meaning of the disposition cannot be determined by reference to the rights of the disponent. It must have the same meaning whether he was vested in the coal or not. If, therefore, the defenders are right in construing it as a conveyance of the coal, observe the necessary consequence. They would have an action of damages under the warrandice clause were it the fact that the disponent had not and never had a right to the coal. Or should he acquire the coal by a separate title after the date of his disposition, his right would at once perish, and the coal would be vested in the defenders by accretion.

Nay more, if a person held a superiority and a feu without consolidation, and on a sale of the superiority executed such a disposition as we have here, he would find himself divested of the feu as well as of the superiority. For the word "lands" is sufficient to carry every right, and as I have shewn, feus are not excepted from the disposition but from the warrandice clause. The disponent would have no action on the latter clause, but he would be entitled to the entire subject by virtue of the disposition, inasmuch as there is no limitation in the conveyance. Of course such a thing could not happen when the superiority and feu were held by different persons, for the disposition of the superior could carry nothing which was vested in the vassal. But on the theory of the defenders it must happen when the two estates are held by the same person.

I think that I am bound to put such a construction on the disposition as would avoid results so inequitable, and it seems to me that I can easily reach it by looking at the whole deed and not confining my attention to a single clause.

I have observed that the defenders are the representatives of the disponent. No question arises, therefore, with regard to a singular successor, though I do not think that would make any difference on the result. But it is not easy to see how the defenders, founding on a sale of a superiority in a disposition professing to convey what their author had bought, should be entitled to claim more than the subject of the sale.

It is said that, in holding that the word "lands" does not include the coal I am violating the canons of construction laid down by the House of Lords in the case of Lee (10 R. 91). I do not think that I am. I fully recognise that the words of the dispositive clause must receive their necessary meaning, and that that meaning cannot be controlled or limited by any inference to be drawn from the rest of the deed. I also recognise that they must receive the full meaning of which they are capable, unless it appears from the disposition itself that they were not used in that sense. I do not think the House laid down any other rules for our guidance. The principle on which they depend is very obvious. It is that construction is admissible to explain words of conveyance but never to contradict them.

If minerals are expressly conveyed by the dispositive clause it would be vain to argue that the disponent did not intend to convey them. The clause must receive its necessary meaning. If lands are conveyed the word "lands" will be construed in its most comprehensive sense, unless it be shewn that was used with a more restricted meaning. In limiting it to a conveyance of the surface or of the dominium directum, there is no violence done to its necessary meaning. It does not necessarily include minerals. For lands may be disposed with or without minerals as the case may be. It is ambiguous, for it is the appropriate word for the conveyance of a dominium directum, or of a dominium utile, or a dominium plenum. If a disponent on the narrative that he had sold certain lands, but under reservation of the minerals, executed a disposition in implement of that contract by which the lands were conveyed without the reservation being repeated in the dispositive clause, I cannot doubt that the minerals would not be included. I am stating what I take to be a clear case. In such a disposition there is a "declaration plain" that the word "lands," as it occurs in the dispositive clause, is not used in its largest sense, and does not convey the minerals. But if in any case the word "lands" as it occurs in the dispositive clause is susceptible of construction it is susceptible of construction in all, so that if it appears with sufficient certainty from the rest of the deed that it is used as not including minerals, it will be read in the limited sense in which it is shewn to be used.

Holding that I may construe the language of the dispositive clause before me, I am of opinion that it does not include the coal under the lands.

It has been suggested by some of the consulted Judges that, even if the coal was not conveyed to Mr Moir, it is not within the title of the pursuer. No question of this kind was raised or argued by the parties. On the contrary, it was assumed that the pursuer had right to the coal, unless it had been previously conveyed to Mr Moir. So far as I can judge from the disposition of Mr Scott to Sir A. Orr in 1860, the assumption is right. But it is not necessary for me to enter on that question, which must be argued if anything is to turn on it.

Thorsen v.

Neilson.

Ship—Charter-party—Delivery of cargo.—A ship was chartered to carry a cargo of timber and "deals for beam fillings and broken stowage" to a safe port as ordered, "the cargo to be unloaded as customary at port of discharge at such wharf or dock as the charterers or their agents may direct." "The custom of the wood trade of each port to be observed in all cases when not specially expressed."

The ship was ordered by the consignees to discharge at Queen's Dock, Glasgow, but the harbourmaster refused to give a berth there, and assigned another berth for the discharge of the cargo into the water. The consignees acquiesced in this arrangement, and the deals as well as the timber were discharged into the water.

In an action for payment of freight against the consignees the defenders pleaded compensation in respect of damage alleged to have been sustained by the deals being put into the water, and in being allowed to remain in the water for several days.

The Sheriff-substitute held that by the custom of Glasgow Harbour the ship-owners were bound to deliver the logs upon the quay, and that they were liable for the damage caused by their being allowed to remain in the water.

The "Theodor

In an appeal held (1) that the defenders' acquiescence in the mode of discharge had freed the ship from responsibility therefor; and (2) that the ship had performed her contract by delivering the deals into the water, and had no further responsibility in regard to them.

Ship—Freight—Charter-party—Demurrage.—A charter-party provided that part of the freight should be payable on arrival, "and the remainder after unloading and on right delivery of the cargo." It also provided that the owners should have a lien "for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage." The ship in the course of delivering a cargo of timber into the Clyde at Glasgow suspended delivery for two days till the consignee should find security for the freight.

In an action for two days' demurrage, held that the shipowners were not entitled to demurrage, as they might have completed unshipment of the cargo and yet retained their lien.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Inverclyde.

By a charter-party dated at Pensacola, Florida, on 30th December 1890, between the shipowners of the Norwegian ship "Theodor Korner," then lying there, and Messrs Wittich & Company, merchants there, it was agreed that the ship should load there a cargo of square pitch pine sawn timber, the merchants "to supply timber and/or deals and/or boards at their option for beam fillings and broken stowage." It was further agreed that she should proceed to a safe port in "the United Kingdom . . . as ordered on signing bill of lading, and deliver the same always afloat on being paid freight," at certain rates per measurement, . . . "freight to be paid as follows:—One-third in cash on arrival, and the remainder after unloading and on right delivery of the cargo," by approved bill at four months' date or in cash, "the cargo to be unloaded as customary at port of discharge, at such wharf or dock as the charterers or their agents may direct, and ten days of demurrage over and above the said lying days, at £18 per day . . . custom of the wood trade of each port to be observed in all cases when not specially expressed . . . the master or owners to have a lien on cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage."

The bill of lading was endorsed to M'Dowall & Neilson, timber-merchants, Glasgow, and the ship was ordered to the port of Glasgow.

The ship arrived at Glasgow on 15th May 1891. M'Dowall & Neilson directed her to go to Queen's Dock, where there were cranes and other arrangements suited for landing on the wharf the deals with which the interstices of the timber cargo were packed. The harbourmaster, however, declined to give the ship a berth at Queen's Dock, on account of the danger to other traffic in discharging logs of timber through the bow port, and directed her to be taken to Yorkhill, where the timber would have to be discharged into the water and rafted down to Port Glasgow. That berth was chiefly used for foreign cattle, and it was not possible to discharge the deals on the quay. The deals were in point of fact discharged into the water. The consignees, though they were unwilling that the ship be discharged at Yorkhill, were obliged to consent. The deals were allowed to lie in the water for several days. After about eight or ten days the shipmaster, at the request of M'Dowall & Neilson's measurers, took them up by water to Queen's Dock (a distance of 200 yards), where they were landed on the quay by means of a crane. When landed many of them were much discoloured and depreciated in value.

On 26th May, after the cargo was partly discharged, the shipmaster repeated a demand for security for the balance of freight due, and on M'Dowall & Neilson declining this and saying that nothing was due, his agents, on 29th May, wrote,—"We beg to intimate that the discharging herein will be stopped to-morrow morning until the quantity of cargo discharged is ascertained, and until we get the measurements your clients will be held liable for any loss arising thro' this detention. Further, the captain states he has discharged cargo more than sufficient to meet the amount of freight No. 130. already advanced. Our clients are still, however, willing, to avoid any unpleasantness, to continue the discharging, provided the freight due on the cargo already discharged be paid, and security for the balance given, or, if you still wish it, to deliver on pari passu payments." In terms of this letter delivery was stopped on 30th May and 1st June. On the latter day M'Dowall & Neilson without prejudice paid £190, and obtained a guarantee for the balance of freight, and discharging was resumed on 2d June.

Thorsen v.
M'Dowall &
Neilson.

The "Theodor Korner."

Subsequently Abraham Thorsen, the master, as representing the ship-owners, raised against M'Dowall & Neilson two actions before the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, the first for £56, 4s. 7d. as an unpaid balance of freight, and the second for £36, being two days' demurrage at £18 per day.

In their defences to the action for freight the defenders claimed to set off £56, 4s. 7d. for loss sustained by the deals being put into the river, and in being allowed to remain in the river for several days. The defenders averred;—(Stat. 4) "It is the custom of the wood trade in Glasgow, under charter-parties in similar terms to the present, for deals to be discharged on to the wharf." (Stat. 6) "In discharging the deals into the river the pursuer acted in breach of the custom of the port of Glasgow, and in defiance of the remonstrances of the defenders. In permitting the deals to remain in the river some days before being delivered on the quay in the Queen's Dock the pursuer acted in breach of his obligations under the charter-party."

In the other action the pursuer claimed demurrage for the two days—Saturday, 30th May, and Monday, 1st June—during which delivery was stopped till the consignees should find security for the freight.

The defenders denied that any demurrage was due.

A joint proof was led in the two actions, in which the facts above narrated were proved.

As regarded the custom of the port of Glasgow, the evidence shewed that very few ships having a cargo of timber and deals came to the port of Glasgow, as such cargoes were generally discharged at Greenock or Port-Glasgow, but that such ships as did come discharged their deals upon the quay. There was evidence that the Greenock merchant who received the logs would not allow them to be used as a raft for the deals.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie), on 23d December 1891, in the action for freight, found "that the pursuers failed to deliver the deals loaded under the charter-party and bill of lading in like good order and condition, at the port of Glasgow, as contracted for: Finds that the deals were damaged to the amount of £40 sterling, and to that extent sustains the defences; decerns against the defenders in favour of the pursuers for the admitted balance of freight due, viz., £16, 4s. 7d., &c.*

In the action for demurrage the Sheriff-substitute on the same date found "that the detention of the ship 'Theodor Korner,' for which the pursuers ask demurrage or damages, was caused by their own act and not by the defenders," and assoilzied the defenders.†

* "OPINION.— . . . I hold it proved that the ship was in fault, if not in putting out the deals into the water, at all events in leaving them in the dirty water of the Clyde for from ten to fourteen days. The ship's duty was to discharge according to the custom of the port, and that undoubtedly is by putting the deals upon the quay."

† "OPINION.— . . . The other question is whether Messrs M'Dowall & Neilson are liable in demurrage for the two days on which delivery of the cargo was stopped by the ship, in order to compel the merchants to pay freight and give security for the balance. The first observation that occurs at this point is Thorsen v.

M'Dowall &
Neilson.

The "Theodor Korner."

The pursuer appealed, and argued ;—Action for freight.—The pursuer's duty was to discharge the cargo over the side at a berth secured for him by the defenders. It was quite true they wished him at first to go to Queen's Dock, but the harbourmaster would not give them that berth, and they had acquiesced in the harbourmaster putting the ship in berth at Yorkhill. But at Yorkhill the right way to discharge over the side was to discharge into the water, because it was the only possible way. That being so, it was unreasonable to suppose that the pursuer could make a raft of the main part of the cargo, the timber, for the benefit of the deals which filled up the interstices and so keep the latter out of water, and equally so to suppose that he was to take the deals, a few at a time, up to Queen's Dock. The defenders should have made their own raft, or arranged otherwise for it. The case of *Hillstrom*¹ was overruled by the case of the "Alhambra."² That the pursuer took the deals up to Queen's Dock at all was more than his contract, which was to deliver over the side. The alleged custom was not proved. It was proved that once in the dirty water the deals were damaged.

Action for demurrage.—The pursuer was right in the dispute at the end of May, and entitled to stop delivery till he was satisfied. Three clauses in the charter-party bore upon the matter, first, it provided that the ship should "deliver . . . on being paid freight." Also that the payment was to be "one-third in cash on arrival, and the remainder after unloading and on right delivery of the cargo" by bill; and, lastly, that the owners were "to have a lien on cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage." These clauses were scarcely consistent, for if it were meant that the freight was only to be paid on delivery to the consignee, the lien was lost. But the lien was distinctly given in the last clause, and the first agreed with it, and these two clauses should prevail. That being so, the ship was entitled to demand security and stop unloading till it should be given.³

Argued for the defenders ;—Action for freight.—The custom of port which they averred was proved. The ship if it could not deliver in the proper way at the place she went to should have gone to the nearest place where she could. Freight could not be due for a cargo put into filthy water and damaged. That was not right delivery. Whether the Clyde damaged them or not the deals were delivered in a bad state, and the ship must excuse herself. If the deals had to be put into water the pur-that if the shipowner was entitled to a payment to account of freight, or to security, he did not take the proper course to protect himself when he stopped delivery. His own agents seem to have taken a more accurate view of the remedy when they wrote on May 27 (No. 18 of process)—'We have advised them to store the cargo and apply to the Court for a warrant to sell.' At all events that was more nearly the line indicated by the authorities and practice in like cases, as well as by the provisions of the Merchants Shipping Amendment Act of 1862. Prof. Bell, Com. i. 558 (605, M'Laren's edn.), says,—'The master is bound to land and lodge the goods with a wharfinger when there is any difficulty about freight, instead of keeping them on board,' and a like principle has been applied both in England and Scotland in regard to the detention of a vessel for unpaid charges for a dry dock,—in Somes v. British Empire Shipping Company [11th Aug. 1860, 24 Jurist, 761] in the House of Lords, followed in Stephen v. Swayne, 1861, 24 D. 158. I do not see, therefore, how to give effect to a claim for demurrage, or for damages in the nature of demurrage, arising from a detention by the master's own act."

suer should have made a raft to receive them either out of the discharged timber or in some other way. No. 130.

Action for demurrage.—The charter-party did not contemplate payment standard by standard as unloading proceeded. It was not so inconsistent as pursuer supposed. The master could discharge but retain the cargo for his lien, by putting a wharfinger in charge. If he had a lien he should have taken that course instead of turning the ship into a warehouse to preserve it. The cause of the stoppage was the refusal to unload, not any refusal or failure to take delivery.¹

Thorsen v.

M'Dowall &

Neilson.

The "Theodor

Korner."

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—There are here two actions to be disposed of, first, an action for freight, and second, an action for demurrage.

In the first action the pursuer claims decree for £56, 4s. 7d., as the balance of freight due to him in respect of a cargo of timber and deals carried in his ship the "Theodor Korner" from Pensacola to Glasgow. The defenders admit the balance of freight claimed to be correct, but plead in compensation that the cargo was damaged to that extent through the fault of the pursuer. The fault alleged against the pursuer, out of which the damage to cargo arose, is this, that whereas the pursuer was bound under his charter-party to deliver his cargo at such wharf or dock as the defenders might direct, and there according to the custom of the wood trade of the port, he, in disregard of the custom of trade in Glasgow and the defenders' directions to him to discharge in the Queen's Dock, discharged his cargo into the Clyde at Yorkhill.

The Sheriff-substitute has affirmed that there was fault as alleged on the part of the pursuer, he has assessed the damage thence arising at £40, and has given the pursuer decree for £16, 4s. 7d. I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute's conclusion is erroneous. Assuming that damage was done to the cargo by discharging it into the river to the extent allowed, I think the defenders have failed to shew that the damage arose in any way through the fault of the pursuer. The pursuer was undoubtedly bound by the terms of the charter-party to deliver his cargo at the wharf or dock selected by the defenders, if the defenders had secured a discharging berth for the vessel (as was their duty) at that wharf or dock. They directed the pursuer to discharge in the Queen's Dock, but the harbourmaster refused to allow the vessel to discharge there. Accordingly, the pursuer was not in fault for not discharging in the Queen's Dock. No order or direction by the defenders to discharge there was of any avail, seeing that the harbourmaster forbade it. The harbourmaster assigned a discharging berth to the pursuer at Yorkhill, at which, there being no facilities for landing the cargo on the wharf, the cargo was discharged into the river. The harbourmaster says,—"The 'Theodor Korner' was put there to discharge her cargo in the water." This was known to the defenders and acquiesced in by them. Any damage therefore which arose through discharging the cargo into the water was damage for which the pursuer is not responsible. It was the only mode of discharging possible at the berth assigned to the vessel, and it was a mode of discharging consented to by the defenders, although unwillingly.

But it is said that even if the discharge into the water was right, at all events not involving fault on the part of the pursuer, he should, without delay, have transferred the cargo, or part of it, from the water to the nearest wharf and

No. 130. delivered it there. I think there was no such duty on the part of the pursuer. He was bound to deliver his cargo over the ship's side at Glasgow, at whatever discharging berth was assigned to him. But he was bound to deliver the cargo at one place only, and it was the defenders' duty at that place to take delivery. The pursuer had no concern with the future destination of the cargo after delivery over the ship's side, and was no more bound to tow it in rafts to the Queen's Dock than to put it on railway trucks for delivery in some other town. Whether, therefore, the damage arose from putting the cargo into the river, or from its being allowed to lie there for several days, it is equally damage for which the pursuer is not responsible.

Mar. 18, 1892.
Thorsen v.
M'Dowall &
Neilson.

The "Theodor
Korner."

The alleged custom of the port, said to have been disregarded by the pursuer, does not really affect the question. I think the alleged custom is not proved, but if it had been proved that it was the custom to deliver cargoes such as that in question on a wharf or quay, and only there, the defenders acquiescing in a different mode of discharge, as they did, absolves the pursuer from any consequences arising from the discharge in a manner other than customary. I am accordingly of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to decree for the full balance of freight claimed, and that the counter claim for damage should be repelled.

In the second action the pursuer claims two days' demurrage under these circumstances. After a portion of the cargo had been discharged in excess of that for which freight had been received, the pursuer demanded payment of the freight still unpaid for delivered cargo, and security for payment of the freight due or to become due for the cargo still in the ship. Alternatively with the demand for security, he proposed to deliver the balance of his cargo in return for freight to be paid as cargo was delivered—as he termed it “to deliver on pari passu payments.”

These demands or proposals were at first declined, but after some negotiation the defenders paid the amount due in respect of cargo already delivered, and gave the security for the balance of the freight which had been asked. During these negotiations, however, the pursuer stopped the discharge of cargo for two days, and for these two days he claims demurrage at the rate stipulated in the charter-party, on the ground that the discharge of the ship was thus delayed beyond the time which was necessary or reasonable for her discharge through the fault of the defenders in refusing what the pursuer was entitled to demand, and the defenders bound to grant. Whether the pursuer was entitled to make this demand, and the defenders in fault in refusing to comply with it, depends on the terms of the charter-party. Its provisions bearing upon this question are these—freight was to be paid on the cargo at a certain rate per 165 cubic feet, and was to be paid as follows—“one-third in cash on arrival, and the remainder after unloading and on right delivery of the cargo” by approved bill, or cash subject to discount in the pursuer's option—“the master or owner to have a lien on cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage.” These provisions do not follow each other consecutively in the charter-party as I have stated them, but they are the whole provisions bearing upon the payment of freight. Now, under these provisions, what were the pursuer's rights? The only difficulty in answering this question arises from a seeming conflict between the clauses of the charter-party which provide for the payment of the remainder of the freight (deducting the one-third payable on arrival, which was admittedly paid) after “unloading and on right delivery of the cargo,” and at same time provide that the pursuer should have a lien on the cargo “for all freight.”

In construing this charter effect must be given to all its stipulations, if that be possible; none of them can be disregarded unless a direct conflict between them makes it impossible to give effect to each. If the clauses of this charter were in direct conflict, so that one clause must yield if the other is to have effect, I think it would be a difficult question whether the express provision as to the payment of freight, or the equally express provision as to a lien "for all freight" should prevail. But I am of opinion that there is no such conflict necessarily here; the clauses may be read so as to give effect to each. If the freight clause "after unloading and on right delivery of the cargo" is read as meaning delivery to the consignee, the lien would be destroyed; there could be no lien over the cargo after delivery to the consignee. The words lien "for all freight" would thus simply be deleted from the charter-party. I therefore reject that reading of the freight clause, although I admit that in the ordinary case "delivery of the cargo" does mean delivery to the consignee. But if the freight clause is read as meaning "after unloading and on right delivery over the ship's side," then the lien is preserved, for the whole cargo may be put out of the ship and still remain in the custody of the shipowner. I therefore adopt this reading, which at once fulfils the condition in favour of the consignee under the freight clause, and the condition as to lien in favour of the ship. This reading of the charter-party is favoured by what may in this case be fairly conjectured to have been the intention of the parties. The freight here was to be ascertained by measurement of the cargo. That could not be done while the cargo was in the ship's hold. It had to be unloaded for the purpose of measurement, and as payment of freight was farther conditional "on right delivery of the cargo"—that is, on delivery of the cargo in the same good order and condition in which it was shipped,—this again required the cargo to be put in such a position as to admit of its examination. I read the charter-party therefore as providing that after payment of the one-third payable on arrival no further freight was payable or demandable until the cargo—that is, the whole cargo—had been unloaded, and found to be in good condition as when shipped, damage or deterioration caused by perils of the sea, &c., always excepted; while on the other hand the ship should have a lien on the cargo so unloaded and delivered over the ship's side "for all freight" until the consignee had satisfied the ship's demands in that respect.

Another view of the charter-party may be taken which leads to the same practical result. Assume, in favour of the pursuer, that the words in the freight clause "and on right delivery of the cargo" are in direct conflict with the lien clause, and that the latter must prevail, there still remains the provision that the remainder of the freight is only payable "after unloading" of the cargo, and that provision, as I have shewn, does not conflict with the clause. Both may be read together, and both must therefore receive effect. And the giving effect to both puts the pursuer in this position, that he could not demand the remainder of his freight until after the cargo had been unloaded, while the consignee could not demand delivery of the cargo to himself until the claims for freight had been settled.

It was suggested, by way of reconciling the clauses supposed to be conflicting, that the lien clause might be read as affording a lien only in so far as this was not taken away by other express stipulations of the charter-party. But the difficulty of accepting that view seems to me to be that it imports into the lien clause a restriction or qualification which is not there. The lien clause is

The view which I take of the charter-party excludes the pursuer's claim for demurrage. The stoppage of the delivery of the cargo arose from the pursuer's demand for something to which under his contract he was not entitled. The delay thus occasioned was attributable to him, and for that the defenders are not liable. The Sheriff-substitute's judgment assoilzieing the defenders from this claim should in my opinion be affirmed.

I would propose to deal with the expenses of this litigation thus: The proof as regards both claims was led in the first action, but I find on examination that out of a proof of over fifty pages not more than six or seven pages have reference to the claim for demurrage. I would therefore find the pursuer entitled in the first case to expenses in the Sheriff Court and here, as the same shall be taxed, under deduction of a sum of £10; and find the defenders entitled to expenses in the second case in both Courts, but excluding therefrom the expenses incurred in connection with the proof.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

IN the action for the balance of freight the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal; recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 23d December 1891: Find in fact (1) that the 'Theodor Korner' arrived at Glasgow on or about 15th May 1891, with the cargo on board referred to on record, of which cargo the defenders M'Dowall & Neilson were the consignees; (2) that a berth at Yorkhill was assigned to said vessel by the harbourmaster at Glasgow for the discharge of said cargo there into the water, and that the said defenders or consignees foresaid acquiesced in the discharge of said cargo at said berth into the river Clyde; (3) that the said cargo was damaged by being discharged into the river and remaining there for several days before being removed to the Queen's Dock, and that the damage so sustained was to the extent and value of £40 sterling; (4) that said damage was not occasioned by any fault or breach of contract on the part of the pursuers; and (5) that the balance of freight due to the pursuers in respect of said cargo is £56, 4s. 7d.: Find in law that the pursuer is not liable to the defenders for the damage sustained by said cargo as aforesaid, and that the defenders are liable to the pursuers in the said sum of £56, 4s. 7d. with interest as concluded for: Therefore decern against the defenders in terms of the prayer of the petition: Find the defenders liable to the pursuers in the expenses of process, both in the Sheriff Court and in this Court, subject to a deduction of £10 sterling from the taxed amount."

IN the action for demurrage the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find in fact that there was no undue detention of the pursuers' vessel in the discharge of her cargo, and that any delay which took place in the course of the discharge of said cargo was occasioned by the pursuer and not by the defender: Find in law that the defenders are not liable in the demurrage sued for: Therefore dismiss the appeal: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 23d December 1891, in so far as it finds the defenders entitled to expenses: Quoad ultra affirm the said interlocutor, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses both in the Sheriff Court and this Court, except the expenses incurred in connection with the proof led by parties.”

Revenue—Income-tax—Exemption—Scientific institution—Income-tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sched. A, rule 6.—The Income-tax Act, 1842, schedule A, rule 6, exempts from income-tax “any building the property of any literary or scientific institution, used solely for the purposes of such institution, and in which no payment is demanded for any instruction there afforded by lectures or otherwise.” Held that the hall, library, and museum of the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh were not exempt under the above provision, in respect that the college was not a literary or scientific institution but an institution whose main objects were professional.

ON 12th January 1891 the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh 1st Division, appealed to the General Commissioners of Income-tax for the county of Edinburgh, against an assessment under schedule A of the Income-tax Acts, on £533, being the annual value of their hall and museum, the question being whether the College was exempted as a scientific institution in the sense of the Income-tax Act, 1842, schedule A, rule 6.*

The Commissioners sustained the appeal.

The Surveyor of Taxes obtained a case. The following were the facts stated in the case:—“The Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh is incorporated under various Acts of Parliament and Royal Charters dating from the year 1505, and its present constitution is regulated by the Act 13 Vict. cap. 23, entitled ‘an Act for enabling Her Majesty to grant a new charter to the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, and for conferring further powers on the said College,’ and a royal warrant for a new charter following thereon, dated 11th March 1851. By the said royal warrant, which proceeds on the narrative of Her Majesty ‘being willing to give all proper encouragement to the advancement of the science of surgery within her dominions, and to promote the good of the said College,’ the then Fellows of the Royal College of Surgeons of the City of Edinburgh, and such other persons as may from time to time be elected Fellows of the said College, are of new constituted and incorporated into one body-politic and corporate, by the name and style of ‘The Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh,’ and it is ordained and declared that the said Royal College shall have and enjoy all the rights and privileges heretofore belonging to the Royal College of Surgeons of the City of Edinburgh in respect of the arts and sciences of anatomy, surgery, and pharmacy. The said charter further provides for the admission of new Fellows by diploma, and empowers the College to grant diplomas or licenses to practise anatomy, surgery, and pharmacy, after such course of study, and "In the first century and a-half of the existence of the Corporation of Surgeons their members were the sole teachers, and almost the sole practitioners in Edinburgh, of what was then known as the healing art. The original research in the sciences of medicine and surgery, with the kindred branches of chemistry, anatomy, physiology, midwifery, &c., which has proceeded from Edinburgh, has to a very large extent been done by the teachers and members of the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, which was in existence long before the foundation of the medical faculty of the University of Edinburgh. The diploma of the College was a professional qualification long before the University degree of M.D. was instituted. The College has always been closely allied to the University of Edinburgh. In accordance with the statutes of that University any four out of fifteen medical classes required for graduation may be attended under College teachers, as well as the practical classes of physiology, pathology, and materia medica. Similar privileges are extended by most of the other Universities in the United Kingdom. The whole education required for graduation at the Universities of London and Cambridge, and for M.D. of the University of St Andrews, may be taken in this school. Prior to 1858 none of the degrees of the Scottish Universities conferred any right to practise surgery. It was maintained at one time that the degree of M.D. conferred that privilege, but this was negatived by a judgment of the Court of Session.

"The Fellows are the governing body of the College. The Fellowship diploma is granted to candidates who are in possession of a recognised qualification in surgery, after due examination in surgery, and on the vote of the College as to their fitness. In certain cases the College admits to its Fellowship without examination registered practitioners whose distinction by original investigations and surgical qualifications seem of a sufficiently high order to warrant their admission. In both cases a fee of £30 is payable on entry, and these fees are assessed under schedule D of the Income-tax Acts. No annual subscription is payable by the Fellows, and no division of profits is made among them.

"The College also grants the qualifications of Licentiate, Diploma in Public Health, and Licentiate in Dental Surgery.

"The buildings belonging to the College consist of (1) hall, library, two committee rooms, and officer's house on the ground floor, with museum above; and (2) lecture rooms, chemical and other research laboratories, dissecting rooms, and other places of study. The former buildings which (with the exception of the officer's house) are the subject of the present appeal, form the main buildings of the College, and the latter are separated therefrom by a walk, and have separate communications. The lecture rooms, laboratories, &c., are assessed under schedule A separately from the main buildings, on a net annual rent or value of £227. The officer's house is also separately assessed on the net annual value of £12.

"Meetings of the College are held periodically in the hall, and the library and museum are open for the use of the Fellows of the College, to which privilege they are entitled by virtue of their position as Fellows, and the fees paid by them on entry. These buildings are never let for other purposes. The professional examinations are conducted in the hall, library, and committee rooms by the board of examiners, and include chemical testing, laboratory work, examination and description of preserved specimens of anatomy, surgical apparatus, and such like.

"The library contains a valuable collection of scientific works by British and foreign authors, is open to Fellows, and is meant to keep Fellows abreast of the advances, not only in their own spheres of the sciences of medicine and surgery but in other sciences, and is very important in encouraging and aiding study and research in the various sciences. The College does not publish any transactions in separate form, but many medical and surgical papers by its Fellows are published in the weekly medical journals, such as the Lancet, Edinburgh Medical Journal, &c.

"The museum contains a very valuable collection of anatomical specimens, and other specimens relating to the study of the sciences of medicine, surgery, &c., and is especially intended and used for study in special branches requiring illustration, the means of which can only be obtained by the possession of such a collection. The Conservator of the museum usually devotes one hour a week to the systematic demonstration of the preparations in the museum to registered medical students, whether they are studying in the University or any of the buildings used for extramural teaching. No fees are charged for such demonstrations, although desks are placed and arranged in the museum for the convenience of the students attending. The Conservator and his assistant are engaged chiefly in putting up new specimens illustrative of the sciences of anatomy, medicine, surgery, natural history, &c., and these are collected with the express object of further developing the study and investigation of special branches of these sciences. These new collections are periodically exhibited to, and examined by, the Fellows of the College at meetings held by them.

"The lecturers in the lecture-rooms adjoining the Royal College of Surgeons are associated together under a deed of agreement. They are not all Fellows of the College, but all those who lecture upon surgery, anatomy, &c., require to be, and are Fellows, and . . . some of the teachers, for example in chemistry, are not necessarily Fellows . . . The associated lecturers pay an annual rent to the College, and receive from the students fees for teaching. These fees are separate and distinct from the fees paid to the College for professional examinations, and do not entitle the students to enter the museum or library of the College; but they have access to the museum when it is open to the public for inspection. The lecturers transact their business within the lecture rooms, and as lecturers have no right of access to the hall, library, or museum. Beyond payment of the rent the College has no interest in the revenue derived by the lecturers from students' fees. . . .

"For the purpose of furthering the study of the sciences of anatomy and surgery the College annually grants prizes for the best essays on a surgical subject selected by the College for competition amongst its Fellows and Licentiates, and prizes to students for the best approved dissections of the human body, and on examination in materia medica and therapeutics. It also grants triennially a prize of £100 for the 'greatest benefit done to practical surgery' within the triennial period.

"For the last twenty-nine years the average revenue of the College from all sources has been £2478, and the average expenditure necessary to discharge its functions has been £1454. . . . The particulars of income and expenditure in the account for the year ended 30th September 1890 are as follows":—(Quoted below).*

Royal College
of Surgeons of

At the hearing the parties referred to certain additional facts in the history of the Royal College of Surgeons. These facts sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord President.

The surveyor argued;—The Royal College of Surgeons was not a scientific institution in the sense of the Act. They were simply a professional, or, rather looking to their origin, a trading body. Down to 1850 they were nothing else than one of the incorporated trades of Edinburgh, and at the present day they were a body whose main object was to promote professional as distinguished from properly scientific objects. Of course surgery being a science the promotion of the profession of surgery in a sense promoted science. But in order to come within the exemption the institution must promote the science as distinguished from professional interest and advantage of its members. It was on the ground of this distinction that the case of the *Writers to the Signet*¹ was decided on the one hand, and that of the *Institution of Civil Engineers*² on the other. The facts brought the present case within the former rather than the latter of these authorities.

Argued for the respondents;—The College was a scientific institution in the sense of the Act, instituted by royal charter for the advancement of science, and used for the purposes of the sciences of anatomy, surgery, &c., exclusively. The granting of licences, &c., was not only for the purpose of enabling the holders to enter the medical profession but was mainly and directly intended to raise the standard of proficiency in the study of medical science, acquired by systematic training through the medium of a compulsory curriculum and examination. The qualifications of "Licence" and "Fellowship" were instituted long before the Medical Act of 1858 was passed, by which the possession of medical and surgical qualifications was made necessary to enter the medical profession. The diploma of Fellow of the College was a stamp of proficiency in the science

of Surgeons of Edinburgh.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The exemption from income-tax claimed in this case is rested on the following words in that part of Schedule A of the Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), which states the allowances to be made in respect of the duties in that schedule,—“Or on any building the property of any literary or scientific institution, used solely for the purposes of such institution, and in which no payment is made or demanded for any instruction there afforded by lectures or otherwise.” The hall, museum, and library sought to be assessed are the property of the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, and accordingly the claim can only be allowed if that body is a “scientific institution” in the sense of the Act. That is the question we have to decide.

That every incorporated body of surgeons or medical men has a relation to physical science, and that the association of surgeons or medical men tends to promote physical science, are propositions which cannot be questioned. On the other hand, it is manifest that the term “scientific institution” cannot be applied indiscriminately to all incorporations or associations composed of surgeons or medical men. We must find out whether science is the object of the institution in some other sense than that in which it may grandiloquently be said that it is the object of the profession of surgery.

The mode of determining such questions is usefully illustrated by the two cases cited at the bar—The Writers to the Signet, 14 R. 34, and the Institution of Civil Engineers, L. R., 15 App. Cas. 334. Those cases arose under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885. The words in that Act, corresponding to those in the Act of 1842 now before us, confer an exemption on property legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science, and as the exemption in those cases was claimed on the ground that the property was applied to the purposes of the institutions assessed, the question at issue was very nearly the same as that which more directly arises here, viz., is the institution a scientific institution? And the opinion of the noble and learned Lords and learned Judges have a very direct bearing.

Now, the existing charter of the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh was granted in 1851 by royal charter granted in pursuance of an Act of Parliament. Down to 1851 the College was one of the fourteen incorporated trades of Edinburgh, as the Chirurgeons or Surgeons' Craft, being denominated at one time the Chirurgeons or Barbers of Edinburgh; afterwards the Chirurgeons or Chirurgeon-Apothecaries of Edinburgh; afterwards the College or Corporation of Surgeons of the City of Edinburgh, and having first received incorporation by royal charter in 1778 by the name of the Royal College of Surgeons of the City of Edinburgh.

In 1847, as is well known, the exclusive rights of the trades were done away with, and of course the growing dignity of the medical profession generally made the status of the trade guild inappropriate to a privileged body of surgeons. Accordingly, by the charter of 1851 the connection with the trades was terminated; arrangements were prescribed for the admission of new Fellows by diploma, and the granting of diplomas or licences entitling the recipients to practise anatomy, surgery, and pharmacy, and provisions were made for winding up a Widows' Fund connected with the institution.

At this stage it may be asked, Prior to 1851 was the Royal College of Surgeons or the Surgeons' Craft a scientific institution? I hardly think this question could be answered in the affirmative. It was a professional association, developed out of the original Surgeons' Craft, and I see in it no note of a scientific institution.

I turn now to the College as it exists. Much has been made of the expression which occurs in the preamble of the charter of Her Majesty's willingness to give all proper encouragement to the advancement of the science of surgery within her dominions, and to promote the good of the said College. I do not think that this use of the word "science" goes far to shew that the College is, in the sense we are now concerned with, a scientific institution. We must look at the facts. The Fellows are the governing body. They are qualified surgeons, admitted as a rule after examination, and by a vote as to fitness. The College grants licences after due examination. Neither Fellows nor licentiates receive pecuniary profit out of the funds. The Fellows have the use of the library and museum, both of which are valuable collections. The College does not publish any transactions, but (as may readily be supposed) many of the Fellows are individually contributors to medical journals.

The College is concerned with education in this way. Among the buildings belonging to it are class-rooms, in which are taught the subjects of which study is necessary to the attainment of a qualification to practise surgery. The lecturers on surgery and anatomy must be Fellows of the College, but the lecturers on other subjects need not be so. All lecturers before being allowed to lecture must satisfy the College that they have adequate means of illustrating their lectures. Rent is paid to the College for the lecture-rooms by the lecturers, who draw fees from the students. Attendance on the lectures is recognised as qualifying for the medical degrees conferred by the University of Edinburgh, which avail as a qualification to practise medicine or surgery.

So far as to teaching. The College examines candidates for the licences to practise surgery which it confers, and for diplomas in public health. It also gives prizes for the best essays on surgical subjects, for dissections of the human body, and for knowledge in materia medica and therapeutics.

Such, stated shortly, are the facts. From them I gather that the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh is a professional body, whose members enjoy certain privileges, and which promotes the professional teaching of its licentiates, and also of those studying for the practice of medicine generally. It certainly promotes science, because the profession is a scientific profession, and the privilege of its Fellows and the education of its licentiates, and of all who learn their profession within its walls, conduce to the advancement of science. But its primary and proximate objects are professional, and its methods square with the requirements of the profession, and if it furthers research, it is only incidentally and indirectly.

My opinion is that the decision of the Commissioners was wrong.

LORD ADAM.—The question here—at least the leading question—is, whether the Royal College of Surgeons is a scientific institution? If it be not a scientific institution, there is no other question, because in that case the question as to the use of the buildings does not arise at all. If, in the sense of the Act, the main and leading purpose of the institution is the advancement of science, it will not, I think, be the less entitled to the exemption claimed because it aids incidentally and consequentially the promotion of professional purposes, and appears to have been very much the case with the Institution of Civil Engineers in London. On the other hand, if the main and leading object of the institution be that of advancing the interests of a profession, then the fact that it may incidentally and as a consequence promote science will not the less make it other than a professional institution, and as such not entitled to the exemption claimed.

Inland
Revenue v.
Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh.

I must say I entertain no doubt that the College of Surgeons in its main and leading object is a professional institution. I think its main purpose is exactly that which is set forth in its recent charter. It says, that it shall be in the power of the said College, under its common seal, to grant diplomas or licences to practise anatomy, surgery, and pharmacy in such form as shall from time to time be thought fit to arrange, and then it goes on to say that such parties after examination shall be entitled to be admitted licentiates of said College, and shall be entitled to exercise and enjoy all the rights of practising anatomy, surgery, and pharmacy which are commonly enjoyed by the Fellows of the said College, and which have heretofore been enjoyed. I think that is the leading purpose of this institution. It is for the purpose of qualifying persons to practise, and giving them licence to practise, anatomy and surgery, and if we look at the statement given us of the funds we see that it is from that source that the main portion of their funds is derived. One item of income consists of the sums received from candidates for the degree of licentiate of the College, and the next is exactly in the same position, namely, fees of Fellowship—the Fellowships being obviously taken, I think, for the purpose of obtaining a degree of superior reputation than that of a mere licentiate of the College. I need not repeat what your Lordship has said about the history of the institution. By producing learned men it necessarily promotes incidentally and consequentially the study of science, but that it does so I cannot think makes it a scientific institution in the sense of the Act. Its main and leading object is that of a professional institution for the encouragement and promotion of the practice of surgery, and not of science. On these grounds I entirely concur with your Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN.—The Act of Parliament gives no definition of a scientific or literary society, and we are left to define it, I presume, by a reference to the objects and practice of such associations. These, I think, may be stated generally to include the meeting for the discussion of such subjects of literature or science as the society undertakes to promote, the publication of papers, and the making grants to individuals who undertake to prosecute studies of scholarship or scientific research.

Now, in reading the opinions in the latest and most authoritative case on this subject—the case of the Institution of Civil Engineers—I think it is evident that in the opinion of all the law Lords who took part in the case, a body that is constituted for professional objects is not a literary or scientific society in the sense of the Act; and the distinction taken between the case of the Institution of Civil Engineers and that of the Writers to the Signet was this, that the Institution of Civil Engineers gave a professional qualification neither to members of the corporation nor to licentiates, and that while it was certainly an advantage to an engineer to be known to belong to such a society, it gave him no rights which he could exercise outside the walls of the association. And it appeared to their Lordships that this—though consisting of professional men, because these were the only men competent to discuss such questions—was a body constituted for objects similar to those of societies which are universally recognised as scientific societies, such as the Royal Society or the Linnæan.

Now, in comparing the present case with that of the Civil Engineers, I think it is chiefly distinguished by the absence of those incidents which in the opinion of the House of Lords suffice to characterise the Institution of Civil Engineers as a scientific society, and we have all or nearly all the incidents which mark out the Writers to the Signet as a professional body who were not entitled to the exemption. It is true that the Fellowship of the College of Surgeons is not technically a professional qualification—a qualification to practise—and for this reason, that no one except honorary members can become a Fellow until he has already got a professional qualification. But then while the College of Surgeons does not and cannot by making a man a member of the corporation give him what he has already, they give professional qualifications to students. They have a school, and they have an examining body, and by Act of Parliament their licence given to their students is a professional qualification. That circumstance, I think, points out very clearly what is the true character and object of this College, and I am of opinion with your Lordship that they are not entitled to exemption, and the decision of the Commissioners ought to be reversed.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT reversed the determination of the Commissioners, and remitted to them to sustain the assessment.

Poor—Settlement—Alteration of parish boundaries by Boundary Commissioners—Local Government Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 50), secs. 49 and 50—Jurisdiction.—The transfer by the Boundary Commissioners of part of a parish to another parish has no effect on parochial settlements acquired prior to its date either by birth or residence in the part of the parish which has been so transferred.

Observations on the effect of an order of the Boundary Commissioners under the 49th section of the Local Government Act, 1889.

Selkirk.

At the passing of the Local Government Act, 1889, part of the area included within the municipal boundaries of Galashiels and county of Selkirk was part of the parish of Melrose.

On 13th December 1890 the Boundary Commissioners, in terms of the power conferred upon them by the Local Government Act, 1889, sec. 49,

* The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 49, enacted,—“(1) The Boundary Commissioners shall proceed as soon as may be after such commencement . . . to inquire into the circumstances of the counties, burghs, and parishes, and detached parts of counties and parishes, and shall frame orders for dealing with such counties, burghs, parishes, and detached parts, so that each burgh and parish . . . may be within a single county, and that no part of a county or parish be detached therefrom, and such order may provide issued an order in which they determined that that part of the parish of Melrose which was situate in the county of Selkirk should in future form part of the parish of Galashiels.* This order was confirmed by the Galashiels and Melrose Confirmation Act, 1891, which also provided that the order should come into force on 11th June 1891.

Inspector of Melrose.

On 26th August 1891 Mrs Hay, a widow, who had for five years prior to 11th June 1891 continuously resided in Johnston's Close, Galashiels, which was formerly in the parish of Melrose, applied to the inspector of Galashiels parish for parochial relief, which was granted.

The inspector of Galashiels thereafter sued the inspector of Melrose in the Sheriff Court of Roxburgh at Jedburgh for payment of the sum so given in relief, on the footing that Johnston's Close was, prior to 11th June 1891, in the parish of Melrose, and that the pauper's settlement was therefore in that parish.

The defender stated that from the date of the order of the Boundary Commissioners the relief and management of the poor in the transferred area fell to be administered by the parish of Galashiels. "As the transference of the area was made for all purposes, whether county council, Justices, Sheriff, militia, parochial board, school board, local authority, and as the parish of Galashiels levies the poor-rates in said area, it is liable in the relief and management, not only of the poor who had their settlements in respect of birth or residence in it, and who were on the roll at 11th June 1891, the date of the transfer, but also of the poor who shall become paupers, or be or have been placed on the roll after 11th June 1891, and whether in respect of settlement acquired before or after that date. . . . It is to be noted that under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, section 49 (6), the Boundary Commissioners are empowered as follows, viz.,—'When an order under this Act has taken effect, the Boundary Commissioners may provide for the adjustment and disposal of the property, debts, and liabilities of the various authorities affected for such alteration of boundaries, whether of the county or of any other area, as may seem necessary for the said purpose, and such alteration shall have effect for all purposes, whether county council, Justices, Sheriff, militia, parochial board, school board, local authority, or other, save as hereinafter provided."

* "Parishes of Galashiels and Melrose.—Whereas each of the parishes of Galashiels and Melrose is situated partly in the county of Roxburgh and partly in the county of Selkirk: And whereas it appears to us, after communicating with the authorities and others interested, and considering all objections made to the terms of our draft order thereanent, to be expedient to alter and adjust the boundaries of the said counties and parishes in manner hereinafter provided: Now, therefore, we, the Boundary Commissioners for Scotland, do hereby, in pursuance of the powers conferred upon us by the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, determine and order as follows:—

"(1) Subject to the provisions of the said Act, so much of the parish of Melrose as is situated in the county of Selkirk shall cease to be part of that parish, and shall form part of the parish of Galashiels.

"(2) Subject to the provisions of the said Act, the parish of Galashiels, as altered in area by this order, shall be wholly included in and shall form part of the county of Selkirk.

"(3) The Galashiels (Landward) School Board shall cease to have jurisdiction over any part of the parish of Galashiels comprised within the municipal boundaries of the burgh of Galashiels, and the school district of the burgh of Galashiels shall comprise the whole area within the said municipal boundaries.

"(4) This order shall come into operation, for the purposes of school board elections, on the 28th day of February 1891, and, for all other purposes, on the 15th day of May 1891."

by the order, and for the settlement of differences arising out of the order'; and by section 50 of the said Act, the Boundary Commissioners are, inter alia, empowered to adjust as arbiters questions between authorities failing to come to an agreement as to the adjustment of property, debts, liability, or financial relations, and transfer of duties arising out of 'any order or other thing made or done in pursuance of this Act.' Failing a settlement therefor between the two parishes, the questions of liability and compensation which have arisen should have been referred to the Boundary Commissioners as authorised and empowered to deal therewith."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) In respect the said Catherine Morrison or Hay has a residential settlement in the parish of Melrose, the pursuer is entitled to decree as craved. (2) The law regulating the settlements of paupers not having been altered by the Local Government Act, and the same being still in force, the pursuer is entitled to decree as craved.

The defender pleaded;—(1) In respect that the questions raised fall to be determined by the Boundary Commissioners under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, this action is incompetent, and it ought therefore to be dismissed, with expenses. (2) The said Catherine Morrison or Hay not having a residential settlement in the parish of Melrose, the defender should be assoilzied, with expenses. (3) The said Catherine Morrison or Hay's residential settlement being within the area transferred to the parish of Galashiels, and the relief and management of the poor in or belonging to the transferred area being now administered by that parish, the defender's parish is not now responsible for her relief, and he should therefore be assoilzied, with expenses.

The Sheriff-substitute (Speirs), on 21st January 1892, dismissed the action as incompetent.

On appeal the Sheriff (Hope), on 19th February 1892, affirmed his Substitute's interlocutor.*

A second action was brought by Galashiels against Melrose for payment of relief afforded after 11th June 1891 to a pauper, John Austin, who was born in the transferred portion of Melrose parish in 1860, and had consequently a birth settlement in that parish. The Sheriffs pronounced similar interlocutors.

The pursuer appealed in both cases, and argued;—1. The case of *Borthwick*¹ was brought under the special provisions of the 50th section of the Local Government Act at the instance of the Boundary Commissioners. This case raised a direct question of patrimonial right between one parish and another, and was one of the most ordinary kind. The Court clearly had jurisdiction, and the case of Borthwick was entirely different. 2. Leaving out of view the decision in Borthwick, it could not be said that an order of the Boundary Commissioners could operate a change in settlements already acquired. It was a pure accident in what parish a pauper became chargeable. It might have been in any parish in Scotland. Here the pauper merely happened to be in what had been part of the parish of Melrose, but now belonged to Galashiels. Residential settlement did not depend upon the part of the parish in which the pauper lived, but arose from a five years' residence within it. The transfer could make no difference until the lapse of the period of non-residence necessary to put an end to the settlement. Similarly, a birth settlement was acquired against a whole parish and not against any particular part of it. It was not disputed that the severed part of Melrose parish was now in Galashiels parish, but the Act could not be made retrospective.

* "NOTE.—I find it impossible in the face of the decision of the Court of Session in the case of Temple v. Borthwick (17th July 1891, 18 Rettie) to do otherwise than affirm the interlocutor appealed against. It was there decided that the Boundary Commissioners are the proper parties to decide the question which was raised, and which is the same as that raised in the present case. I am unable to understand the reasoning of the learned Judges by which their decision was supported, but it would not be becoming in me to say more on that point than that I read the provisions of the Local Government Act to mean that when the debts, liabilities, &c., of parishes have been fixed, the Commissioners have power to make such financial adjustments as may seem equitable in view of the altered circumstances brought about by the transference of a district from one parish to another.

"If it had been open to me to enter into the question of where the settlement of the pauper is, I should have held, as I did in another case before the decision referred to was reported, that the law of settlement has not been in any way altered by the statute, and that the pauper's settlement continues to be in the parish of Melrose. . . ."

Argued for the respondent;—1. Upon the authority of the case of Borthwick, the actions were excluded from the jurisdiction of a Court of law, and the questions were for the Boundary Commissioners to settle. The question presented in the case of Borthwick was a question of settlement, just like the present. Besides, the Court was not an expedient or convenient forum for the trial of such questions. They could more properly be submitted to the Boundary Commissioners under the provisions of the 49th section of the Local Government Act. The Commissioners were empowered by that section to lay down general rules for the adjustment of questions of liability between parishes. 2. It was said upon the merits that the question was one of personal status. But it was a status which was derived from residence in a particular place. The transference to Galashiels included under the 49th section of the Act a transference of all liabilities affecting the transferred area,—at anyrate for the future. Up to the date of the order paupers whose settlement depended upon residence in the transferred area fell to be relieved by Melrose, and after that date by Galashiels. It was only right that Galashiels parish, which now levied the assessments over the transferred area, should also discharge the liabilities thence arising.

LORD PRESIDENT.—These are actions brought by the Parochial Board of Galashiels against the Parochial Board of Melrose to recover monies disbursed, and to establish liability for monies hereafter to be disbursed by the former parish for the maintenance of two paupers, one of whom was born within a portion of Melrose parish, which, by an order of the Boundary Commissioners has been disjoined from Melrose parish and attached to Galashiels—and the other of whom has acquired an industrial settlement in Melrose parish by five years' residence in the same disjoined part prior to the date of disjunction. The Sheriff has dismissed the actions as incompetent, and the first question is whether these are sound judgments. The view of the Sheriff-principal is that the decision of this Division of the Court in July last in the case of Borthwick v. Temple, necessitated a dismissal of the actions, as he entertained the view that the Court had laid it down that a question of this kind cannot be raised in a Court of law but must be decided by the Boundary Commissioners. I think that is an erroneous view of the case of Borthwick; my opinion is that the jurisdiction, and that of the Sheriff Court, are not excluded by any provi-

The case stands thus. The Local Government Act appointed a Boundary Commission for the purpose of squaring and redding up the boundaries of parishes and counties throughout Scotland. That involved an examination of the lie of the land ; of the interests of the several rating authorities in the portions which were proposed to be detached from one parish or county and attached to another, and generally of the social and economic conveniences of the parishes and counties concerned in the land which caused the anomalous boundary. The commissioners are authorised to pronounce orders which are to have the effect of rectifying the boundaries in terms of section 49 of the Act "for all purposes, whether county council, Justices, Sheriff, militia, parochial board, school board, local authority, or other, save as hereinafter provided." It is obvious that such changes might require financial adjustment between the two parishes or other areas, the one of which was losing and the other acquiring the land in question. The portion of land to be disjoined might be so mixed up with the rest of the parish as regards common assets and common liabilities that simply to disjoin might leave a very unjust balance between the parish gaining and the parish losing ; and it requires very slight stretch of imagination to picture cases in which such pecuniary adjustments would be required. The two parishes concerned, therefore, are authorised to make these adjustments for themselves, if they can, and, failing them, the Commissioners have power, after they have made an order as to the boundaries, to follow that up by another order effecting such an adjustment as appears appropriate in each case. All that is a comparatively simple proceeding in point of principle, for it relates entirely to the settlement of details, and it does not involve that the parties or the Commissioners are authorised to determine what are the rights of the two parishes apart from such adjustment. Indeed it is difficult to discover when the Act has said that an order of the Commissioners shall have effect for all purposes, including "parochial board" purposes, that that means that the question of the legal effect of the change is to be handed over to the Commissioners for arbitrary decision. It is said that such a question is excluded from the jurisdiction of Courts of law according to the decision in the case of Borthwick. That decision appears to me to have proceeded upon the very special provisions of the 50th section of the Act. That section imposes upon the Court the duty of answering certain questions of law arising in the course of the work of the Boundary Commissioners and brought before the Court at the instance of the Commissioners. Here we are not considering a special case, and we have not to ascertain whether the position is one in which the Court is authorised and bound to advise the Commissioners. We are dealing with two disputants, the one asserting a right to so much money, and the other denying it. Accordingly I regard the case of Borthwick as a decision solely on the limits of the new jurisdiction conferred on the Court by sec. 50, and I do not accept it, and am not called on to accept it, as applicable to a totally different case.

The case made by the parish of Galashiels is very simple. They say, we have now a piece of Melrose, and one result of that is that we have now to look after the paupers on that piece of ground, but we find that one of these paupers has no settlement in Galashiels because he was born in Melrose and has acquired no settlement by industrial residence for the requisite number of years, or otherwise, in Galashiels. Another is in the same situation, because she has ac-industrial settlement in Melrose and has none in Galashiels. The answer to that is a very singular one. It is said that the words of the 49th section (which purport to be words dealing with the future) carry with them the result that historical facts are to be distorted to this extent that whereas the place where this old woman lived was, in law and in fact, down to 11th June 1891 in the parish of Melrose, she is now to be held, contrary to law and fact, as having all that time lived in Galashiels. In like manner, as regards the birth settlement, this man was born thirty years ago at a place which in law and fact was then in Melrose; the contention is that the result of the Act of 1889 is that he is to be held to have been born in Galashiels. These would be very startling results, and I think it unnecessary, in order to satisfy the language of the requirements of the section, to reach them. The good sense of the thing points to what is, I think, the result of the enactment. The Act changes the poor-law authority for the detached district, but it carries over the district without affecting existing liabilities, and among others the liabilities of the old parish which the individual history of paupers may have created against it.

When the nature of the case is thus looked at, two things seem clear. In the first place, this is a purely legal question relating to the effect of the Local Government Act upon the previous statute law regarding settlement. The case of Borthwick is a decision only on the special question which was submitted by the Boundary Commissioners under the 50th section of the Act, and does not touch the jurisdiction of the Courts of law to determine the effect of the Local Government Act on a patrimonial claim for relief of a pauper raised by one parish against another. In the second place, the case upon the merits presents no difficulty. I read the Local Government Act as affecting settlements only to this extent—that any birth or residence occurring after the date of the order of the Commissioners in a detached portion is to have effect so far as poor-law rights are concerned, according to the new boundaries. I find nothing in the Act which ascribes a retrospective effect to the change, so as to alter the liability in the case of individuals otherwise than it would have been altered had the individuals migrated into the new parish at the date of the order.

I am therefore for recalling the interlocutors of the Sheriffs, and for giving decree in both actions.

LORD ADAM.—There are two actions here with which we have to deal—the more prominent is that involving the case of Mrs Hay who had resided in Galashiels for a continuous period of five years prior to 11th June 1891. On that date an order was issued by the Boundary Commissioners which separated that part of Melrose in which Mrs Hay lived from the rest of that parish and adjudged it to belong in future to Galashiels. On 26th August 1891 Mrs Hay became a proper object of relief in the parish of Galashiels, and that parish, as its duty bound, gave her relief. The object of the present action is to obtain a return of the money so expended. The action is of a most ordinary kind, and is one of which we have constant experience, and I can see no reason why we should not decide a question of the kind raised as it is between these two parochial boards. It is said that we are precluded from entertaining the question by the decision in the case of Borthwick. I agree with your Lordship that this is not so. The case of Borthwick was a very peculiar one, which was not brought by two competing parochial boards, but at the instance of the Boundary Commissioners in the form of a special case inviting the opinion of the Court under the 50th section of the Local Government Act. Whether the Court was right or wrong in the view which was taken of that case, I do not think it has any bearing upon the present. Here there are two litigants, each with a patrimonial interest in the result of the action, and accordingly the present action is clearly differentiated from the decision in the case of Borthwick.

Upon the merits the question is whether the inspector of Galashiels is right in his contention that Melrose is the parish of the pauper's settlement. It is not disputed that prior to 11th June 1891 the pauper had acquired a settlement in Melrose by a residence of upwards of five years. Has she been deprived of the benefit of that settlement, or has she done anything to lose the residential settlement so acquired? All that has happened is that by the order to which I have referred a portion of the parish of Melrose has been detached and is for the future to be treated as part of the parish of Galashiels. The circumstances are not different from what they would have been if this pauper had voluntarily left the parish and had gone to live in another. It was said by Mr Jameson that it is the particular piece of ground on which the pauper lived which must be looked at, and that being so, that it must be held to be part of the parish of Galashiels for all purposes. This is not so. The simple question which we have to consider is where was the residential settlement acquired, and upon the merits of that question I think the inspector of Galashiels is right. I am therefore of the same opinion with your Lordship.

In the other case, where the settlement is a birth settlement, I think the same result must follow.

LORD M'LAREN.—These two actions are of the nature of claims of relief by the inspector of poor of one parish against the inspector of another. The actions are in a form with which we are familiar, and of which there are abundant examples in the reports. The question comes before us for decision in precisely the same way as if the pauper were himself suing for relief, because it is in right of the pauper's claim that the parish which afforded temporary relief comes to the Court asking to have the incidence of the relief shifted to the parish of settlement.

I am not surprised that the Sheriff should have been embarrassed by the opinions in the case of Borthwick v. Temple, but I agree with your Lordships that apart altogether from that case we must decide the question of right when brought before us in a competent form. At the same time I also think that the case of Borthwick, when rightly understood, is in no way inconsistent with the decision which we are going to pronounce. The case of Borthwick was brought under the 50th section of the Local Government Act, which conferred what may be called a consultative jurisdiction upon the Court, and, as we understood the statute, that jurisdiction was confined to questions of law in which the Boundary Commissioners had an interest. The present is a question of fact, not of law, although, no doubt, as in many questions of fact, there is law underlying it. The question of fact is, where has this pauper her settlement? There are, perhaps, some expressions in the opinions of the Judges in the case of Borthwick which go beyond what was necessary for the immediate decision of the case, and I take my full share of responsibility for these. But plainly what was decided there was only this, that in the exercise of this special statutory jurisdiction we did not see our way to deal with a claim relating to the liability for the maintenance of an individual pauper, and still less with the possible consequences which were the subjects of the second and third questions of the case. No. 132.

Coming to the merits of the two actions which we are here considering, I think it is possible to arrive at a satisfactory determination without taking any account of the cognate question where a pauper has resided for the necessary period partly in a detached portion of a parish and partly elsewhere in the parish. Taking first the case of the residential settlement, as the point presents itself to my mind, the woman had acquired an industrial settlement by residing for five years in the parish of Melrose, and consequently she has a claim of relief against that parish. It is of no consequence, so far as that claim of relief is concerned, at what spot within the parish she resided, because the parish is an indivisible area in all questions of settlement, and it is by no means necessary to prove all the various places where the pauper has resided, if only the general fact of an industrial residence within the parish is made out. The law is clear that an industrial settlement once acquired will continue until it is lost by non-residence, or until, as in the case of marriage or forisfiliation, a new settlement has been obtained. Prior, then, to the disjunction of a part of Melrose parish, the pauper had acquired a settlement in that parish, and such a settlement, according to settled principles, must remain until it is lost in the ordinary way. I quite grant that it may be lost by carrying away that part of the parish in which she is living, just as it would be lost by migration to another parish. But time is the important element, and the settlement will not be lost by migration or by the disjunction of the pauper's abode from the parish except by non-residence for the necessary legal period. The cases which have been figured of residence in various parts of the parish do not, therefore, appear to me to affect the case, and I think the birth settlement is really identical with the residential, because it will continue until another settlement has been acquired, and none has been acquired here.

On these grounds, I am of opinion that the claim of the inspector of Galashiels is well founded.

Reparation—Known danger—Landlord and Tenant—Lease.—The tenant of a house raised an action against the landlord to recover damages for injuries sustained by slipping upon an outside stair leading to the house on 9th March 1891. She averred,—"After Whitsunday 1890, when the pursuer entered into possession of the said house, she found that the steps, five in number, from the level of the street up to the outside door, were much worn and in a dangerous condition for her use as a tenant." She further averred that she had complained to the defender's factor of the defect, and that the defender had in the autumn of the same year announced his intention of putting in new steps.

The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant, in respect that the pursuer's statements shewed that knowing the danger she had for ten months continued to occupy the house and to use the steps.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

Observed that if a tenant gives notice to his landlord of a serious defect in his house and the landlord fails within a reasonable time to remedy it, the tenant may leave the house or remain at his own risk.

MRS MAY M'CALL OR WEBSTER was tenant of a house at Garnethill, Glasgow, the property of Alexander Brown, for the year from Whitsunday 1890 to Whitsunday 1891.

On 21st January 1892 Mrs Webster raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Brown, concluding for damages for injury sustained by her falling on an outside stair leading to her house. She averred,—(Cond. 3) “The said house is two stairs up, and is one of four houses which comprise the tenement No. 77 Hill Street foressaid, and the tenants of all the houses in the tenement enter from the street by the same outside door.” (Cond. 4) “After Whitsunday 1890, when the pursuer entered into possession of the said house, she found that the steps, five in number, from the level of the street up to the said outside door, were much worn, and in a dangerous condition for her use as a tenant. Complaints were made among the pursuer and the other tenants as to the condition of the steps and conveyed to the defender, with the result that in the autumn of the same year the defender visited the property and expressed his intention of putting in new steps, which intention he carried out shortly after the date of the accident after mentioned, by putting in new steps, or at least by putting new covers on the old steps; and prior to the said accident the pursuer frequently complained to the defender's factor, J. Campbell Brown, who is a son of the defender and resides with him, as to the dangerous condition of the said steps, requesting him to have them put right.” (Cond. 5) “The steps were originally very steep and narrow from front to back, with a bottelling on the front corner of each step about two inches deep and protruding about two inches to increase their width. The steps were of soft sandstone, and being exposed to the weather were, by the passenger traffic, worn on the fronts of their upper surfaces, for a width of two or three feet up the centre of the entrance, to such an extent that the bottelling had disappeared, and the steps presented the appearance of a sloping declivity. It was thus very difficult, especially in going down, to avoid falling.”

The pursuer then stated that on 9th March 1891, as she was leaving her house, her foot slipped on the first step from the top, and that she fell and received serious injuries through the fault or negligence of the defender in not putting and maintaining the said steps in a good and safe condition for the use of the pursuer as a tenant.

She pleaded ;—(2) The defender, being proprietor of the house of which the pursuer was the tenant, was bound to put and keep the house in good tenantable condition and repair, including a good and safe mode of access thereto, and he having failed to keep the steps, which were the only mode of access thereto, in a good and safe condition for her use as a tenant, is liable for the loss and injuries the pursuer has thereby suffered, and decree should be granted as craved, with expenses. (3) The pursuer having sustained permanent injuries by the failure of the defender to provide and maintain the said steps in a good and safe condition for her use as a tenant, though informed and well aware of their condition, the defender is bound to compensate her for the loss and injuries she has thereby sustained, and decree should be granted as craved, with expenses.

The defender denied fault.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) having allowed a proof, the pursuer appealed for jury trial, and proposed an issue.

In the Court of Session the defender added a plea to the relevancy.

Argued for the defender ;—The pursuer's averments shewed that she was well aware of the condition of the steps for a long time prior to the accident. She stated that she found the defect to exist "after Whit-sunday 1890, when the pursuer entered into possession of the said house." No. 133.

 The remedy of a tenant who found that the subjects let to him were in a dangerous state was to leave the house and take another at the landlord's expense, not to remain and sue the landlord for damages.¹ That this was on the pursuer's case a very serious defect was clear, for she said that the steps formed a sloping declivity. In Fulton's case, where there was much similarity on the facts to the present, the person using the stair was not a tenant. He was a third party on the premises by invitation of the owner.² May 12, 1892.
Webster v. Brown.

Argued for the pursuer;—It did not seem to be disputed that the defender would have been liable to one of the public. In a question with his tenant he was bound to provide a house with a safe access, and was responsible in damages for the result of having failed to do so. It was said that the pursuer could have left the house. That was a question depending on the importance of the defect, and the difficulty of removing it. The pursuer, according to her averments, had complained to the defender's factor, and expected the defender to fulfil his promise to remedy the defect, and therefore was not bound to leave the house.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer states her case on the footing that she was tenant of a house for nine months, and that after she had entered upon a new term, and in the tenth month of her tenancy, an accident occurred to her on account of the defective state of the stairs leading from the street to the outside door of her house. It is not alleged that between the date on which she entered into possession and the date on which the accident happened any change had taken place in the state of the stairs. Thus for nine months she had continued to use them. If a person becomes tenant of a house, and if defects in the house or its approaches become known to him, there are two courses open to him—(1) he can remain in the house, which implies that he considers the defects trifling, and is willing to overlook them; or (2) he can give the landlord notice to have the defects remedied, and if the landlord does not make the necessary alterations within a reasonable time he can leave the house. I do not suggest that the tenant in discovering the defects should instantly leave the house and charge the landlord with the expense of acquiring a new tenancy; but he is bound within a reasonable time to bring the matter under the notice of the landlord, and, upon getting no remedy, to leave the house, or remain at his own risk. But in this case the pursuer has occupied this house for many months, and during the whole of that time she has known the defective state of the stairs.

In the circumstances I must hold that there is here no relevant case stated for the pursuer.

LORD YOUNG and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I also agree. I think the pursuer's averments in condescendence put her out of Court. She there avers,—“When the pursuer entered into possession of the said house she found that the steps, five in number, from the level of the steps up to the said outside door, were much worn, and in a

I think, therefore, she acted in face of a known danger, and must take the consequences. It is the duty of a tenant who discovers a serious defect in the condition of the house when he enters into possession immediately to give notice of the defect to the landlord, and insist on its being repaired, and if the landlord fails to repair the defect within a reasonable time, the tenant may leave the house. If, however, the tenant does not do so, but continues, notwithstanding the defect, to occupy the house, the tenant must just take the consequences.

Succession—Incidence of burden—Proof—Testament—Extrinsic evidence.—J. S. in 1879 executed a settlement in which he conveyed to trustees his whole heritable and moveable estates with this direction,—"After payment of all my just and lawful debts . . . my said trustees shall pay and make over to" his sister-in-law Mrs B., wife of W. B., in liferent, and her children in fee, one-half of the residue of his estate, and to his brothers and sisters the other half of the residue.

On 4th January 1881 J. S. executed a bond over his house and grounds of L. for £4000 in favour of the firm of W. B. & Company to whom he was owing £10,000, and the bond was recorded.

By a codicil dated in 1889 the testator conveyed to Mrs B., the widow of W. B., in liferent, and to J. B., their daughter in fee, his house and grounds of L. as occupied by him, with the household furniture, silver plate, and other moveables therein, stating that he revoked the settlement "only in so far as it conveys generally the said dwelling-house," &c., "hereby confirming the same in all other particulars."

After the death of J. S., Mrs B. and her daughter raised against the trustees an action for declarator that the bequest of the house and grounds was not burdened with the debt contained in the bond, and that the trustees were bound to pay it out of the deceased's other estate on the grounds (1) that the settlement and codicil implied a direction that the debt in the bond should be paid out of the general estate exclusive of the subjects conveyed by the codicil, and (2) separatim, that the settlement and codicil were to be construed under reference to the facts of the case, and that so construed they implied this direction.

In support of the latter plea the pursuers averred that at the date of the bond J. S. was owing to the firm of W. B. & Company a debt of £10,000, and that being then apprehensive that his affairs might become embarrassed he voluntarily offered the security to these creditors, and asked them to send to his agent authority to record the bond; that this authority was given, and the bond recorded, but that he retained the bond in his own possession; that he never intended the bond to be acted upon, except in the event of his bankruptcy, and that subsequently, when his affairs became prosperous, he destroyed the bond; that his house and grounds were never worth more than £4000, and that at the date of the codicil and at the date of his death they were not worth more than £3000, and that that being less than the amount of the bond, their bequest would be of no value, which could not be presumed to have been the trustee's intention.

Held that the pursuers' averments were not relevant, and action dismissed.

DR JOHN SCOTT, of Langshaw, Moffat, died on 22d July 1890, unmarried. He left a settlement dated 26th August 1879, and a codicil thereto dated 6th August 1889. No. 134.

By the settlement Dr Scott conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to William Brand and others as trustees. He directed the trustees (who were also nominated executors), "after payment of all my just and lawful debts," to make over one-half of the residue of the trust-estate to Janet Carruthers or Brand, his sister-in-law, wife of William Brand, in liferent for her liferent allanarly, and to her daughter Jane Ann Scott Brand, and other children in fee, according to certain proportions, and to make over the other half of residue to his sister Isabella Scott, and his half-brother Samuel Kennedy, and other half-brothers, equally among them. 2D DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

By the codicil, Dr Scott conveyed to Janet Carruthers or Brand, in liferent allanarly, and to Jane Ann Scott Brand, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever in fee, his house and grounds of Langshaw, "all as now occupied by me, . . . together with the whole household furniture, silver plate, and other moveables in the said dwelling-house; and I hereby revoke the said settlement only in so far as the same conveys generally the said dwelling-house," &c., "hereby confirming the same in all other particulars."

At Dr Scott's death there existed over Langshaw a bond and disposition in security in favour of William Brand, as trustee for his firm of W. & H. Brand & Company, for the sum of £4000. This bond was recorded on behalf of William Brand, as trustee, on 5th January 1881.

At the death of Dr Scott he was indebted to William Brand's firm in a sum of about £9097. His trustees paid up to the firm that amount, receiving a discharge for the debt, and an assignation to the bond for £4000, to enable them to operate their relief so far as competent.

On 15th December 1891 Mrs Brand and Jane Ann Scott Brand raised an action against Dr Scott's trustees for declarator "that under and in virtue of the said settlement and relative codicils of the said Dr John Scott, particularly a codicil dated 6th August 1889, the pursuers, for their respective rights of liferent and fee as therein provided, obtained a valid and effectual bequest, and are now in right, of" Langshaw, "and that the bequest of the said dwelling-house and lands in their favour is not burdened with the debt contained in" the bond above mentioned, or with said bond itself; but it should be found "that the pursuers are entitled to hold and possess the said lands free and disencumbered of the said bond and of the debt, and that the defenders, as trustees foresaid, are bound to deduct the said sum of £4000, being the amount of said bond, together with interest . . . from the moveable estate of the deceased," and that before dividing the residue among the parties entitled thereto; or otherwise, the defenders should be ordained "to free and relieve the pursuers and the said house and others of the said bond, and the debt therein contained, and to charge the same against the general estate of the said deceased; and in any event, the defender should be ordained to execute in favour of the pursuers a valid discharge of the said bond and disposition in security at the pursuers' expense."

The pursuers stated that at the time at which Dr Scott executed the settlement he was proprietor of a sugar plantation in Demerara, which W. & H. Brand & Company managed for him, and that they had made advances for him to a large amount. "In consequence of the depressed state of the sugar market these advances continued to increase until, on 4th January 1881, they amounted with periodical interest at five per cent, which was annually charged against Dr Scott, to the sum of £11,764, 2s. 7d. Dr Scott was about that date apprehensive that, in the event of the sugar plantation in question continuing to cause him loss, his affairs might become embarrassed, and was anxious that Messrs W. & H. Brand & Company, who were his largest creditors, and had throughout shewn him the utmost consideration as regards the debt due to them, should be protected to some extent against his possible bankruptcy. He accordingly, at his own instance, caused his agent Mr Tait, Moffat, to prepare a bond and disposition in security over his estate at Langshaw to the amount of £4000, and on 11th December 1880 he wrote to William Brand, senior partner of the said firm, as follows:—‘My dear Brand,—I have requested Mr Tait to make out a bond, giving you a lien on Langshaw for four thousand pounds (£4000). As the document will have to be registered in Edinburgh, I think you had better write Mr Tait, authorising him to do so. This falls far short of your claim upon Zeelugt, but you may rely upon me doing everything in my power to protect your interests. JOHN SCOTT.’ Mr Brand sent the authority asked for in said letter, and the bond was recorded by Mr Tait on 5th January 1881.” (Cond. 5) “At the time said bond was executed it was not intended by the parties that it should ever be acted upon, except in the event of Dr Scott’s bankruptcy. Accordingly the bond was never delivered to the creditors therein, but was retained by Dr Scott in his repositories. At his death a careful search was made, but the bond was not amongst the papers of the deceased, and the pursuers believe and aver that it was intentionally destroyed by the deceased after his affairs had become more prosperous, in the belief that by so destroying it the bond would cease to be operative. . . . In the year 1885 the testator sold the sugar plantation, and so relieved himself of what had been a constant source of loss and anxiety. From that time onwards his affairs were not subject to any serious fluctuation, his estate being securely invested, and his own expenditure being considerably less than the income which he regularly received. . . .” (Cond. 6) “At or about the time when the bond in question was written out, Dr Scott also placed certain other securities, intended by him to protect the said firm of W. & H. Brand & Company in the event of his bankruptcy, in a canister which he kept in the Bank of Scotland at Moffat. At his death there was found a memorandum in the following terms:—‘(Private) Your bond on Langshaw has been registered, and I have enclosed some railway scrip in an envelope addressed to you, saying you hold it as security for your advances on Zeelugt. Should anything happen to me, you will find these documents in a canister in the safe of the bank of Scotland. JOHN SCOTT.’ This memorandum, which is holograph of the testator, was enclosed in an envelope, and addressed in his handwriting, ‘Wm. Brand, Esq.,’ amongst whose papers it was found after his death. None of the documents mentioned in said memorandum were found in the canister kept by the testator at said bank, or in his repositories, and as already stated, the probability is that he destroyed the bond after the purpose for which it had been made out at the testator’s request had been in his view served.”

The pursuers further stated that in 1882 Dr Scott contemplated selling Langshaw in order to pay off the debt to Brand & Company, but was dissuaded by Mr William Brand, but that in and after 1885, having been assured that there was no danger of his creditors in Demerara endeavouring to make a claim on Langshaw he determined to retain it; that Langshaw was at the date of the codicil, as well as at the date of Dr Scott’s death worth not more than £3000; that they (the pursuers) were on affectionate terms with him; that he knowing them to be attached to the place, and wishing that it should be the permanent home of some members of the

No. 134. The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The action was irrelevant. The pursuers' pleas were clearly unsound in requiring the settlement to be construed by the extraneous facts they wished to prove. It was irrelevant to say that the bond had been destroyed by Dr Scott. It was a recorded deed. Not only the bond but the debt subsisted. It was not alleged that Dr Scott put the value of Langshaw at less than £4000. There was no instance in which such a parole proof had been granted. *Glendonwyn v. Gordon*¹ was appealed to. But there no such parole proof was said to be competent; Lord Colonsay, whose opinion went furthest in that direction, only referred to "formal deeds" subsequent to the settlement, as throwing light upon it. The alleged ambiguity about debts occurred in every settlement.

Brand v.
Scott's Trustees.

the personal estate with an heritable debt; but it was laid down that the indications of the testator's intention to that effect must be of an unmistakable kind. On that point the Lord President says,—'I am not disposed to extract from these authorities so strict a rule as this, that nothing but an express statement or declaration by a testator that one heir or executor shall relieve another heir of the burden affecting the subject bequeathed to him is necessary; but I do think we gather from them this conclusion, that nothing but an indication so strong as to be equivalent in effect to an express declaration will be sufficient to justify such a result.'

"Taking the rule to be as thus expressed, the question is whether there are sufficient grounds for departing from it in the present case.

"It is not said that there is any testamentary or written expression of Dr Scott's desire to that effect. The pursuers seek to infer Dr Scott's intention from the facts and circumstances which they aver. They are certainly extremely peculiar and special. It is averred that Dr Scott became indebted to his relatives, the Messrs Brand, and was anxious to give them some security for their debt. Accordingly in 1881 he ultroneously granted them a bond and disposition in security for £4000 over his property, consisting of the house in which he lived, and the grounds around it. His debt to Messrs Brand considerably exceeded £4000, but that was apparently the full value of Langshaw. The bond was registered in the Register of Sasines, but it was never, except by this registration, delivered to the creditors. It was retained by Dr Scott, and has now disappeared altogether. Dr Scott's circumstances improved after he granted the bond, and his estate became amply sufficient to pay the advances of his relatives without taking Langshaw into account.

"The pursuers further aver that at the date of the codicil the lands of Langshaw were of less value than £4000, so that the bequest of it by the codicil was of no value at all unless it were relieved of the heritable bond.

"These averments do not seem very seriously disputed by the defenders; but if these had been all the averments, I could not have considered them relevant. I should not have felt warranted in inferring from these facts only, either that Dr Scott did in fact destroy the bond, or that he did so with the intention and in the belief that it would thereby be rendered inoperative as a burden on Langshaw.

"But then the pursuers have averred that the bond 'was intentionally destroyed by the deceased, after his affairs had become more prosperous, in the belief that by so destroying it the bond would cease to be operative.'

"If the pursuers should prove that averment in all its particulars so as to place it beyond the region of conjecture, and should also prove the other averments, I am not at present prepared to say what the result might be.

"I am therefore not prepared to throw out the action as irrelevant; but I have thought it desirable to indicate what appears to be the clear requirement of the law on the question, because it would be regrettable if the pursuers should incur the cost of a proof, and should in the end have no more than conjecture to offer in support of the averment to which I have specially adverted.

¹ Glendonwyn v. Gordon, July 20, 1870, 8 Macph. 1075, 42 Scot. Jur. 63; affirmed May 19, 1873, 11 Macph. (H. L.) 33, 45 Scot. Jur. 183.

Argued for the pursuers;—A proof should be allowed. The first purpose of the settlement was to pay “debts.” There was latent ambiguity in the phrase in the circumstances. The proof would construe the term “debts” in this settlement. There were three things to be proved which were important to the decision. First, the bond was granted ultroneously to Mr Brand by Dr Scott. Second, the value of Langshaw was less than the bond. He intended to give the pursuers a valuable gift, and it was unreasonable to suppose that he meant them to take Langshaw with a burden larger than its value. Thirdly, the bond had disappeared in Dr Scott’s hands under circumstances pointing to intentional destruction. Such evidence as these three points afforded was competent, for, in the words of Lord Colonsay in Glendonwyn v. Gordon (supra), the Court could “take into consideration circumstances calculated to throw light on the intention of the testator, whether found within the deed or collected from external sources.” The Court, in order to get into the position of the testator, must consider the value of his estate. The Court did so every day.

Brand v.
Scott’s Trustees.

LORD YOUNG.—Before the debate I had read the record and the note of the Lord Ordinary, and I have carefully attended to the argument. The facts stated lie in small compass. The testator Dr Scott died in 1890 leaving property worth about £10,000 or £12,000. Part of it consisted of the villa of Langshaw. It appears from the statements on record also that he was engaged in some West Indian sugar transactions along with Mr Brand, and got into debt to him to an extent which, in 1880, he was unable to meet. Being desirous that Mr Brand should be secure from loss, he, with the advice of Mr Tait, of his own accord, executed a bond and disposition in security over Langshaw for £4000, and informed Brand (who seems not to have been asking any security but to have been quite satisfied) that he had done so, and authorised him to get Mr Tait to record it. That was done in 1881. It is not disputed that thereby a document of debt was created in Brand’s favour, and that Langshaw was burdened with this debt. Now, Dr Scott made his will in 1879, and by it he conveyed his estate to trustees, with directions, in the first place, in the usual form which we so often meet with, “to pay debts,” and with directions also to divide his property into two parts, one part of which was to go to Dr Scott’s brothers and sisters, the other to his sisters-in-law.

In 1889 Dr Scott executed a codicil conveying Langshaw to his sisters-in-law in liferent and their children in fee. It is not disputed that at that date the debt for £4000 was a subsisting debt, and that Langshaw was burdened with it. Dr Scott having, as I already mentioned, died in 1890, the question is whether Langshaw is not still burdened with it. The first conclusion of the summons seeks to declare that the bequest of Langshaw to the pursuers is valid and effectual, and is not burdened with the debt, and that is supported on the ground that the testator’s intention was to leave it free of the debt. It is further concluded that, to that end, this property (Langshaw) ought to be relieved out of the rest of the estate. It is admitted that this conclusion is contrary to the ordinary rule of law. The bond subsisted. The debt subsisted. A direction to trustees to pay debts in words such as we have here does not extend so as to authorise them to pay out of the general estate debt secured on a particular subject specially conveyed to beneficiaries. And the pursuers admit this general rule, but say that they have averred facts and circumstances which are relevant to make the case exceptional, and to avoid the rule, and lead us to the conclusion that Langshaw is to be free of the debt. What are these facts? The first is, that the bond was granted ultroneously when the creditor was making no demand. The second is, that Langshaw was not worth £4000, and that at the date of the codicil, as well as at the date of Dr Scott's death, it was not worth more than £3000, whereas the bond was for £4000. The third and only other fact is that the original bond has disappeared, and disappeared in such circumstances as to make it the reasonable conclusion as to its disappearance that Dr Scott himself destroyed it on purpose.

No. 134.

 Brand v.
 Scott's Trustees.

These then are the specialties on which proof is desired that the rule may be avoided. I think that if these facts were established never so clearly they would not avoid the rule. Take the fact I stated first—that the bond was ultroneously granted. Dr Scott wrote to Mr Brand making him aware of it, and it was by Dr Scott's instructions recorded by Mr Tait, which was equivalent to delivery. I think the whole details as to this are summed up in saying that the debt subsisted and the property remained burdened. The second fact, that the property was worth much less than the bond, is legally immaterial. We are all quite alive to the good sense of the remark that Dr Scott intended the pursuers to get some benefit from the codicil giving them Langshaw, whereas they get none unless this debt is paid off by the trustees out of the rest of the estate. But there is no authority and no principle for giving such effect to that consideration as to make the trustees pay off this heritable debt out of the other funds of the trust. I put it to the pursuers' counsel, Is the value to be regarded as at the date of the will or codicil, or at any other period? He said at the death of Dr Scott, and that leads to this result, that the interpretation of a direction to the effect that the rule is to be departed from may depend upon the rise or fall in the value of the property up to the date of the death. The rule is that the beneficiary shall take the subject burdened as it is, largely, lightly, or not at all, and we cannot entertain the suggestion of the pursuers. After the date of his will a testator may pay off, or reduce, or increase the burden, and it would be very singular that if the debt were half the value, or any other sum less than the whole the beneficiary must bear it, but if it had become greater than the value, then the residue must pay it. There is no authority and no reason for that.

The only other thing relied on is the disappearance of the bond. It is said to be probable that Dr Scott destroyed it, and that though that has no effect as between creditor and debtor, and though the debt subsists and the property is burdened yet, as between the heirs of Dr Scott, that is a direction to the trustees to pay the amount of it out of the general estate. Now, I think it likely enough that Dr Scott looked upon this bond as a mere money debt. Many people do so and in the law of England such debts so secured are so regarded. But while I am quite willing to assume that he did not understand that those taking Langshaw would have to bear the whole debt on Langshaw, but supposed that those taking his money would have to bear part of it, I cannot give any effect to that assumption without violating the firm rules of law.

I am therefore of opinion that no facts have been averred to make this an exceptional case, and that the interlocutor allowing a proof should be recalled. In this I do not think I am differing from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary on the legal question, for he gives none to the contrary of what I have said. He says only that if the pursuers prove their whole averments he is not prepared to say what the result might be. I think even proof of the intentional destrution of the bond would not avail the pursuers, and that it would be idle to allow them a proof. No. 134.

Reid v. Coyle.

Reparation—Issue—Slander—Privilege.—A midwife raised an action of damages for alleged slander against a doctor, averring that she had been called to attend a woman (Mrs Moore) in labour, that she had given her a certain drug which was the proper treatment, that the defender having been called in to see the woman, "he, without so much as inquiring at the pursuer what the drug was, or what dose had been given, and conceiving that it would be a favourable opportunity for indulging his hostile and malicious feelings towards her, falsely, wickedly, calumniously, and maliciously stated to Mrs Moore's husband, the said Stephen Moore, that the pursuer had poisoned his wife." Further, she averred that this statement was made "in a malicious spirit, with a view of injuring the pursuer in the practice of her art as a midwife."

She proposed an issue whether the defender "falsely and calumniously" stated that the pursuer had poisoned the patient. The defender maintained that malice and want of probable cause ought to be put in issue.

The Court refused to insert malice and want of probable cause in the issue, on the ground that the pursuer's statements did not necessarily disclose a case of privilege, and that if a case of privilege arose at the trial it was in the power of the presiding Judge to direct the jury accordingly.

ELIZABETH M'CONNON OR REID, residing at Whiteinch, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Edward Coyle, Licentiate of the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons, Glasgow, and practising at Partick, to recover damages for alleged slander. 2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

The pursuer stated that she was a qualified midwife in extensive practice; that on 12th October 1891 she had been called to attend a Mrs Moore at Whiteinch, who was in premature labour, and that she administered to her half a teaspoonful of ergot of rye, which was proper treatment,—(Cond. 6) "The pursuer believes and avers that Mrs Moore's illness continued, and that the defender was called to see her on Wednesday, 14th October 1891, and, on hearing that the pursuer had given her a drug to soothe her pains, he, without so much as inquiring at the pursuer what the drug was, or what dose had been given, and conceiving that it would be a favourable opportunity for indulging his hostile and malicious feelings towards her, falsely, wickedly, calumniously, and maliciously stated to Mrs Moore's husband, the said Stephen Moore, that the pursuer had poisoned his wife. This statement was made in the said Stephen Moore's house at 42 Smith Street, Whiteinch, and was made in a malicious spirit, with the view of injuring the pursuer in the practice of her art as a midwife."

The pursuer also set forth further statements alleged to have been uttered to Stephen Moore, and also to a detective-officer.

The Sheriff (Spens) having allowed a proof, the pursuer appealed for jury trial. She proposed, inter alia, the following issue:—"1. Whether, on or about 14th October 1891, in the house 42 Smith Street, Whiteinch, occupied by Stephen Moore, the defender falsely and calumniously stated to the said Stephen Moore that the pursuer had poisoned his wife, Mrs

No. 135. Agnes Moore, or used words to a like effect, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

May 13, 1892.
Reid v. Coyle.

The defender argued;—There was here a case of absolute privilege, and no issue should be allowed. A doctor making such a statement as the result of an inquiry in the course of his duty as to his patient's symptoms was absolutely privileged. [LORD YOUNG.—Not so, if, as the pursuer says was the case, the doctor made the statement "maliciously" and "for the purpose of indulging hostile and malicious feelings."] It was not said the words were spoken without inquiry of anyone, only that they were spoken without inquiry of the pursuer. At all events, malice and want of probable cause must be put in issue. The doctor had a duty to inquire and to state his opinion, and was not responsible in damages, unless he spoke maliciously and without probable cause.¹ It was not only persons acting in a public capacity to whom this rule applied. It was enough that there was a duty.² At all events a prima facie case of privilege was set forth, and therefore the issue proposed could not be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—To use an expression used by one of your Lordships, I think it is not "to demonstration plain" at this stage that this is a case of privilege. I think it very highly probable that it will be the duty of the Judge who tries the case to direct the jury that the evidence submitted by the pursuer raises a case of privilege, and if so, that they must be satisfied that the evidence shews that the defender was actuated by malice. But that point is not at this stage absolutely plain, and it would be the better course to leave the issues as they stand.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. I do not think either party is greatly interested in the insertion or non-insertion of malice in the issue. Even when it is in the issue a Judge may direct the jury, that from the nature of the allegation and the circumstances and the absence of justification, they are entitled to assume it. Again, if it is not in the issue, a Judge may tell the jury that malice is not to be implied from the mere fact that the defender made a particular statement, and that it must be proved to their satisfaction that malice existed.

It seems probable that this case will present a question of the latter sort at the trial. If a doctor is called to attend a patient, and is led to ask who attended, and being told "A B did so, and gave some drug," says, "that woman has poisoned the patient," I do not imagine that anyone will say that malice is to be presumed in that. I think it better to say that it is not clear to demonstration at present that we have a case of privilege, but I think it will prove to be so at the trial.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—In this case I think it is safe to leave any question of privilege intact. It may arise at the trial.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. The leaning of my own mind was that the case on record is one of privilege, and that malice should be put in the issue. But I do not dissent, for the defender cannot suffer from the non-insertion of malice, and if a case of privilege arises, the presiding Judge will tell the jury that unless there was malice there cannot be a verdict for the pursuer.

THE COURT approved of the pursuer's issue.

Observations (per Lord M'Laren) on M'Nish v. Donald's Trustees, Oct. 25, 1879, 7 R. 96.

WILLIAM M'CULLOCH, grocer and wine-merchant, Glasgow, died in 1ST DIVISION. 1880, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated in 1873.

That deed contained this provision in regard to the residue of the estate:—"And, in the last place, my trustees shall hold, apply, pay, and convey the whole rest, residue, and remainder of my means and estate, and the interest and produce thereof, equally to and for behoof of my brothers and sisters who may survive me, jointly, with the lawful issue of any of them who may have predeceased me leaving issue, the division being per stirpes: Declaring that the right and interest of my youngest sister Isabella M'Culloch, presently residing at Brodick, Island of Arran, in the share original or accreting falling to her of my means and estate shall be, and is hereby restricted to, an alimentary liferent of said share, not affectable by the debts or deeds of herself or of any husband she may marry, or attachable by the diligence of her or his creditors, and the fee of the said share shall be held and applied for behoof of the lawful child or children of the said Isabella M'Culloch, equally among them if more than one, whom failing, for behoof of my brothers and sisters who may be surviving at the date of her decease, jointly with the lawful issue of such of them as may have deceased leaving issue, the division being per stirpes."

The testator executed this holograph codicil, dated 27th May 1876:—"I hereby revoke and cancel all share that my brother Richard would have been entitled to from my last will (as prepared by Mr Cowan); . . . I leave that share (that my brother Richard would have got had he conducted himself towards me with anything like a brotherly feeling, of which, I am sorry to have to say, he is totally wanting, . . .) to his family (James, Agnes, and Gartshore), to be equally divided, under direction of my trustees (their father to have no say in the matter), James and Gartshore to get their share in full when they arrive at twenty-eight years of age, and Agnes to have her share vested in my business, property, or whatever security the trustees may think proper, so that she will only receive the interest on her share, and this interest is not to be given to her till she is eighteen years of age; should she die without lawful issue, her share to go back to my brothers and sisters (always exclusive of my brother Richard); should I die before James and Gartshore are twenty-eight years of age, the trustees to have full power to give their share to them in part or whole as they (the trustees) may deem proper."

The testator was survived by his brothers Richard and Alexander, by a sister, Isabella, by the children of a deceased sister, Mrs Taylor, and by the children of his brother Richard.

No. 136. Owing to the death of the testator's sister Isabella, then Mrs Dunn, without issue, on 27th January 1890, the share of the estate liferented by her, amounting to about £2700, fell to be distributed in accordance with the terms of the settlement and codicil.

Questions having arisen in regard to the rights thereto, a special case was brought by (1) the testator's trustees; (2) Richard M'Culloch's three children; and (3) the other beneficiaries interested in the residue, viz., the testator's brother Alexander, and the children of a deceased sister Mrs Taylor.

The second parties maintained that they had a right to one-third of the share of residue liferented by Mrs Dunn, and the third parties maintained that the whole fell to be paid to them.

The questions were:—“(2) Are the second parties entitled to one-third of said share? (3) Are the third parties entitled to payment of the whole share of residue liferented by the late Mrs Dunn?”

Argued for the third parties;—The codicil substituted Richard's children only to the effect of taking their father's original share. They were not entitled to participate in the share which accrued to him through the death of Mrs Dunn. The substitution of issue in the trust-settlement could not include the issue of a disinherited brother. If that had been intended, it would have been so stated at anyrate in the codicil. The words “share” as used in the codicil meant original share, and could not extend to the accreting share.¹

Argued for the second parties;—The true reading of the codicil was that the testator intended that Richard's children should represent their father, and accordingly that they took his accruing share.² The language of the deeds here was different from that in M'Nish's case. There there was an initial gift to a beneficiary who failed, but here the children took as immediate beneficiaries.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is, what is the meaning of the words “that share” contained in the codicil dated 27th May 1876? Does the share include the accresced fund,—that is, the portion of the share which lapsed by the decease of Isabella M'Culloch? or is it confined to the original share of the residue which fell to Richard M'Culloch? I cannot think that this is left in doubt by the testator, or that we require to analyse the decisions which have been cited in support of the two contentions. The catena of the language used by the testator in the settlement and in the codicil is close and clear. The words “that share (that my brother Richard would have got)” relate to the words in the initial part of the codicil “I hereby revoke all share that my brother Richard would have been entitled to.” I think these words are of such extension as to have an effect equivalent to that of the words which were the subject of decision in Laing v. Barclay,—in short, that they mean everything that Richard would have taken as the result of the will.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—In this case apparently there is no doubt as to the true meaning and construction of the residuary clause in the original will, but the question is as to the extent and effect of the direction given in the codicil. The codicil is evidently prepared by the testator himself, and while sufficiently clear is not quite accurate in its language. It begins, “I hereby revoke and cancel all share that my brother Richard would have been entitled to from my last will," and I take that to mean "I revoke and cancel all provisions under which my brother Richard takes any share of my estate." The words "all share" are sufficiently comprehensive in my view to include every right and interest arising to Richard under the will. Accordingly, when the testator goes on to say that he does not wish the children to suffer by the fault of their father, and proceeds to leave them that "share which my brother Richard would have got," it is obvious that he has given to them precisely what he has previously taken from their father by the words of revocation.

The argument addressed to us was founded upon a distinction to be taken between the language of the destination in the will and the language in the codicil. It was said that the testator when he meant to deal with interests in his estate arising by accretion took care to say that these interests were included, and it is quite true that in the will, which is drawn by a lawyer, when he is dealing with the event of one of his brothers dying and leaving issue, he does say that the issue shall take the share "original or accrescing" which the parent would have taken. These words "original or accrescing" are properly introduced for the purpose of making clear what might otherwise have been in question, viz, whether accrescing shares were intended to be included. But it does not appear to me that there was any necessity for repeating these words in the codicil. Besides, it is announced at the outset of the codicil that what the testator is there proposing to deal with is all right and interest—so I interpret the words—that Richard would have taken under the will.

I should like to add, as the case of M'Nish has been referred to, that I should not be disposed to assent to the proposition that there is any artificial rule of construction which obliges us to hold where a residue is disposed of among different members of a family that the children of one of the residuary legatees who may die leaving issue are cut out from what their parent would have taken by accretion. In some cases that might come to be a very large interest, because it might be that in a family of five or six all had died except one—one only of those who had died leaving issue,—and to apply the doctrine that issue take only their parents' original share in such a case would reduce their interest to a fraction of what the testator really intended them to receive. When the case of M'Nish—which was cited as the strongest authority in support of that artificial rule—comes to be examined, it is seen that in that case the testator had begun by expressly giving over the interest of such of the legatees as might die without issue to the survivors, and so he dealt completely and exhaustively with accrescing shares. Consequently, when the testator goes on to say what is to be the benefit taken by the children of a predeceasing child, one must look to what he has already done in dealing with interests arising by accretion, and put such a construction upon the word "share" as will be consistent with what the testator has already announced. But I do not think that a decision on the terms of a will so expressed would be a decision to the effect that, irrespective of the language there used, the Court is to be hampered by a general rule that all gifts in favour of issue are to be strictly construed, and, if possible, cut down, I do not think the Court ever intended to lay down any rule adverse to the rights of the children of a predeceasing member of a family to whom a residuary bequest has been made, whose claims on the testator are precisely of the same nature as are those of other members of the family.

These observations are perhaps not necessary to the decision of the present case, but as the case of M'Nish was commented upon, I think it right to say

No. 136. that the question, although supposed to be concluded by authority, is one which I think must remain for subsequent consideration when a case properly raising it shall arise.

ROBERT BROWN, Respondent.—Jameson—M'Lennan.

Lease—Compensation—Sufficiency of notice to landlord—Reference—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 62), sec. 7, and Schedule, part iii.—The 7th section of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, enacted that a tenant claiming compensation for improvements under that Act should give notice in writing "of his intention to make a claim" at least four months before the termination of his tenancy, and that every such notice should state "so far as reasonably may be, the particulars and amount of the intended claim."

Opinions that the notice should contain specific information as to the various items, e.g., the quantity, nature, quality, and date of application of manure, claimed as improvements within the schedule to the Act, such as will enable the landlord to judge whether he will entertain it or not.

Terms of a notice of claim, which in the opinion of the Court was insufficient.

Lease—Compensation—Reference—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 20), sec. 2, subsec. 3.—The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 2, subsec. 3, enacted,—"If at the determination of the tenancy the parties shall not have appointed a referee, then on the application of either party the Sheriff shall within fourteen days appoint a competent and impartial person to be referee."

A petition for the appointment of a referee was presented to a Sheriff on 27th July in vacation, and answers were lodged. At the first vacation Court, held on 18th August, the petitioner moved to have the appointment made. The Sheriff dismissed the petition, on the ground that appointment could only be made within fourteen days of the presentation of the application. The petitioner presented a second petition. Held that a second application for an appointment was not incompetent.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

ROBERT BROWN was tenant of the farm of Upper Downreay, belonging to Sir Robert Charles Sinclair, Bart. of Murkle and Stevenson, under a lease for twenty-three years from Whitsunday 1879. There was a break at Whitsunday 1891, of which Sir Robert duly intimated to Brown that he was to take advantage.

On 13th January 1891 Brown sent the following notice of claim under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, to Sir Robert's factor,—"Dear Sir,—I hereby give notice, in terms of Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, that I propose making the following claim:—First. The sum of £237, 12s. 1d. for unexhausted value of manure, artificial, as applied to holding. Secondly, The sum of £217, 17s. 6d. for unexhausted value residue of cake, corn, and other feeding stuffs consumed on the holding by cattle, sheep, and pigs. Thirdly, For general improvements of the farm during the currency of the tenancy, the sum of £500."

On 27th July 1891 Brown presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Wick under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Acts, 1883 and 1889, for appointment of a referee under the notice of claim.

In his defences to that petition, which were lodged on 10th August, No. 137. Sir Robert Sinclair, inter alia, stated that "he has all along been willing to concur in the appointment of a referee or referees to deal with the first two items in the respondent's claim," and his sole pleas in law on the merits were to the effect that the third item of the respondent's claim was barred on the ground of insufficient specification in the notice of claim, and that the appointment of a referee must be limited to the first two items in the said notice of claim.

May 17, 1892.
Sinclair v.
Brown.

The Sheriff Court of Caithness being then in vacation, there was no opportunity of moving in the petition until the first vacation Court day on 18th August, when the Sheriff (Thoms) proceeding upon the provisions of subsection 3 of section 2 of the Act of 1889,* pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Sheriff, in respect that no appointment of a single referee can in the present proceedings be made within fourteen days of the presentation of the application, dismisses the petition."

Brown thereafter, on 14th September, withdrew the third item in his notice of claim, and on 31st October presented a second petition for appointment of a referee. On 10th November following the Sheriff-substitute (Mackenzie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that in the circumstances the application is competent, therefore repels the pleas in law for the respondent: Finds the pursuer is entitled to obtain the appointment of a joint referee as craved, in so far as relates to the matter contained in the first two heads of his notice of claim: Dismisses the petition quoad third head of the notice of claim: Appoints Mr Robert Morris, Reiss Lodge, Wick, to act as referee as craved under the above-mentioned restrictions."

Sir Robert Sinclair then presented a note, praying that Brown and the referee should be interdicted from following out or in any way acting in the notice of claim and reference.

The note having been passed upon caution, and a record made up, the complainer founded upon the provisions of the 7th section of the Act of 1883,† and stated that "The said Act confines the statutory right to compensation to certain specified classes of improvements expressly enumerated in the schedule annexed to the Act, provided these improvements have been executed within the periods specified in the said Act, and in all other respects meet the statutory requirements. The said alleged notice of claim is inept, and does not comply with the requirements of the statute in many respects, and in particular in respect that there is in said notice no sufficient specification of the alleged claim to shew whether the alleged improvements are of the nature contemplated by said Act, or whether they were executed within the period for which the said Act allows compensation." He further averred that the second petition for appointment of a referee was incompetent, and that the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor was ultra vires.

* The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 2, subsection 3, enacted,—“If at the determination of the tenancy the parties shall not have appointed a referee, then on the application of either party, the Sheriff shall, within fourteen days, appoint a competent and impartial person to be referee.”

† The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, sec. 7, enacted,—“Notwithstanding anything in this Act, a tenant shall not be entitled to compensation under this Act unless four months at least before the determination of the tenancy he gives notice in writing to the landlord of his intention to make a claim for compensation under this Act. Where a tenant gives such a notice the landlord may, before the determination of the tenancy, or within fourteen days thereafter, give a counter notice in writing to the tenant of his intention to make a claim for compensation under this Act. Every such notice and counter notice shall state, so far as reasonably may be, the particulars and amount of the intended claim.”

Sinclair v.
Brown.

The respondent, Brown, stated in answer,—“Explained that the respondent, in order to obviate all questions in regard to the third item of the said notice of claim, withdrew the said third item by intimation to the complainer’s agent prior to instituting the proceedings suspension and interdict of which is sought in the present process. The first and second items in said notice of claim fall under the class of improvements specified in part third of the schedule annexed to the said Act, and are in accordance with articles 16 and 17* of said part third.” He further averred that the whole proceedings had been perfectly regular and competent, and in terms of the statutes.

The complainer pleaded;—Suspension and interdict should be granted as craved, in respect (1) The petition by the respondent, Brown, was incompetent. (2) It was illegal, incompetent, and ultra vires for the Sheriff-substitute to appoint a referee. (3) The respondent’s alleged notice of claim was incompetent, et separatim was irrelevant.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—3. The note of suspension and interdict should be refused with expenses, in respect (1) That the respondent’s notice of claim is regular and sufficient so far as relates to the first two items thereof, which alone are now insisted in; (2) that the complainer has judicially admitted, in the process on which he founds as excluding the process under suspension, that he is bound to acquiesce in the appointment of a referee to deal with the said two items; and (3) that the respondent’s application to the Sheriff to appoint the referee, who is now sought to be interdicted from acting, was competent and legal, and in accordance with the terms of statutes.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 26th March 1892, recalled the interim interdict, and refused the prayer of the note.†

The complainer reclaimed.

Argued for him;—(1) The notice of claim was bad, as it did not contain “the particulars and amount,” as required by the 7th section of the Act. Under the first item of the claim it was not said that the manure had been purchased, as required by the schedule to the Act, part III., 22. Nothing was said as to the quality of the manure, or the date of its purchase and application. Nor was it said that the feeding stuffs were not produced on the holding. In short, “reasonable particulars,” as stipulated for in the 7th section, were wholly wanting, and the landlord was without the data which it was his right to have.¹ They were all within the tenant’s knowledge, and without them the landlord could not be expected to make the tenant an offer, as it was contemplated by

* “16. Application to land of purchased artificial or other purchased manure.

“17. Consumption on the holding by cattle, sheep, or pigs of cake or other feeding stuff not produced on the holding.”

† “NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has carefully considered the various objections to the procedure which were urged by the complainer at the debate, but he has come to the conclusion that none of these objections are well founded. The respondent’s notice of claim might no doubt have been expressed with greater precision, but the Lord Ordinary sees no reason to apprehend that the arbiter will not strictly confine himself to claims competent under the statute; and indeed he does not consider that, fairly read, the claim, as made, embraces anything which is outwith the statute. It would of course have been better if in the second head of the claim the words ‘not produced on the holding’ had been inserted, but the reference to the statute seems to make it sufficiently plain that these words must be held implied.

“As to the question of the fourteen days, the Lord Ordinary can only say that he sees no reason for differing from the conclusion of the Sheriff-substitute.”

there was the greater necessity for a full disclosure in limine. (2) The less series of petitions, if each became abortive. The view taken by the Brown.

Sheriff-substitute and the Lord Ordinary made the time limit useless.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) What the 7th section required was “notice of intention to make a claim.” From the notice, as sent to the landlord, he could at once see under what heads of the schedule the different items fell, and no more was necessary. Indeed, it would be impossible to give the particulars asked by the complainer, because the notice of claim had to be given four months before the ish of the tenancy, when the catalogue of improvements might be incomplete. It was too late to take exception to the items, because before the Sheriff the com-plainer had stated his willingness to go to the referee on them, the only one he objected to at that time having been withdrawn. (2) What had prevented the appointment of a referee on the first application in the Sheriff Court was the fact of the Court being in vacation. There was no provision for finality in the Act.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The reclamer has maintained two objections to the proceedings in this case. I shall first deal with the objection which was argued last, viz., the alleged incompetency of the appointment of a referee by the Sheriff on the application which was made to him after the first application had proved abortive. When an appointment was asked under the first application, the fourteen days within which it fell to be made under the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1889, had expired; and I do not think that the Sheriff could have done otherwise than refuse the petition. But the statute does not limit the capacity or power of either landlord or tenant to one application to the Sheriff; and, looking to the nature of his jurisdiction under this statute, I think we should be going to an unwarrantable extent in the direction of strictness if we were to hold the second application, which was granted within the fourteen days specified in the Act, to be incompetent.

The other objection is a much more important one. The reclamer has argued that the notice in question was insufficient in specification of the tenant's claim.
The objection applies to the two first heads of the claim. I think the objection is a formidable one. The Act of Parliament states (sec. 7) that the tenant who proposes to exercise the privilege conferred upon him shall not be entitled to compensation unless he gives “notice in writing to the landlord of his intention to make a claim for compensation under the Act,” and further, that “every such notice and counter-notice shall state, as far as reasonably may be, the particulars and amount of the intended claim.” The claims are necessarily founded upon the enacting part of the statute along with the schedule—and it would plainly be insufficient for the tenant to give notice to his landlord by merely saying that he intended to claim under the Act—nor would it be enough for him to say that he intended to claim under, e.g., the 16th and 17th heads of the schedule to the Act. All are agreed that there must be more specification than that, and it is to be observed that the particulars required are distinguished from and must be stated as well as the amount. As regards the amount, it is plain that it must say, at least approximately, how much is claimed. I say “approximately,” because I concur in the view that there may be cases where the last four months of the lease will yield something in the way of claim, the amount of which cannot be specified beforehand. But in that case the natural and proper thing to do would be to state the ascertained amount, and explain how and to what extent there comes to be a margin of unascertained claim.

Sinclair v.
Brown.

Again, what is the meaning of "the particulars of the intended claim" which the statute says the notice must state "as far as reasonably may be." We derive some light as to the meaning of the latter words from the schedule. Taking the 16th head of the schedule, which is one of those entering this case, by way of illustration, "applications to land of purchased artificial or other purchased manure," what would be reasonable particulars in a notice from a tenant claiming under that head? In the first place, he must know what kind of purchased manure, artificial or otherwise, he had applied, and the amount of it. He knows whether it was phosphates or bones or what else—and indeed to use the term artificial is to generalise from the concrete facts which are in his knowledge. The time of its application would also be a very material element, and equally certain to be in the knowledge of the tenant. I further think that, if the farm were a large one, it would be right that the tenant should state upon what fields the manure was put. He might also (although I do not say it would be essential) easily add the date of purchase and the source of the supply. These would appear to me to afford no more than reasonable information to the landlord. They are material to him, and they lie ready to the hand of the tenant, and give him no trouble to mention.

I pause here to look at the procedure contemplated by the Act. The Act was intended to conduce to the prompt and amicable settlement of the rights of landlords and tenants; and it provides in the 8th section that it shall be in the power of parties to settle their claims by conference, after the notices have been interchanged. It is only after failure to settle the claim that the matter is to go to arbitration. It seems to me that the duty of the tenant is frankly to possess his landlord of such facts as would enable him to say whether the claim was good or not. If the tenant confines himself to generalities—missing out particulars—the result would be that there would be a high probability of the landlord saying that he must go to arbitration. I do not think that Parliament can be blamed for requiring a frank communication of particulars, the ascertainment of which would give no trouble to the tenant, and the production of which would, in all probability, save a litigation. In considering the effect of the provisions of the Act, I have been struck with the fact that there is no provision for the production of any other particulars of claim before the arbiter than those exchanged between the parties. Under the 12th section of the Act, the arbiter has power to call for the production of vouchers or other documents necessary for the determination of the matters referred to him. That provision looks as if it were the policy of the Act that the notice of claim should contain sufficient information to enable the landlord and tenant to sit down together and, if possible, reach an amicable settlement; and it is only in the event of their failing to reach such a settlement that there is any necessity for appealing to the referee.

Such is my opinion of the fair working of the Act generally. Turning to the case before us, I find that the claim of the tenant does not mention the year of the application of the manure, nor the kind and amount applied, nor the part of the holding on which it was placed. The whole information given is that he claims "£237, 12s. 1d. for unexhausted value of manure, artificial, as applied to holding." Unfortunately, the notice comes to less than if he had said "I claim £237, 12s. 1d. under the 16th head of the schedule." Accordingly,

"amount" being, as I have pointed out, something different from "particulars," No. 137. there are simply no particulars whatever supplied in this head of the notice. I am therefore bound to say that if it were not for a peculiarity in the case I should have considerable difficulty in holding that there was sufficient notice under the Act. In this respect, the second head of the claim under the 17th article of the schedule is equally deficient with the first. No particulars are given as to the date when the feeding stuffs were consumed, and nothing is said as to the amount of each, and the same observations apply as in the case of the first head.

May 17, 1892.
Sinclair v.
Brown.

Accordingly, if there were no other ground of judgment, I should have had great hesitation in adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. But I think there is a clear ground of judgment otherwise. The reclaimer asks the Court to hold that the notice is bad, inasmuch as it does not state the particulars and amount of the claim as far as reasonably may be. I cannot understand this position, when we find that in the Sheriff Court in a petition by the tenant for appointment of a referee the reclaimer held up the first and second heads, which he now makes the subject of attack, by way of contrast to the third, and stated that while there was "no sufficient specification" in the third, he had all along been willing to concur in the appointment of a referee to deal with the first and second. He thus, in substance, judicially admitted that the first and second items of the claim were sufficiently stated. My judgment is accordingly rested on the fact that whether the notice of claim is sufficient or not, the landlord has himself at a previous stage treated them as good.

It is upon that ground only that I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, although I have thought it right to express my opinion upon the merits of the question, for it would be unfortunate if landlords and tenants were to do otherwise than make a frank interchange of information lying ready at their hands, that being by far the simplest way of avoiding litigation and expense to both parties.

LORD ADAM.—Sir Robert Sinclair, the reclaimer, contends that the notice of claim given by the respondent is irrelevant, because, in the first place, there is no assertion in it that the manure—one of the items of claim—was purchased, and in the second place, because it is not said that the feeding stuffs—the other item of claim—were not produced on the holding. These are objections which arise upon the terms of the 16th and 17th heads of the schedule to the Act, which specifies the improvements for which compensation is allowed. I mention this because it appears to me that this is the only view of the case with which the Lord Ordinary has dealt. His Lordship does not touch upon the aspect of the case under the 7th section of the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883. That section provides that the notice of claim "shall state, as far as reasonably may be, the particulars and amount of the intended claim." It is for the Court before whom the question comes to say whether the notice does give such particulars as are reasonable. In that view, I should have been disposed to say that particulars given here were not reasonably sufficient. But it is said that the words used in the Act are that the tenant "shall give notice in writing of his intention to make a claim." In my opinion, the word "intention" is used because the claim to be made was a future claim, which only emerged at the date of the expiration of the tenancy, and the tenant is to give particulars of his intended claim upon that footing. He cannot give the exact value and amount—as they will stand if the claim comes to be referred to an arbiter—but he is to send to the landlord his intended claim. Accordingly the provision is that this is to be done four months before the end of the lease, and that the landlord may give a counter notice, the scheme of the Act being that if possible litigation shall be avoided. If this is found to be impossible, and the landlord and tenant cannot come to terms, then their differences must be settled by a referee. What is to be referred is the claim which the tenant made four months before, and there is no provision in the Act for any further claim being prepared or submitted.

The question then is, are the “particulars” given in the claim sufficient? I cannot say that any are given. It appears to me that the tenant, when he first prepares his notice of claim, should supply the information which he will ultimately have to give when the matter comes before the referee. He has not done so here, and I should not therefore have much difficulty in holding that the notice was not sufficient.

But it is a different matter when we find it under the hand of the reclaimer himself that he considers the particulars given as to the two first items sufficient, and that he is ready to go to the arbiter upon them.

Upon the other point, relating to the appointment of the arbiter, I am of the same opinion with your Lordship.

I therefore concur upon both points.

ALEXANDER BELL AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Johnston—G. R. Gillespie.

Railway—Compulsory powers—Compensation—Tenant's interest—Notice—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 19), secs. 17 and 115.—Section 17 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, enacts,—“When the promoters of the undertaking shall require to purchase any of the lands which . . . they are authorised to purchase or take, “they shall give notice thereof to all the parties interested . . . and by such notice shall demand from such parties the particulars of their interest in such lands, and of the claims made by them in respect thereof, . . . and every such notice shall state the particulars of the lands so required, and that the promoters of the undertaking are willing to treat for the purchase thereof, and as to the compensation to be made. . . .”

Section 115 enacts,—“If any party having a greater interest than as tenant for a year, or from year to year, claim compensation in respect” of his interest. “the promoters of the undertaking may require such party to produce the lease . . . or other legal evidence thereof in his power; and if after demand made in writing by the promoters of the undertaking such lease . . . or other legal evidence thereof . . . be not produced within twenty-one days, the party so claiming compensation shall be considered as a tenant holding from year to year, and be entitled to compensation accordingly.”

A railway company gave notice to an agricultural tenant that they intended to take part of his farm under the Lands Clauses Act, and that they required him to state his claim for compensation, and that they were willing to treat with him in regard to it, and at the same time demanded that if he claimed compensation under an unexpired lease he should produce the lease or other evidence along with his claim within twenty-one days, and that failing his doing so, he would be considered as a tenant from year to year in terms of section 115. No. 138.

Held that the railway company was not entitled under section 115 to demand production of the lease until a claim for compensation had been made by the tenant. May 17, 1892.

THE FORFAR AND BRECHIN RAILWAY COMPANY, incorporated by Act of Parliament in 1890, were authorised to construct certain railways in the county of Forfar, and to enter upon and use certain lands for this purpose. 1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Wellwood.

In pursuance of the powers of that Act, and of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Acts, 1845 and 1860, therein incorporated, they served a notice on 30th July 1891 upon Alexander Bell, tenant of the farm of Broomfield, belonging to the tutors of the Earl of Dalhousie.

The notice stated that it was the intention of the company to take a portion of the farm, and required from him the particulars of his interest in the lands so to be taken, and of the claims made by him, and intimated that the company was willing to treat for the purchase of the lands and as to the compensation to be paid for any damage he might sustain through the exercise of their powers; "and also, if you claim compensation in respect of any unexpired term or interest under any lease, missive of lease, or grant of such lands, that you will produce to them such lease, missive of lease, or grant, or other evidence thereof in your power, along with your claims, at least within twenty-one days after this notice; and that failing your doing so, you will, in terms of section 115* of the said 'Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act,' be considered as a tenant holding only from year to year, and be entitled to compensation accordingly. And I hereby apprise you that if, for twenty-one days after this notice, you fail to state the particulars above required, or to treat with the said company in respect of your claims, such measures will be adopted as are authorised by the said Acts, and the amount of compensation to be paid by the company will be settled in the manner provided by the said second and third mentioned Acts," i.e., the two Lands Clauses Acts.

On 31st August following Bell served upon the company a statement of claim of damage which he would sustain owing to the taking of the lands in question from Martinmas 1891 to the expiration of his lease, through loss of tenant's profits, &c. He subsequently served upon the company an amended claim, which concluded with a demand to have the claim settled by arbitration, and the railway company having refused to acquiesce in the claim, Bell proceeded to nominate an arbiter on his behalf.

The railway company brought a suspension of these proceedings, asking that Bell be interdicted from taking any proceedings to have his claims valued either by arbitration, jury trial, or otherwise than under the 114th section of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (i.e., on the footing that he was only a tenant from year to year, and that his claims accordingly fell to be determined by the Sheriff).

They stated;—"The respondent, Alexander Bell, failed, after being called upon in writing, to produce his lease, missive of lease, or grant of said lands, or other legal evidence thereof, in terms of section 115 of said Lands Clauses Act" (quoted in rubric), "and is, in terms of said section and Act, a tenant holding only from year to year, and the complainers have ever since 20th August 1891—that is, ever since the expiry of the twenty-one days allowed in the said notice served upon him on 30th July 1891, for production of any lease, or missive of lease, or grant of said farm —considered and regarded him as a tenant, holding only from year to year. The whole proceedings of the complainers were taken in accordance with the provisions of the said statute, and in accordance with the practice of other railway companies in Scotland."

The respondent denied that he had failed to comply with the terms of the Act.

The complainers pleaded ;—(1) The respondent, Alexander Bell, having failed to produce to the complainers the lease or other writing condescended on, under which he makes the claims, requisitions, and nomination of arbiter condescended on, although called upon to do so by the complainers, in terms of the statute, they, the complainers, are entitled to suspension and interdict as craved. (3) The respondent, Alexander Bell, being only a tenant from year to year, any right of compensation he may have must be determined by the Sheriff of Forfarshire.

The respondent pleaded ;—(1) The respondent being entitled, under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, to have his claim for compensation determined by arbitration, the complainers have no right to interdict him from doing so. (3) The respondent being in fact a tenant for a period longer than from year to year, and not having forfeited his right to claim compensation as tenant for such longer period, the present application should be refused.

The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 17th March 1892, pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds that the respondent, Alexander Bell, has not been called upon, in terms of section 115 of the 'Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,' to produce the lease under which he claims compensation : Therefore repels the first plea in law for the complainers."*

* "OPINION.—The question which I have to decide at present is one of general interest, as it affects the existing practice of railway companies in Scotland in giving notices to treat for the taking of lands. It is whether, in consequence of the respondent not having produced the lease under which he holds his farm within twenty-one days of the notice to treat served upon him by the company on 30th July 1891, he is foreclosed from proceeding to arbitration, and must, without further inquiry, and whatever the extent of his interest may be, be considered as a tenant holding only from year to year, and entitled to compensation accordingly. This, on its face, is a strong proposition. The consequences which the complainers maintain flow from the respondent's alleged neglect are highly penal, and therefore the statutory provisions on which the company found must, I think, be construed strictly against them.

"The complainers, reading the 115th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, into the 17th section, added to the particulars required by the latter section to be inserted in the notice to treat a requirement under the 115th section† upon the parties on whom the notice was served to produce the leases under which they held, or other legal evidence of their right within their power. They thus sought to utilise one and the same period of twenty-one days for the purposes of both sections.

"If these two sections are read together, it will be seen, I think, that the latter section refers to something not concurrent with the notice to treat, but which is to follow and depend upon the nature of the response that is made to the notice to treat. The notice to treat should, according to section 17, demand from the parties interested merely 'the particulars of their interests in such land and of the claims made by them in respect thereof.'

"When the particulars so demanded are given, and claims made in respect thereof are formulated, the promoting company will be in a position to decide whether or not, with a view to determining the proper mode of fixing compensation, they should demand from the parties who have stated their interest lodged a claim in respect thereof, production of the lease, missive of lease, or grant, on which they found, or other legal evidence thereof in their power.

"Giving the words used in the two clauses their natural construction, I cannot see what other interpretation can fairly be put upon them. The 115th section says,—'If any party having a greater interest than as tenant for a year or from year to year claim compensation.' Does not this imply that the party must have previously stated the nature of his interest and the particulars of his claim, or at least had an opportunity of stating his interest and lodging a claim?

"The complainers' counsel maintained that the word 'claim' in section 115 must be read as equivalent to 'entitled to claim.' But I do not find in the statute any warrant for such a construction. It is true that, according to the decisions, notice to treat operates as an acceptance of the offer to sell which is held to be made by the statute; and thus an inchoate contract of purchase and sale is completed to certain effects. But a claim for compensation is a separate and distinct matter, and the language used in other sections of the statute, and in particular in sections 17 and 19, shews that the word 'claim' is used in its natural sense of making a claim.

"Again, it is suggested that the company would be placed at a disadvantage if a tenant by not claiming prevented them from setting the provisions of section 115 in force. I do not think there is much in this objection. It would be a much less strained construction of the Act than that now contended for by the complainers to hold a party who has failed to claim within twenty-one days from the date of the notice to treat as having claimed, so as to entitle the company to proceed as in a case of disputed compensation. This is just what is provided by section 19 in regard to the matters dealt with in that section; and the same rule might reasonably be applied so as to let in the operation of section 115.

"What I mean is this,—Section 17 provides for the particulars that are to be stated, and the claims that are to be lodged, and section 19 says that if 'within twenty-one days after the notice to treat the party fails to state particulars of his claim in respect of any such land, or to treat with the promoters of the undertaking in respect thereof, . . . then the amount of compensation to be paid shall be settled in the manner hereinafter provided.' Thus, though the company do not actually know the interest of the party or particulars of the claim to be made, they are to proceed just as if the claim was in. I think the same principle should be applied to section 115. If, after notice to treat, the party on whom the notice is served does not lodge his claim, then he should be dealt with just as if he had made a claim, and the company should, under section 115, treat him as having made a claim, and give him notice that they wish to see the deed or writing, if any, on which he founds. Or else the company might proceed to summon a jury under sections 36 and 37 of the statute, and that would lead to a fresh notice. The party would then have to lodge his claim under certification of being taken before a jury; and if it turned out that he was merely a tenant from year to year, in all probability he would have to pay the expenses of the abortive trial. Or, in any case, the company might, under section 84, enter upon the lands.

"The complainers founded strongly upon the practice of railway companies to insert in the notice to treat a demand for production of the lease, grant, or other evidence. They also referred to the form given in the appendix to Mr Deas's work, p. 245, which is in accordance with the practice relied on. I do not know whether the form in Mr Deas's book is taken from the previous practice of Scottish railway companies, or whether the practice has been adopted from the book. The form given in the latest edition of Hodges on Railways (vol. ii., p. 410), does not contain any such requisition, although the English Act contains a clause which corresponds to section 115 of the Scotch Act. It is not, however, maintained that the practice can rule if it is not warranted by the statute; and in my opinion it is not. . . ."

Brechin Rail-

Bell.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the Lord Ordinary is right. The 115th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which is invoked by the railway company, involves serious consequences to the tenant, if he does not act in conformity with the notice therein referred to. The provision is that even although he may have right to compensation under an unexpired lease, yet, if he does not within twenty-one days table the document of lease, he shall lose his right and be treated as a year to year tenant. It is necessary to see whether the event has occurred which alone entitles the railway company to enforce these serious consequences. The terms of the section are as follows,—“If any party having a greater interest than as tenant for a year or from year to year claim compensation in respect of any unexpired term or interest under any lease, . . . the promoters of the undertaking may require such party to produce the lease, . . . and if, after demand made in writing . . . such lease . . . be not produced within twenty-one days, the party so claiming compensation shall be considered as a tenant holding only from year to year, and be entitled to compensation accordingly.”

Applying plain sense to the language of that section, I think the situation contemplated by it is this,—that a tenant has already asserted his claim to compensation in respect of an unexpired interest under his lease—in that event, the promoters shall be entitled to call upon him to instruct the claim he has made by producing his lease within the time limited in the section, and if he fails to do so, he shall forfeit his right to claim under it upon the footing of the rule de non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio.

It appears to me that the complainers have proceeded in this case to amend or alter the statute by introducing a much more short-hand method than it provides. They issue a notice under the 17th section of the Act that they are authorised to purchase and take certain lands, and demand from those interested particulars of the lands so taken and of the claims so made; and they append to this notice a further intimation that if compensation in respect of any unexpired term or interest under any lease is claimed, the lease or other evidence thereof shall be produced within twenty-one days. In short, the complainers propose to engraft upon the original notice under the 17th section the procedure of the 115th section of the Act, whereas the latter section clearly contemplates a state of matters several stages in advance, and assumes that a response has already been made to the notice under the 17th section. It comes to this, that the complainers contemplate that there shall be a period of twenty-one days only allowed to the tenant from the first moment that he is apprised that his interests are to be affected until he has to produce his lease, and that the penal consequences of the 115th section are to apply to a person who is for the first time invited to consider what his claim is. This seems to me to mix up two stages in the procedure, and I think that to engraft the provisions of the 115th section upon those of the 17th would lead to an abridgement of the rights of the tenant in a very serious and wholly unauthorised way. I am therefore of opinion that we ought to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur, and I only wish to add that it may often be convenient, especially where the number of persons to be treated with is large, that the company should combine the notices, at least to this extent, that they should add a request for particulars of the claim to the notice to treat. In many cases, no doubt, these particulars would be supplied, because parties are generally willing, if they have the power, to dispense with formalities. But in this case the complainers have combined two distinct steps of procedure for which separate notices are required by the statute, and then they propose to abridge the time allowed to the tenant to produce evidence of his claim. This is clearly inadmissible. The tenant is not to lose his right to claim because the company has not given him the opportunity of sending particulars at the proper time. Plainly, the tenant must have the same rights as if he had first made his claim, and had then, in the second place, been asked to produce the lease or other evidence of his right. I think the Lord Ordinary has taken the true view of the case in allowing the tenant now to produce his lease, or evidence of a lease, in order to enable the Court to determine the nature of his tenure as a basis for the arbitration.

Sale—Property—Breach of contract—Rescission—Damages—Actio quanti minoris.—Where a piece of ground was sold with absolute warrandice, and, while things remained entire, it was discovered that the ground was subject to restrictions against building. Question whether the purchaser was entitled to claim damages and retain possession.

Observations (per Lord McLaren) on the remedies open to a purchaser of moveable or heritable property in cases of breach of the contract of sale.

Property—Sale—Conveyance—Whether implied right of access.—Where in a conveyance of property a roadway is mentioned as a boundary it is not prima facie included in the grant, nor does the mention of it imply that it is always to be kept open as a roadway, and although a sale of heritable subjects always implies a right of access to these subjects, the right is satisfied if the disponee retains such access as existed at the date of the grant.

In 1874 the Sutherland and Caithness Railway Company, afterwards the Highland Railway Company, purchased from James Henderson of Bilbster certain subjects in the neighbourhood of Wick, being part of the policy grounds at Rosebank belonging to him, amounting to 3 roods in extent, for £200. In the disposition conveying the subjects it was declared "that the said railway company shall not be at liberty to erect any houses on the said portion of policy ground hereby conveyed, but that the same shall be used only for a road or approach to the railway station of Bankhead, and for a line of railway to the harbour of Pulteneytown or elsewhere; and also declaring and providing that the said policy ground shall, on the side next to Rosebank House, be fenced by the said railway company with a substantial stone and lime fence with a freestone cope, which shall be ever after maintained in good order and repair by the said railway company." The ground in question was an irregular sloping piece of ground abutting on the river of Wick. The road to the station at Bankhead was thereafter formed and fenced off from the rest of the ground, access being obtained to the latter by a gateway adjoining a bridge over the river, the gate being 3 feet wide.

No. 139.

 Louttit's
 Trustees v.
 Highland

By disposition, dated 16th and 18th June 1883, James Louttit purchased from the railway company the portion of the above subjects lying between the road to the station and the river of Wick, extending to 1 rood and 32 poles, and described as bounded on the south "by the road-way leading from Wick railway station to the said bridge." The disposition contained a clause of absolute warrandice. The price paid for the subjects was £115.

At the date of the sale to Louttit neither seller nor purchaser was aware of the building restrictions contained in the titles, which were only brought under the purchaser's notice by the agent of the proprietor of Rosebank some months later. The latter when applied to declined to relax the prohibition. Louttit thereafter brought the existence of the restrictions to the knowledge of the railway company, who thereupon offered to cancel the sale, and bear the whole expense of the transaction, but this was refused.

Nothing followed until Louttit's death on 9th May 1891. His trustees then brought an action against the railway company, in which they asked for declarator that the defenders were bound to free and relieve the subjects in question from the restrictions contained in the original disposition to them, or, in the event of their failure so to do, for decree against them for payment of £2500 of damages.

The pursuers averred that the subjects were originally bought for building and feuing purposes, the frontage being of considerable extent, and the ground being valuable and favourably situated for these. "With the said restrictions, the said subjects have been since their acquisition and are of little or no value, and in the event of the defenders failing to get them removed, the pursuers have suffered, and will suffer, loss, injury, and damage to the extent of the sum specified in the alternative conclusion of the summons."

The defenders offered anew, under reservation of their pleas, to cancel the sale, defray the expense of the original transaction, and repay the £115, with interest; and further explained that they had attempted without success to obtain the consent of Mr Henderson's representatives to the discharge of the restrictions. They denied that the subjects in question could be profitably used for building purposes.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the said disposition in favour of the said James Louttit, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator in terms of the first conclusion of summons, with expenses. (2) Alternatively, the pursuers having suffered loss, injury, and damage in respect of the existence of said restrictions, are entitled to reparation, and the sum sued for in name of reparation being reasonable in amount, decree for £2500 should be granted as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The contract founded on having been entered into under essential error on both sides, the defenders, in respect of their offer and the offer of the Sutherland and Caithness Railway Company to cancel the same, are entitled to have the action dismissed, with expenses. (5) In any view, the sum sued for is excessive.

Proof was led on the question of the value of the subjects as feuing ground in order to instruct the claim of damage put forward by the pursuers, but in view of the opinions expressed by the Judges in the Inner-House, it is only necessary to refer to the Lord Ordinary's note for a summary of the evidence.

The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 28th January 1892, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers are entitled under the petitory conclusion of the summons to reparation in respect of the restriction against building specified in the record: Assesses the damages due at the sum of £250, and decerns against the defenders for payment of the said sum to the pursuers : Assolzie the defenders from the declaratory conclusions of the summons : Finds the pursuers entitled to one-half of their expenses," &c.*

Louttit's
Trustees v.
Highland
Railway Co.

* "OPINION.— . . . It is not disputed that at the date of the disposition in favour of James Louttit neither the railway company nor the purchaser were aware of the restriction in the company's title from Mr James Henderson. . . . All that can be said is, that if Mr Louttit intended to build upon the ground, and saw his way to do so to profit, he made a very good bargain, as he got the ground merely at grazing value. I think that in all probability it did not occur to the railway company that, looking to the configuration of the ground, it could be profitably used for building, and their contention now is that it cannot. But I am of opinion that if the present pursuers can shew that they have sustained damage in consequence of the restriction, they will be entitled to such damages as they may instruct, because in that case they will have suffered eviction to the extent to which the restriction affects them.

"In order to instruct the damages which they claim, the pursuers have produced a feuing-plan, No. 20 of process, and have adduced witnesses of considerable standing and experience to speak to the return which might be expected if the ten lots shewn on the plan were feued.

"If the feuing-plan could be carried out in its integrity, I am inclined to think that a fair return might be obtained. The pursuers' skilled witnesses speak with more information and authority than those adduced for the defenders. They put the average feuing value at 6s. the lineal foot of frontage, yielding about £90 of feu-duty annually, which, capitalised at twenty-two years' purchase, would give £1980. I think that this is somewhat a sanguine estimate, looking to the expense of the under-building; but, on the whole, I am disposed to think that at least 4s. the lineal foot might have been obtained overhead for the feus shewn in No. 20 of process.

"But unfortunately the feuing-plan relied on by the pursuers is open to this very serious objection, that it is prepared on the assumption that the road to the station would be available throughout its entire length as a frontage and access to the houses to be erected. I do not think that under their title to the piece of ground the pursuers have any such right of access. The ground conveyed to them was described as being bounded on the south by the roadway leading from the Wick Railway Station to the Bridge of Wick. No part of the roadway was conveyed to them, and no right of servitude over it was conferred by the disposition. Although ex facie of the disposition the pursuers may have all the rights of property over the ground conveyed, including that of building on it, the conveyance was not framed with a view to the erection of buildings, and accordingly does not contain any stipulations on that subject. In this respect the case differs widely from the case of the Argyllshire Commissioners of Supply v. Campbell, 12 R. 1255, and other cases relied on by the pursuers.

"It is not disputed by the defenders that they are bound to give the pursuers access to the ground. But they maintain that they are not bound to do more than continue and preserve the access which existed at the date of the sale, viz., the gateway near the Bridge of Wick. They further point out that it may be necessary for them, in the management of the railway, to shut up the access in question or construct a line upon it. I so far agree with them that I think that their obligation as to access will be sufficiently satisfied if the pursuers obtain access at the point where the present gate stands. At the same time I must not be understood as holding that the access at that point must be limited to the width of the gate. I think that, taking a reasonable view, the entry must be such as to admit of the entry of carts and carriages.

"If, as I hold, the defenders are right upon this point, the value of the feuing-plan and the evidence depending upon it is seriously impaired, because the result is that the pursuers, if they feu the ground, will be obliged to form a roadway and footpath on the ground itself, thus taking off a strip of about 23 feet. The question is whether after this is done any margin of profit remains.

Trustees v.
Highland
Railway Co.

The pursuers reclaimed.

It was stated at the bar for the respondents that they were satisfied with the Lord Ordinary's award as an assessment of damages, and that as they had gone to trial without objecting to the competency of the action, they did not now propose to take exception to it.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The subjects here being described as bounded by a roadway, it was necessarily implied that a right of access to and from them by that roadway was thereby given.¹ The disponent here was in the position figured by Lord Shand in his opinion in the case of the Argyllshire Commissioners of Supply.¹ The case of a road fell to be assimilated to that of a river, and where it was the boundary between two properties, it belonged half and half to each.² It was different from a fixed boundary, like a wall or ditch. What was asked was nothing more than the equivalent of such uses as were within the reasonable expectation of parties, and were necessary to the proper enjoyment of the subjects at the date of the purchase. The purchaser was entitled to have as many accesses to the lane as were required for the comfortable enjoyment of the property;³ and the feuing-plan shewing that ten tenements could be erected on the subjects, it was not extravagant to ask that there should be an access to each. Failing that, the defenders were bound to have provided something better than a mere wicket-gate three feet in width. An access for carts and carriages would have been only reasonable. The Lord Ordinary's award of damages was too little, either (1) upon the assumption that the disponent was entitled to the larger right of access, or (2) the smaller, such as would suit horses and carriages. In the first case 6s. per lineal foot was the average feuing value; in the other case 3s. per foot,—the first bringing out a sum of £1980, and the second of £990.

Argued for the respondents;—Assuming the competency of the claim, the Lord Ordinary's award ought not to be increased. The boundary by which the subject of a conveyance was described was never included in the grant, an exception being made in the case where the boundary was a non-navigable river.⁴ But that was because the use of the water was common to both opposite proprietors, and the alveus must belong to someone. No reason was given or authority quoted to shew why there should be a right of property in the road by which a subject was bounded. No such right was given in the conveyance. If it had been intended, it would have been so expressed. The principle of an implied right of access was based upon a state of facts leading to the presumption that both seller and purchaser would have agreed when they entered into the contract of sale as to the importance or necessity of such access.¹ Everything here was against such a presumption, and the disponee was entitled to no larger access than he had at the date of his purchase. This he had already. The case of the Argyllshire Commissioners was very different. It was not decided upon the terms of the title, but upon the plans and other facts of the case.

The pursuers' witnesses admit that the value of the feus would be reduced by more than a half; the defenders' witnesses say there would be no profit left at all. I am not prepared to say that the ground has absolutely no value for building purposes; but, having regard to the diminution in value consequent on the station road not being available as an access and the great expense of under-building, I cannot, on the evidence, put a higher value upon it than about 1s. the lineal foot. After taking everything into consideration, I assess the damages due to the pursuers in respect of the restriction at £250. But as this sum is only one-tenth of the sum sued for, and as the pursuers' claim as laid was, in my opinion, framed upon an erroneous basis, I shall make a substantial deduction from the pursuers' expenses. . . ."

Trustees v.
Highland
Railway Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In 1883 the pursuer of this action bought from the Highland Railway Company a strip of ground lying alongside of the river Wick, paying for it the sum of £115. The strip lies between the river on one side and a road which leads from the highway to the railway station on the other. At that time the ground was in grass, and had been used for the purpose of pasturing sheep, and previously for miscellaneous purposes, such as a building-yard and the temporary accommodation of tombstones. Shortly after the purchase the buyer discovered that the title of the railway company contained a clause prohibiting building on the ground in question. This was a discovery both to the disponent and the disponee, and was fortunately made soon after the conclusion of the transaction, and before any change on the subjects had taken place. The railway company promptly and unreservedly acknowledged responsibility for their mistake, and offered to relieve the disponee of the bargain he had entered into under this material misconception. The offer was not accepted, and a counter proposal was made that the railway company should obtain a relaxation of the prohibition contained in the title. This the railway company tried to do without success, and therefore the title was acknowledged by both parties to the contract as one which must be held to contain a restriction against building, and accordingly the offer of the railway company to release the disponee was renewed. The offer was not accepted, the correspondence closed, and nothing was done until 1891, when the pursuers, founding on the state of the title, made a claim against the railway company, which they ultimately brought into Court in the action which is before us.

The action calls on the railway company, in the first place, to clear away the restriction in the title, which they cannot do, and, in the second place, to pay the sum of £2500 as damages on account of the restricted state of the titles, the pursuers at the same time retaining the property in question. The parties have come to trial and to proof on the record in the case, and the Lord Ordinary has given decree to the pursuers for the sum of £250, as the difference in value between the subjects as they are and as they would have been without the restriction which the title contains.

The first observation which I have to make on the state of the record is, that this is a very singular action, because it is not, according to the admissions of Mr Guthrie, of a kind known to the books that a person should retain possession of a heritable subject sold to him, and at the same time claim damages for the difference in value between a clear and a restricted title, those damages amounting to far more than the price paid. We are not, however, called upon to decide on the validity or indeed the legal possibility of such a claim, because the defenders do not plead that such a claim is inadmissible, and that the only remedy was what was offered to the pursuers, namely, the rescission of the bargain.

Under these circumstances we are not called upon to do more than remark on the singularity of the action, and put on record the fact that our judgment is not asked on the question of law which might have been raised.

Louttit's
Trustees v.
Highland
Railway Co.

The Lord Ordinary has given decree for a sum of £250, and the pursuers have reclaimed, on the ground that that award is insufficient. Their claim for ten times that amount is rested on a theory requiring careful examination. Mr Louttit bought the strip of ground in 1883 for £115, but his trustees say that the property, if well laid out, would be very valuable as feuing ground, and would yield a very large return to the disponee. Their case entirely depends upon their having a legal right to ten separate accesses to the roadway which runs from the bridge of Wick to the railway station, and their claim to have ten separate accesses requires to be contrasted with what was the existing access at the date of the sale. At that time the ground in question was not landlocked, but had an access near the bridge—a small access, it is true, just as the piece of ground itself was small—indeed it appears to have been only three feet in width—but it is necessary to notice that that which was and is the sole existing access is entirely disregarded by the pursuers in their claim. Their right to claim damages on the footing of their present claim depends on their establishing that under the title they have such rights of access as I have mentioned to the roadway leading to the railway station.

I turn first to the title itself, because the pursuers have founded their rights of access upon the terms of the title. The words on which they found their claim are contained in the description of the subjects, which are described as “all and whole that strip of ground extending to one rood thirty-two poles or thereby imperial measure, bounded as follows, viz, . . . on the south by the roadway leading from the Wick Railway Station to said bridge”; and the question is, do these words in the description of the boundaries of the property confer a right to ten accesses to the roadway mentioned? We are first entitled to inquire for purposes of identification what is the nature of this roadway, and it is not disputed that it is one belonging to the railway company. It is not said that it is a highway or a public right of way, and I take it that the railway company are entitled to alter their access to the station, and, if they choose, to shut up the roadway or convert it to their own uses. Does the fact, then, that the railway company in their disposition of the property describe the subjects as bounded by this roadway bind them to dedicate it always to the purposes of a roadway? When a roadway is mentioned as the boundary of a subject it is, I think, in contradistinction to the subject granted, and therefore, prima facie, I should say that the roadway was not included in the grant. But it is said to be the import of the authorities that when a subject is described as being bounded by a roadway, it is implied that such roadway shall remain in the condition of affording access to the grantee to the subjects disposed to him. Only one case was cited—Argyllshire Commissioners of Supply v. Campbell—but it is not an authority for that proposition. In that case the elements and circumstances were different and stronger than we have here. The subjects of the sale were no doubt described as bounded by a lane, but the question raised was, whether the lane was to remain as an access to the subjects conveyed. The ground so described was sold under the condition that it was to be used for the purpose of erecting upon it a Court-house. That is one point of difference. In the second place, the Court-house was to be erected according to a design to be approved by the superior. The plans which were prepared made the Court-house open on to the lane, and not only were they approved by the superior, but in the third place, the superior, after approving of the plans, and after the lane had de facto served as an access to the Court-house for years, made up a title to his own property in which there was an express reservation to the adjoining feuars of their right of access by the lane, "which they at present possess." I have gone into the particulars of that case because it appears to me to be quite erroneous to cite it as an authority for the view that if only mention is made of a roadway as the boundary of subjects disposed, the roadway must be maintained as an access to the subjects in all time coming. Accordingly, I do not hold that there is a servitude created in favour of the disponee by the words in the title founded on by the pursuers.

Louttit's
Trustees v.
Highland
Railway Co.

A second argument has been advanced, which is not merely based upon the state of the title. It is said that the case of Ewart v. Cochrane, and the doctrine contained in that case, afford countenance to the notion that a disponent must give such accesses to the ground conveyed as are found necessary by the disponee. Here again one fortunately finds that the familiar doctrine of Cochrane v. Ewart has been discussed with reference to the question of the accesses to be given to the disponee in cases where there has been an access of some sort in existence at the date of the sale. I should like to refer to one of the subsequent cases, namely, the case of Walton Brothers v. Magistrates of Glasgow, July 20, 1876, 3 R. 1130, where the Lord President says this (p. 1133)—"When a man sells a portion of his ground which has an access through the other portion which he reserves, there is an implied grant of that access. That is the principle of the case of Cochrane v. Ewart, and a number of other decisions, and it is consistent with equity and legal principle. Nothing is better settled than that the conveyance of a piece of property implies a right of access to it. No one can possess a piece of ground without having a right of ingress and egress, and the way that is to be obtained if the conveyance is silent is just the existing way." Now, applying that to the present case, all that Cochrane v. Ewart laid down was that if a disponee retains the right of access existing at the date of the disposition his right is satisfied.

I am therefore not prepared to accept the suggestion of the Lord Ordinary, which indeed does not underlie his decision, that there is some elasticity in the rights of the disponee entitling him to more ample access than existed at the date of the disposition. It is true that in the present case that access is not extremely ample, but it was adapted to the uses of the property at the time of the sale, and the disponee purchased the property at the price he did on the footing that he was to have that and no other access. This is not the case of a land-locked property, and the law is that a disposition of a subject having an existing access implies no more than a continuance of the existing access. If this statement of the law is sound, it is impossible to calculate the damages due to the pursuers on the footing that they are entitled to ten new accesses to the roadway.

I therefore reject the contention of the pursuers for a high scale of damages, holding as I do that the legal basis for it is unsound. I am afraid I must add that I think the law goes further, because I doubt whether an award of £250 could have been sustained. But we are not required to enter upon a consideration of this question because the defenders do not object to the sum awarded by the Lord Ordinary. I said that I rejected the higher scale of damages claimed by the pursuers, but it is maintained that, even supposing the views of the Lord Ordinary as to their right of access are accepted, his decision is not satisfactory in respect that the sum which he has awarded is too little. The evidence, as is usual in such cases, is more or less speculative, and this is necessarily more or less a jury question, and if I were at one with the Lord Ordinary as to the measure of the pursuers' rights I would not be disposed to disturb his estimate of the damages due.

LORD ADAM.—This is an action, as pointed out by your Lordship, at the instance of the late Mr Louttit's trustees concluding, in the first place, for decree ordaining the defenders to clear their title of a restriction which it contains against building, and alternatively for damages. It is not in the power of the defenders to comply with the first conclusion, as their author refuses to relax the restriction against building, and consequently the alternative conclusion is the one insisted in. I concur with your Lordship in having great doubts whether the form in which the action is brought is competent. The pursuers claim damages, but at the same time keep the subject of sale, and it is, I think, doubtful whether that is a competent form of action. If the pursuers were very dissatisfied with the bargain they ought to have given up the subjects and claimed damages for breach of contract, but they have not taken this position, and as no objection is taken by the defenders, we have to deal with the action on the footing that the claim for damages is competent.

The claim is for £2500, and it is obvious from the facts of the case that the amount of damages depends on the pursuers' rights in law, arising upon a construction of the title. The ground disposed is bounded on one side by a roadway leading from the bridge over the Wick to the railway station, and the pursuers' claim is, in the first place, that they have a right of access, not only at ten separate places, but at every part of the roadway. Alternatively they claim, in the event of their failing to make good the larger right, that they are entitled to have an access for carts and carriages at the point where a more limited access at present exists. The measure of the damages due to them will of course be greater in the event of their succeeding in their first claim than under the alternative claim, but in the latter case it will still be considerable. If, however, they have no right to any other than the existing access by a wicket gate three feet wide, Mr Guthrie himself admitted that they had suffered no damage.

Mr Guthrie stated two propositions which are quite untenable, and which I was surprised to hear stated by him. The first was that if a subject of sale is described as being bounded by a roadway, the disponee's title extends to the medium filum of the road. In the second place, he said that the proper construction of the title is that the "roadway" does not include the path running alongside of it, but only the cart and carriageway. I know no authority for these propositions. The description in the title seems to me itself to exclude the roadway from the subjects disposed, because if in a disposition the subjects are described as being bounded by a roadway, it seems to me that every part of the roadway is excluded from the grant. I know no reason why less respect should be paid to a private road than to a field or private avenue. I therefore think that the pursuer has no right of access to the private roadway, which the railway company may, when they choose, shut up or convert to other uses.

Trustees v.
Highland
Railway Co.

The next question is, if no such unlimited right of access belongs to the pursuers, have they a right to an enlarged access at the place where an access already exists? My opinion is that they have not. The presumption is, that when parties enter into a transaction for the purchase of a piece of ground, they see with their own eyes the advantages and disadvantages which the ground possesses, and if the disposition is silent on the matter of access, and says nothing about increased access, I think the presumption is almost irresistible that the land is sold with the existing access. That is the principle of the case of Cochrane v. Ewart, and I think it applies with great force to the present case. If the existing access was not sufficient for the purpose to which the disponee intended to put the ground, he could have stipulated for additional accesses. I am far from saying that there may not be circumstances arising out of the transaction and appearing on the face of the title to shew that it was not the intention of the parties that the disponee should be restricted to such access as existed at the date of the transaction. When ground is actually land-locked there is an irresistible presumption that the parties must have intended that the disponee should have an access to the ground sold to him. Res ipsa loquitur. And in the same way when land is feued out for building, as in the Glasgow case McLaren v. Glasgow Union Railway Company, 5 R. 1042, there is a presumption that parties really meant that the disponee should have the access necessary to make that purpose effectual. But we have no case of that kind here. The presumption seems to me all the other way. The piece of ground for the time immediately preceding the sale had been used for pasturing sheep or for storing tombstones. No one thought of building on it. The price was small. Everything pointed to the idea that the use which was to be made of it was the use it had already been put to, for which the existing access was amply sufficient, and I think there is no reason for holding the pursuers entitled to the additional access claimed. I am therefore of opinion that the measure of damage to which the pursuers are entitled must be calculated on the footing that they have right to no other access than that which existed when the ground was sold, and as they are not proved on that supposition to have sustained any damage, it would be my opinion, if that question were open, that they were entitled to none. But the Lord Ordinary assessing the damage as a jury has awarded £250, and the defenders do not seek to disturb that award, and that being the position of the case, I must of course concur in what seems to me to be the extremely handsome award of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD McLAREN.—I concur in the opinion of your Lordship in the chair on the merits of the action, and if I add anything it is only to explain my views as to the nature of the remedy which the law allows to persons in the position of the pursuers.

If the subject comes to be examined in a subsequent case, it will, I think, be found that there is no essential difference in the remedies which the law affords to purchasers for non-fulfilment of contract in the two cases of sales of personal and heritable property. We are more familiar with the subject in its application to personal property, because the cases are more frequent, arising out of the seller's inability to provide goods of the quality he has undertaken to provide. So far as I know, there are only two remedies open to a purchaser which are known to jurisprudence. He has in the first place a right to rescind the contract conditional on his rejecting the goods or heritable property, and to claim damages proportioned to the inconvenience to which he has been put by the non-fulfilment of the contract. His other remedy is the actio quanti minoris, the proper application of which is to the case of a latent infirmity, either in the title or the quality of the subjects sold, discovered when matters are no longer entire. At one time it was doubted whether we had this form of action in relation to sales of moveable property, but it was never doubted that under the clause of warrandice such a right did belong to the purchaser of heritable estate, who discovered that some part of the subject of sale had not been conveyed to him. Now, however, it is quite settled, and has been explained in the valuable expositions of the law of sale given by the late Lord President, that in such cases as sales of ships and fixed machinery, which cannot be returned after they have been in use, if it is discovered after they are in use that the extent or quality of the subjects sold is disconform to contract, the purchaser's remedy takes the shape of an actio quanti minoris. Under this form of action the pursuer may recover such sum as will enable him to put the subject in proper repair, or compensate him for loss of profit, where the subject is of less value than he originally bargained for. I must say I see no reason in principle or on authority why the remedies in the cases of personal and heritable property should not be of the same kind. There certainly is authority for the proposition that when a purchaser of lands or houses finds some defect in his title, or in the subjects conveyed to him, if matters are entire, it is his duty to reject the subject of sale, and to claim damages. That is quite settled in England, and the Court of Chancery never gives the purchaser in such a case damages beyond the expense to which he has been put in investigating the title. But if after buildings have been erected on the ground sold or outlay has been incurred, the purchaser discovers that there is a servitude affecting the property, or part of the property is carried away from him, that is a proper case for making effectual the protection secured to him under the clause of warrandice,—that is to say, his remedy is just the second form of action which has been referred to, the actio quanti minoris.

With regard to the damages to be given to the purchaser the very name of the action suggests a limitation of the amount, and I know of no case in which damages exceeding the value of the subjects have been given. Without laying down any absolute rule, I think it would be a very peculiar case in which more was given by way of compensation than what the parties thought the fair value of the property at the time of the sale, because part of the subjects had not been made over to the purchaser or an easement was discovered which prevented the purchaser obtaining the full enjoyment of the estate. I can understand as a matter of policy the attitude adopted by the railway company in not objecting to the award of the Lord Ordinary, but I do not wish to countenance the view that the amount of damage which may be awarded is whatever the witnesses say is the profit which would have resulted from a speculative use of the property.

The claim made by the pursuers is framed on the theory that they have right to ten accesses to the roadway which bounds the property on the south. The theory is ill-founded, and I may add that, supposing the pursuers were to open gates in the railway company's road, they could make no use of it except by the tolerance of the railway company, because the railway company is entitled to shut up the road, or, while maintaining its use as an access to the railway station, to interdict the pursuers from using it as an access to their houses. The grounds, therefore, on which the pursuers' claim is founded are altogether unsubstantial, and on the whole matter I agree that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed. No. 139.

On a reclaiming note the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor, and holding that a decree ad factum præstandum should not leave the defender in doubt as to the measure of his obligation, decerned against him to erect the buildings in question “within one year” from the date of the interlocutor, parties having agreed that that time should be fixed.

Observations on the nature and effect of a decree ad factum præstandum.

By feu-disposition, dated in May 1889, Alexander Middleton disposed a piece of ground of about 255 feet in length situated on the south side of Belmont Road, Aberdeen, to Roderick M’Kay, contractor there, the latter being taken bound, “within two years from the date of entry, to erect on the ground hereby disposed one or more dwelling-houses or shops,” similar to those already erected by the superior, and of the value of at least £1000. The buildings were to be erected in security of the payment of a feu-duty of £25. 1ST DIVISION.

A few days after the execution of the feu-disposition M’Kay disposed the subjects to Miss Lamond Leslie and her two sisters.

No buildings having been erected, Middleton in November 1891 brought an action against Miss Leslie and her sisters, concluding that they should be ordained “forthwith to erect” dwelling-houses as provided for in the feu-disposition, and failing that to pay damages.

The defenders stated that their delay to erect the buildings was due to the fact that negotiations were proceeding as to the formation of a new street, which would affect the feu, that the feu-duty had always been regularly paid, and they offered security for its payment in future.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 3d February 1892, gave decree “in terms of the first and leading conclusion of the summons.”

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The Court generally allowed a reasonable time within which to fulfil such conditions of the feu as were here in question, assuming that there were not—as it was contended there were—justifiable grounds for delay. The interlocutor should in any view be varied, and a specific time for the erection of the buildings should be named.¹

Argued for the respondent;—No exception could be taken to the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor. If the pursuer acted unreasonably in putting it in force, a suspension might be brought.

 Middleton v. Indeed, it does not appear to me that the question admits of very serious argu-
 Lealie. ment; and accordingly I think that decree ad factum præstandum in some form

The Lord Ordinary has granted decree in terms of the first conclusion of the summons, ordaining the defenders "forthwith" to erect the buildings stipulated for. In pronouncing decree ad factum præstandum, the Court has to bear in mind the consequences and sanctions of such a decree. Failure to implement such a decree exposes a defender to the penalty of imprisonment which it is in the power of the pursuer to put in force. I therefore think that in the case of decrees which may be thus enforced, or which expose a defender to penal consequences, it is right that the Court should so express the decree that the defender shall be in no doubt regarding the obligation he has to discharge. To take an illustration, if a person who has been interdicted commits a breach of interdict, he is liable to prosecution and imprisonment, and accordingly, the Court always frames its interlocutor in these cases so that there shall be no vagueness, and that the person who has been interdicted shall be in no doubt as to the measure of his liability. It appears to me that the same reasoning applies to such a decree as is here in question, and I cannot acquiesce in the demand of the pursuer to pronounce a decree for implement of the obligation "forthwith." Such a decree would be appropriate in the case of a single act, such as the delivery of a writ, which is completed instantly on its commencement; but it is not so in the case of the building of a house, which must be a long operation, and requires a tract of time for its execution, even where the greatest despatch is used.

If we were to pronounce decree that these houses should be erected "forthwith," we should leave to the arbitrament of the person in whose favour it was pronounced the interpretation of the word "forthwith," and the result would be that the person against whom it was pronounced would be in the difficult position of not knowing when he was in default. For that reason, I think that decree in the terms used by the Lord Ordinary ought not to issue.

On the question of what time should be allowed, we are relieved from the difficulty of determining what would be a suitable period, by the agreement of counsel that it should be a year from the date of the interlocutor we pronounce. It must be remembered that we do not ourselves fix that date, and that we are not laying down any precedent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the decerniture contained in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: Decern the defenders, in implement of the obligations contained in the feu-disposition libelled, to erect within one year from the date of this interlocutor, on the piece of ground described in the summons, one or more dwelling-houses, or shops and dwelling-houses combined, all as specified in the summons and feu-disposition: Quoad ulterius, adhere to the said interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and remit to his Lordship; and find no expenses due to or by either party since the date thereof."

Process—Mandatory—Foreign.—Circumstances in which the Court refused hoc statu to ordain a party litigant who had gone to America to sist a mandatory.

GEORGE AITKENHEAD, grain and storekeeper, Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, against William Buntten & Company, drysalters, Glasgow, for payment of £292, 7s. 3d. for storage charges, and William Buntten & Company brought a counter action against George Aitkenhead for £470, 9s. 6d., the value of certain goods stored with him, which, as they alleged, he had failed to redeliver.

The actions were conjoined, and on 23d March 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Lees) gave decree in Aitkenhead's favour for £87, 16s. 3d. in the action in which he was pursuer, and assolized him in the other action. On 23d March 1892 that interlocutor was affirmed on appeal by the Sheriff (Berry).

Buntten & Company then appealed to the Court of Session.

When the case was called in the Single Bills the appellants moved that the Court should ordain the respondent to sist a mandatory.

It was stated that Aitkenhead had been sequestrated in 1879, and that the trustee on the estate had been discharged in 1881. The bankrupt did not receive his discharge, and since then he had been allowed, without interference by his creditors, to carry on business on his own account. The accounts payment of which was sued for were incurred in 1885. Aitkenhead was now in America.

Argued for the appellants;—It was admitted that the Court would not in every case require a party litigant who had left the country even animo remanendi to sist a mandatory. It was a matter of discretion, but the rule was now less flexible than the earlier cases shewed. In the Simla Bank case,¹ where a motion of the kind had been refused, the circumstance that the debt sued for was contracted in India had weighed with the Court. In the case of D'Ernesti,² an action of divorce, the pursuer's motion was refused because the Court doubted its jurisdiction, and the defender was in very impecunious circumstances. But it was there stated by Lord Fraser, adopting Lord Fullerton's opinion in Ranken v. Nolan (26th Feb. 1842, 4 D. 832.), that the rule requiring a mandatory was absolute. In *M'Donald's case*³ the absence was temporary. The appellants here had been brought into Court, and it was only just that they should have some responsible person to look to for their expenses.

Argued for the respondent;—He was in a more favourable position than an ordinary defender, because the pursuers held in their hands £87 of his money. In the larger matter in dispute, the respondent really occupied the position of defender. The rule even in the earlier cases was not so strong as was stated by the appellants. A bankrupt defender had been found entitled to be heard without finding caution for expenses, although the trustee declined to sist himself.⁴

LORD PRESIDENT.—All such cases as this are cases of circumstances, and it cannot be asserted that there is any general inflexible rule which forces the Court to order the sisting of a mandatory where a party litigant has left the country and is resident abroad, even where he is so resident animo remanendi. I can quite understand that the other party who is at home may desire to have someone in Court to represent his adversary, but this must be on the ground that the case is not in responsible hands, or that it is not being duly conducted. Accordingly, if a motion to sist a mandatory is refused by the Court, the refusal must always be in hoc statu, as the circumstances might alter and call for such an order being made.

That being so, we have to consider the grounds upon which this application is made. It is not presented because objection is taken to the conduct of the case. The argument has proceeded rather on a view of the financial position of Mr Aitkenhead and his creditors. I think Mr Aitken is right in the way in which he puts his case. His client has been found entitled in the inferior Court to £87, and this money is in the hands of his adversary. Mr Ure on behalf of the latter admits that that sum must be paid, unless he succeeds in establishing a claim which he asserts against Mr Aitken's client, and which has been negatived in the Court below. Mr Aitken's client is accordingly in the position of a defender, and of a defender holding a decree of absolvitor, which appears to be a doubly advantageous position. Under these circumstances, I do not think that we are compelled to order Mr Aitkenhead to sist a mandatory. and I am for refusing the motion.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 42), sec. 1.—A builder's labourer was killed by the fall of a scaffolding on which he was working in the demolition of an old building. In an action by his widow against his employer, to recover damages under the Employers Liability Act, it was proved that the scaffolding had been erected by P., a foreman labourer, with the assistance of the deceased and of another labourer; that these three persons were all experienced in such work; that the materials were good, and the manner of constructing the scaffolding such as was usual for such work; that the cause of the accident was that while a stone was being removed from the old building, it broke and a piece of it struck a projecting part of the scaffolding, and brought down the scaffolding; that while it would have been possible to take such precautions as would have prevented the scaffolding being brought down, such precautions were not usually taken even by careful workmen doing such work. Held that the defender was not liable in damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Fife.

ISABELLA THOMSON AND OTHERS, the widow and children of Andrew Thomson, a labourer in Dunfermline, raised an action in the Sheriff Court there against George Dick, builder there, to recover damages for the death of Thomson, which they alleged happened through the defender's fault.

The action was founded on the common law and on the Employers Liability Act, 1880. The latter ground of action only was insisted on in the Court of Session.

The facts established by a proof were as follows. The defender was employed to take down the gable of an old building in Dunfermline. For this purpose a scaffolding was erected by three of the defender's men, Robert Philp, a foreman labourer, Abel Shand, another labourer, and the deceased, all of whom had experience in such work. The nature of this scaffolding was thus described by the Sheriff-substitute, with whose judgment the Court agreed, viz.:—"The scaffolding was constructed in the usual way that masons' scaffoldings are constructed, with alternate tiers of battens (6½ inches wide) and trestles; there were three tiers of trestles one above the other, the trestles composing the lower tier being larger than those of the upper tier, so that the structure was 15 to 18 inches wider below than above; the trestles and battens composing the scaffolding were sound and strong, and the scaffolding was well constructed according to the standard of care usual among masons; the heads of the trestles were hard against the gable, but the feet of the trestles were not tied or secured so as to prevent movement."

Thomson v.
Dick.

Philp and the deceased stood upon a platform upon the top of this scaffolding. While they were doing so, and engaged in lifting stones from the chimney and throwing them down, a stone broke in their hands. It appeared that the stones had been subjected to the action of fire, and were therefore more likely to be "rotten" and to break. One of the broken pieces in its fall struck one of the projecting battens which supported the second tier of trestles and made it "spring," and so loosened some of the upper tiers. In consequence the scaffold fell. Philp and the deceased fell with it. The latter was seriously injured and died the same day.

The pursuers stated that the scaffolding was unsafe, dangerous, and defective, because the trestles rested on single battens; that these battens were not made fast to the walls or secured in any way, and the feet of the trestles were not secured; further, that the work of pulling down an old wall being dangerous a safer and more substantial scaffolding was required. They further stated that the scaffolding was constructed by Philp, to whose orders the deceased was bound to conform; that Philp ordered the deceased to work upon it, and that the deceased was conforming to Philp's orders when the scaffolding fell.

The Sheriff-substitute (Gillespie), on 7th January 1892 (after findings in fact with regard to the scaffolding to the effect above narrated), found "that while it would have been quite possible to have taken precautions to secure the trestles from moving, such precautions are not usually taken even by careful masons: Finds in law that the defender is not liable for the accident."

On appeal the Sheriff (Mackay) affirmed the Sheriff-substitute's judgment.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—This scaffolding was erected by the defender's foreman. It was certain that the work to be done required care in erecting such a scaffolding. It was equally certain that a safe scaffolding for such work could easily have been erected. The Sheriffs had found to that effect, and the proof made it quite clear. That implied the absence of reasonable care in supplying the scaffolding on which the deceased was to work. The breakdown of it in the circumstances raised a presumption of fault.¹ It was true that the deceased helped to make it. But he was only a labourer obeying the orders of his foreman, and he had no responsibility.

Argued for the defender;—It was proved that the scaffolding was Thomson v.

Dick.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—A decision in a matter of this kind must always be a decision with special reference to the facts of the particular case before us. I think it would not be possible to lay down a definite line beyond which we could say that the master was liable in damages for accidents to his workpeople and within which he was not so liable.

In this case, as disclosed in the proof before us, there is no room for doubt that this scaffold, if it was put up for the ordinary work for which a mason erects a scaffold, could not be impugned as not fit for an ordinary mason's work. It is, I think, proved that it was just such a kind of scaffold as would be put up by skilful and careful masons for the purposes of their work.

There is a good deal of evidence in the proof in regard to the difference between scaffolds put up by masons and scaffolds put up by joiners. No doubt joiners would put up a different kind of scaffold from that which masons would erect, because their habits of working are different. They are more addicted to the use of nails and bracings. But I do not think that that is of any importance to this case.

The questions which we have to consider are, first, whether this scaffold was erected in the usual and ordinary way in which such scaffoldings are erected by masons, and second, whether the mode in which the scaffold was erected led to the accident. In reply to the first of these questions I think it is fully proved that the scaffold was erected in the usual and ordinary way, and that the mode of its erection did not directly lead to the accident.

In the next place, we have to consider whether there is anything in the circumstances of this case which would shew fault upon the part of the master in using the ordinary kind of scaffold for the work he used it for here. The special circumstances alleged in which this scaffold was used by the defender, and in respect of which it is sought to impute fault to him, were these. In the first place, it is said this scaffold was used in taking down an old wall, and in the second place, that the wall had been exposed to the action of fire, which would have an effect upon the stones of which the wall was composed so as to make them more friable. The workmen standing upon the platform at the top of the scaffold were taking down the stones which composed the chimney-stalks, and throwing them to the ground. Now, if this operation could be performed in safety from such a scaffold as this in ordinary circumstances, it would not occur to my mind that the special circumstances alleged in this case would make it so likely that one of the stones would break in two by its own weight, and fall where it should not have fallen, that it was necessary for the master to take special precautions against that happening. Scobie, one of the skilled witnesses, says that he has often taken down old walls in this way and that no accident had ever occurred, and the defender, who has had twenty-five years' experience, says the same thing.

Looking at the facts of this case, I cannot hold that the master, the defender here, was in fault through his foreman in not taking exceptional precautions to guard against the accident which actually did occur. I therefore am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff is right.

LORD YOUNG.—I confess I have found some difficulty as to the decision in this case. The case was opened clearly and moderately—with all the more No. 142.

ability because moderately—by Mr Hunter, who stated every plea I think he could present on behalf of his client. He put the case—and I think he rightly May 19, 1892.
put the case—entirely upon the provisions of the Employers Liability Act, Thomson v. because under the common law the master was clearly not under any liability Dick. to the pursuer. I assume that the scaffold was insufficient for the purpose for which it was erected; indeed it proved to be so, because it tumbled down.

I think there has been some misunderstanding with regard to the rules of the common law as to whether the master is liable to his workmen for injuries caused through improper materials for their work supplied by him to them. I am not prepared to state, as a rule of law, that if a master supplies bad material or does not give sufficient material to enable the workmen to do their job in safety, and they proceed to do their work with the improper materials, that the master will be liable for any injuries occasioned thereby. The men ought not to have gone on with their work with the improper materials.

There is, however, no case of that kind here; it is admitted that the master had supplied proper materials and in sufficient quantities for putting up a good scaffold. The only question, then, that arises is as to the way in which the materials were used in putting them into their proper places. Of the three men employed in erecting this scaffold, one of them is described as a foreman, and under the old law the master would not have been responsible for any act done by him, but the Employers Liability Act makes the master in some cases responsible for the actions of the foreman. I think that the clause of the statute under which the pursuer brings this action, and by which it is sought to make the master liable for the actions of his foreman, requires some consideration. I am not prepared to say that any one of these three labourers engaged in pulling down this old wall was in any different position from the men who were working alongside him. It is said, however, that this foreman was in a different position from the other labourers, and that if he committed any fault in the carrying out of the work which they were all engaged in, the master is liable to any other of the workmen injured through that fault. I am not prepared to assent to that as a general proposition. I think that the amount of liability must always depend upon the circumstances of the case, and upon the good sense shewn in carrying out the work. But the liability of the master in this case was sought to be put upon him through the fault of Philp, the foreman. Now, I do not think that Philp was guilty of any fault for which the master can be made responsible. I cannot help thinking that this scaffold was not a good and sufficient scaffold for the purpose for which it was erected, because it came down and life was lost, and the fall did not occur from any wonderful or out-of-the-way circumstance. I think that if a scaffold is put up for the purpose of pulling down an old wall the men employed upon that work ought to be able to do their work in safety. But there is certainly evidence that this scaffold was the ordinary kind of scaffold used by masons, and was as strong as they are usually made. There is some evidence the other way, but there is certainly a reasonable amount of evidence that the scaffold was an ordinary masons' scaffold.
Both the Sheriffs have arrived at the conclusion that Philp was not liable in any fault in concurring with the deceased Thomson, and the other labourer engaged at the building of the scaffold, in the opinion that this was quite a safe scaffold. But, then, if there was not fault on Philp's part, which made him liable to the pursuer, it is impossible to make the defender liable for his foreman. I have had some difficulty with this case, but I wish to indicate the difficulties it presented to my mind, and to shew why I am not prepared to dissent from the conclusions at which both the learned Sheriffs have arrived.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—The accident out of which this action has arisen is regrettable, but I think no ground has been stated to justify us in holding the master liable in damages for it. The deceased, along with a workman in a superior position to himself, were sent to put up a scaffold for a particular purpose, and they did put up a scaffold, not only such as they were accustomed to make, but such as masons all over the country are accustomed to put up for similar work. It would, in my opinion, be a strong thing to hold a master liable for an accident to a workman on the sole ground that the scaffold which the workman had erected for himself proved to be insufficient for the purpose for which it was to be used. That, however, appears to me to be the only ground of claim established by the proof in this case. I agree with the opinions of both the Sheriffs when they say that this scaffold was erected by the workmen in the usual way, and as there is no suggestion that the materials supplied by the master for the erection of the scaffold were otherwise than perfectly suitable, I fail to see any ground on which the present claim against the defender can be sustained.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Affirm in fact and in law the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed against; dismiss the appeal."

Bankruptcy—Compensation—Lease—Sum payable by landlord on valuation—Arrears of rent.—A landlord on his tenant dying insolvent entered in terms of the lease into possession of the farm, and became liable for the value of the grain crop at a valuation. The tenant's estate was afterwards sequestered.

In a question between the trustee and the landlord, held that the latter was entitled to set off his claim for arrears of rent against the trustee's claim for the value of the grain.

By lease, dated 2d December 1889, Beauchamp C. Urquhart, of Meldrum and Byth, let the farm of Auchnagorth for nineteen years to John Davidson and his heirs, "excluding subtenants and assignees, legal or voluntary, and creditors, or managers for creditors, in any way or shape, unless with the consent of the proprietor."

By this lease it was declared that the general conditions, articles, and regulations * established by the proprietor for the tenancy of all farms on

The whole straw, chaff, turnips, and other green crops, and one-half of the hay, shall be consumed upon the farm, and none sold or carried off without the written permission of the proprietor first had and obtained. . . . and the tenant shall be bound to lay upon the farm all the dung produced upon the same, and never to sell any produced thereon . . . 14 In the event of any tenant becoming bankrupt, or being sequestered, or voluntarily divesting himself of his estate during the currency of his lease, or . . . the lease shall, in the option of the proprietor, become ipso facto void and null.

his estates were to "be held to form part" of the lease, and to be binding on the parties to it "as if they had herein been verbatim inserted." The lease further provided,—“In the event of this lease coming to a termination at any time during the currency of the period of let, then the tenant shall be bound to leave to the then incoming tenant or to the landlord, at the valuation of parties mutually chosen, whatever manure is made after the seed time of the last crop, and shall be entitled to receive payment from the then incoming tenant or the proprietor the value of the first year's grass, and of the grain crop, and for the ploughing and rent of fallow land, and for the wire fencing on the farm, as the same shall be fixed by arbitration, in the same manner as above provided for in regard to the incoming of the tenant under these presents.”

Davidson's
Trustee v.
Urquhart.

On 13th September 1891 Davidson died insolvent, and none of his representatives desiring to carry on his farm, the landlord entered into possession himself. Thereafter Davidson's effects were sequestrated, and on 17th December John Anderson, farmer, Auchneive, Tarves, was appointed trustee in the sequestration.

By minute of reference, dated 7th January 1892, the trustee of the first part and Mr Urquhart entered into a reference. The minute, after narrating the above facts, stated that the parties had agreed to refer to arbitration “(1) The quality of the grain crop on said farm of Auchnagorth—said crop to be threshed out by at least two threshings at the mutual expense of the parties, and the price to be the fiars' prices of the county for crop 1891; (2) the value of the whole turnips on said farm; (3) the value of all the dung on said farm; (4) the value of the grass and clover seeds sown down with the grain crop of 1891; and (5) the value of the wire fencing and other paling on the farm; and whatever said arbiters or oversman shall determine in the premises, the said parties bind and oblige themselves to implement and fulfil to each other in every respect.”

On 25th February 1892 Mr Urquhart lodged a claim in the sequestration, in which he deponed that the deceased at the time of his death was resting owing for arrears of rent the sum of £331, 18s. 10d. This sum he proposed to compensate by setting off against it the sum of £321, 17s. 5d.* as the sum payable by him to the trustee for turnip crop, dung, grass, and clover seeds, and wire fencing, and also the grain crop of 1891 taken over by him under the valuation in terms of the lease. After making this calculation there remained a sum of £10, 1s. 5d. as the estimated balance to rank as an ordinary claim.”

The trustee pronounced this deliverance:—“Finds (1) that the claimant has no power under the lease to acquire a preference to the prejudice of other creditors; and (2) that as the turnip, crop, dung, grass, and clover seeds and wire fencing, and also the grain crop of 1891, were taken over by the claimant under agreement with the trustee under this sequestration and not from the deceased, there can be no compensation. The trustee accordingly disallows the said deduction of £321, 17s. 5d., and admits the claim to an ordinary ranking of £331, 18s. 10d. JOHN ANDERSON, Trustee.”

and he shall have power brevi manu, without any process of declarator or other process at law, to resume possession of the farm at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the occurrence of any one of these events, . . . and the tenant and his creditors shall be bound to remove from the farm at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas, after any one of these events shall have taken place. . . .”

* This was partly an estimate; the sum afterwards fixed by the arbiters was £362, 14s. 6d.

Davidson's
Trustee v.
Urquhart.

Mr Urquhart appealed to the Sheriff-substitute (Brown), who, on 4th April, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the deliverance of the trustee: Finds that the appellant is entitled to compensate the amount due by him in respect of the valuations fixed under the minute of reference between him and the trustee by the arrears of rent due to him, including therein the interest on improvement expenditure agreed to be paid by the deceased John Davidson under agreement subsequent to the lease, and to be regarded as rent: Remits the appellant's claim to the trustee to be disposed of in accordance with the foregoing finding."

The trustee appealed to the Court of Session in terms of section 170 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79).

Argued for the trustee;—The trustee's deliverance was sound. (1) This was simply an illegal attempt to create a security in the landlord's favour over moveables, the possession of which remained with the tenant,¹ and in a case in which, as here, the landlord had a right under the lease to buy stock at a valuation at the end of the lease, it had been held that that gave him no preference.² A landlord's claim for arrears of rent was not good against the pouncing creditors of the bankrupt tenant, and here the sequestration was equivalent to a completed pouncing in terms of section 108 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. The theory of the cases which established this proposition seemed to be that the landlord had only a personal right to get possession of the moveables on the farm on certain terms, and had nothing of the nature of a real security over them. But (2) the landlord had completely innovated on whatever rights he had under the lease by entering into the minute of reference with the trustee. The minute was a totally new arrangement apart from the lease.³ On either view, then, there was no room for the plea of compensation.

Argued for the respondent;—On the tenant dying insolvent the landlord (as he was entitled to do) entered into possession of the farm, with a right under the lease to take over the grain crop, &c., at a valuation. The turnips were practically in the same position as the grain crop. The lease prohibited the tenant from removing them, and the landlord was under no obligation to pay for them, although he was willing to do so. The minute of reference was entered into merely to explicate the rights of parties under the lease, and it in no way formed a new contract with the trustee.⁴ In short, the claim for the valuations and the arrears of rent arose hinc inde on the same consensual contract, viz., the lease. There was then concursus debiti et crediti, and the plea of compensation was fully justified. In *Stewart v. Rose*² the landlord had not obtained possession of the stock of the farm before the creditors. The facts of the case of *Macgregor v. Hunter*² did not bear out the proposition stated in the rubric, and relied on by the appellant. In *Taylor's Trustees v. Paul*³ the landlord derived his rights solely from an arrangement with the bankrupt's trustee.

LORD YOUNG.—The facts of this case are short and simple enough. A farm was let upon a lease containing clauses of a very familiar kind about the incoming tenant taking over at a valuation some fencing and grass and crop left Urquhart.

Now, the tenant here was not made bankrupt in his lifetime, but he died insolvent. It is admitted that he died in a state of insolvency in the month of September, and in the month of November, a few days after the term of Martinmas, his estate was sequestrated, and the appellant in this appeal appointed trustee. The landlord in fulfilment of his obligation took over the fencing, seed in the ground, and the grass crop and grain crop at a valuation. The case would have been the same, in my opinion, so far as the question of law raised is concerned, if there had been a fixed price stipulated. Upon the tenant's death in a state of insolvency the lease was at an end by its terms, and the landlord was entitled to enter into possession, and he did. If he had not, the place would have been vacant, for there was not anybody else entitled to enter into possession. There was at that time no trustee in bankruptcy, and even if there had been, he would not have been entitled to enter into possession, because the lease provided that it should terminate by the fact of bankruptcy, and that the landlord should be entitled to enter into possession. But he did enter into possession, including in his possession the fencing, the seed in the ground—anything that was growing—and the grain crop which was then upon the premises. Now, what was his obligation? His rights were satisfied by giving him possession of these things. What was his obligation? His obligation was to pay according to valuation.

As I have already pointed out, it would have been the same as regards the law if it had been an obligation to pay a fixed sum—say, £320. That was his obligation. In order to render it more specific, the trustee for the creditors in the discharge of his duty, entered with the landlord into a reference to competent people to determine the amount, and they determined it at £362, 14s. 6d. Well, that was what he was to pay for what he was in possession of in implement of the contract in the lease, and payment of that is demanded, and he says,—“Yes, but the party to whom I owe that is owing me £331, 18s. 10d., and I am entitled to set the one against the other”; and if the party who owed him that sum is the tenant or the tenant's representative in the tenant's obligation under the lease, that is, in my opinion, an unanswerably true and sound proposition. Now, the trustee here is not a creditor under any contract which he made as trustee. He made none. I think he made no contract as trustee. The agreement to nominate the valuers who were to determine the amount was not a contract under which any obligation to deliver goods or to pay the price of goods arose at all. It was merely explicating the contract which had been made by determining the sum of money. Well, then, the contract under which the tenant at the time of his bankruptcy—at the time of his death—and the trustee now coming in his place, is bound to pay rents amounting to £331, 18s. 10d. is the contract of lease between the landlord and the deceased bankrupt. The contract under which the landlord on his part is bound to pay the £362, 14s. 6d. is the contract of lease between the same parties. Why shall the one not be set against the other? There is no answer to that question except one—that there is no reason, and the one must be set against the other in that view.

Davidson's
Trustee v.
Urquhart.

Then it is said that that is not the true view, the true view being that there was no contract of purchase or sale or other contract with the tenant under which the landlord was entitled to get possession of his goods on the one hand, and was bound to pay the price on the other. That is merely to say that he has right to get the articles, and his obligation to pay for them is under a contract entered into with the trustee in the bankruptcy. If that had been so in point of fact, I should have assented to the conclusion, but I am very clearly of opinion that it is not so in point of fact, and that the case in point of fact is correctly stated, as I have stated it already, that the landlord's right to the goods—the crop, seed, fencing, and anything else is under the contract of lease, and his corresponding obligation to pay the price now ascertained to be £362, 14s. 6d. is under the precise contract of lease between the same parties. I am therefore of opinion with the Sheriff-substitute that there is here a concursus debiti et crediti, and that in the balancing of accounts the one claim must be set against the other, and a ranking given for the balance.

I do not think it necessary in the view which I have expressed to enter upon any examination of any of the cases. I do not think there is any case to the effect that if a creditor has got possession of part of what would have been the bankrupt estate had he not got possession of it under a lawful contract with the bankrupt himself, he is not entitled to set any liability to pay money in respect of it against a similar liability on the part of the bankrupt in his favour. I put the case of a furnished house—the house is let on lease, the furniture is sold to the tenant, and the tenant is under an obligation at the termination of the lease to leave the premises, and to leave the furniture in it. It may be the same furniture or other furniture, the landlord being bound to take it, and bound to pay either a fixed price or a price to be ascertained by valuation. I put the case that this lease has endured for three years, and that then the tenant dies. The landlord enters into possession of house and furniture; he may let it as a furnished house to a tenant, i.e., another tenant, or he may live in it, and occupy it himself. What is his obligation? The furniture is his; his obligation is to pay for it. But then there is a similar obligation on the part of the tenant to pay his rent, and the one may be set against the other. There is no case to the contrary of that, and I cannot distinguish between grain crops or wire fencing upon a farm and furniture in a house.

In short, my opinion is that the appeal ought to be dismissed, with expenses.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The material fact in this case to my mind is that the landlord was in possession of all the articles upon the farm before the date of the sequestration. If that had not been so, I think some serious questions might have arisen for our determination, but as I hold that possession took place before the date of the sequestration, I concur.

LORD TRAYNER and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

Aliment—Arrears of aliment—Application for warrant to imprison—Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 42), secs. 3 and 4.—It is competent for a woman holding a decree for aliment of her bastard child to enforce payment of arrears of the aliment against the debtor by an application for warrant of imprisonment under the Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Act, 1882.*

Process—Application for warrant to imprison—Aliment—Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 42), sec. 4, subsecs. 2, 3, and 4.—An application, under the Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Act, 1882,* by a creditor in a decree for the aliment of a bastard child, is to be disposed of summarily by the Sheriff with reference to the circumstances of the debtor at the date of the application. It is not competent for the Sheriff, after having satisfied himself that the debtor is unable to pay the aliment, to continue the application for a definite period on the chance of the debtor's circumstances improving.

On 23d January 1891 a petition was presented in the Sheriff Court of Dumfries and Galloway, at Stranraer, at the instance of Maggie M'Colm, residing at Logan in the parish of Kirkmaiden, against John Cain, Auchness, Kirkmaiden, praying for a warrant to commit him to prison for a period not exceeding six weeks, or until he paid £1, 10s. of inlying expenses and aliment, commencing payment 17th October 1888, of a bastard of which he was the father, and expenses. It was also set forth in the petition that he had been charged to pay these sums on 15th January, and that the days of charge had expired.

At the hearing on 29th January, the Sheriff-substitute (Watson) did not pronounce any deliverance, and on 5th February he granted warrant to imprison, as craved, unless the sum of £12 was paid within ten days thereafter. This sum of £12 was duly paid.

On 3d September 1891 Maggie M'Colm presented another petition, founded on the first, and craving warrant to imprison Cain for six weeks,

* 45 and 46 Vict. c. 42, sec. 3.—“From and after the commencement of this Act no person shall, except as hereinafter provided, be apprehended or imprisoned on account of his failure to pay any sum or sums decreed for aliment.”

Sec. 4.—“Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, any Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute may commit to prison for a period not exceeding six weeks, or until payment of the sum or sums of aliment and expenses of process decreed for, . . . any person who wilfully fails to pay within the days of charge any sum or sums of aliment . . . for which decree has been pronounced against him by any competent Court, provided . . . (2) that the application shall be disposed of summarily and without any written pleadings; (3) that the failure to pay shall be presumed to have been wilful, until the contrary is proved by the debtor, but that a warrant of imprisonment shall not be granted if it is proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute that the debtor has not, since the commencement of the action in which the decree was pronounced, possessed or been able to earn the means of paying the sum or sums in respect of which he has made default, or such instalment or instalments thereof as the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute shall consider reasonable; (4) that a warrant of imprisonment may be granted of new, subject to the same provisions and conditions, at intervals of not less than six months, against the same person in respect of failure to pay the same sum or sums of aliment. . . .”

or until he paid the sums set forth in the first petition, together with further sums of aliment since due, and expenses.

On 1st October the Sheriff-substitute, having heard parties, continued the consideration of the foregoing complaint until the lapse of twelve months after the 5th day of February last, and appointed the case to be enrolled on the first Court day after the lapse of said twelve months.

On 24th March 1892 the Sheriff-substitute granted "warrant to officers of Court to apprehend and commit the said John Cain, defender, to the prison at Maxwelltown, therein to be detained for the period of six weeks from the date of his imprisonment, unless the further sum of £10, in part payment of the balance of the sums specified and contained in the decree and charge therein referred to in the petition and condescendence annexed thereto, past due, and still unpaid, is paid within ten days from this date, and grants warrant to the keeper of said prison to receive and detain the said John Cain accordingly, all in terms of the Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Act, 1882."

On 1st April Cain presented a note of suspension and interdict complaining of the latter interlocutor and whole proceedings. He averred, inter alia, that he had been denied by the Sheriff-substitute an opportunity of shewing, as he could have done, that he was unable to pay more than he had already done.

He pleaded;—1. The warrant of imprisonment complained of is incompetent and ultra vires, and suspension and interdict should be granted, as craved, in respect (1) That the complainer is due no sum in respect of aliment incurred since the date of the decree against him. (3) The Sheriff-substitute having previously, on 5th February 1891, found that £12 was the sum which fell to be paid by the complainer, as the condition of his escaping imprisonment, and the complainer having paid said sum of £12, and the whole sums of aliment which have subsequently fallen due, the warrant of imprisonment complained of was outwith the powers of the Sheriff-substitute. (4) The proceedings under the second petition for imprisonment were irregular and incompetent, and the warrant following thereon is null and void.

The respondent pleaded;—1. The complainer's statements are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the prayer of the note. 2. The warrant of imprisonment complained of being regular and proper, and in conformity with statute, the complainer is not entitled to suspension and interdict against the respondent.

On 1st April the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) granted interim interdict, and on 25th April the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Rutherford Clark) refused the note and recalled the interdict.

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) It was incompetent for a creditor in a decree for aliment to enforce payment of arrears of aliment by a warrant to imprison the debtor under the Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Act, 1882.¹ "Sums decerned for aliment" could only be sum-decerned for a period then current. As soon as the period elapsed, the debt ceased to be alimentary and enforceable by imprisonment. (2) The procedure in the cause had been grossly irregular. In an application for an order of imprisonment under subsection 2, section 4, of the Act of 1882 the Sheriff was to proceed "summarily" with reference to the debt and the circumstances of the debtor at the time of the application. Under subsection 3 of section 4, the debtor ought to have had an opportunity of aliment.¹ By adjourning the case for five months the Sheriff-substitute head. Such a course was obviously inconsistent with "summary" dis- Cain v.

 posal of the application. M'Colm.

Argued for the respondent;—The statute contained no distinction between aliment for a current period and aliment in arrears. The case of Tevendale, relied on by the appellant, did not establish that arrears of aliment could not be enforced by warrant of imprisonment under the Act. The ratio of the judgment was that Tevendale was a quasi-assignee, and therefore not a person for whose benefit the aliment had been "decerned for" in the sense of the statute. (2) The procedure was not irregular. The Act contained no prohibition of the course adopted by the Sheriff-substitute, who thought that the debtor might be in a position to pay the debt in five months' time, and that the creditor would by the adjournment be saved the expense of a new petition.

Lord President.—The first ground upon which the reclamer relied was that it was not competent for the respondent to make an application for an order of imprisonment under the statute, because the monies due were payable, not for aliment to be furnished in the future, but for sums expended in the past.

The reclamer rested his argument upon the case of Tevendale, 10 R. 852. I am of opinion that the case of Tevendale does not sanction such a limitation of the statute. That was the case of a parochial board which, having disbursed certain sums by way of aliment for a pauper, turned round and asked decree for reimbursement from the pauper's son, and then sought to enforce that decree by imprisonment. The Court held that the remedy of imprisonment was not applicable to a claim of that sort, because the sums were not decerned for as aliment for the holder of the decree or the holder's child, and therefore were not decerned for as aliment in the sense of the statute. The statute which abolished imprisonment for debt made an exception of the case of non-payment of aliment—that is to say, enabled a person who was legally entitled to be alimented by another, to have her child alimented by another, to enforce that duty, which brooks no delay, by imprisonment. That ratio did not apply, the Court thought, to the case where the aliment had been supplied by a third party, and that third party sought reimbursement. That is quite a different case from the present, and I am of opinion that the first ground of suspension is not a sound one.

But another objection was stated to the Sheriff's interlocutor of a very different kind and quality. The interlocutor complained of, which contains a warrant of imprisonment, was pronounced upon 24th March 1892. That warrant was granted upon an application for summary imprisonment presented upon 3d September 1891. Now consider the procedure contemplated by the statute in dealing with applications for warrants of imprisonment as shewing their serious and peremptory nature. It is careful to provide that they "shall be disposed of summarily and without any written pleadings." The Sheriff here, taking up consideration of the complaint upon 1st October 1891, continued consideration of it until the lapse of twelve months from 5th February 1891. That is the way he dealt with the case by saying he would resume consideration of it after the lapse of four months. I do not think he was warranted in so dealing with

No. 144. the matter, or that that was a proper way to treat an application for warrant of imprisonment. If a proper case had been made out before him for granting the warrant, he should have granted it at once, after satisfying himself that the debtor had no sufficient excuse for not paying. As he did not grant the warrant, it is plain that he did not consider the circumstances then justified his complying with the application. But then he seems to have made the conjecture that in four months the circumstances might justify the granting of the warrant, and he continued the cause accordingly. That is a somewhat odd way of summarily disposing of such an application, and I think it was an incompetent way. The Sheriff might no doubt have continued the cause for a few days to give the debtor an opportunity of explaining his position. But the long continuation is fatal to the respondent, for it shews the Sheriff thought the warrant of imprisonment would not be justified by the facts as they then stood. His expectations as to the future were entirely speculative; and I do not think it right to keep a possible warrant of imprisonment hanging over a debtor's head for four months. There being no grounds for the warrant at the time, the application should have been dismissed. If the debtor's circumstances altered, the respondent could have presented a new application. That would entail none but the most infinitesimal trouble or expense upon the respondent.

May 31, 1892.
Cain v.
M'Colm.

I think the adjournment was incompetent, and upon that ground I am for granting suspension as craved.

LORD ADAM.—Imprisonment for debt was abolished generally by the Act of 1882, but it is still competent in certain exceptional circumstances. Imprisonment for nonpayment of aliment is regulated by section 4 and its subsections, and upon the application of these sections this case arises. The first question is one of fact, whether the debt the reclamer was decerned to pay was a debt for sums of aliment, or of expenses of process for the recovery of aliment, or not. If it was, there can be no question that a warrant of imprisonment might have been pronounced upon nonpayment. I have no doubt that the sum which was decerned for at the instance of a mother of an illegitimate child was for an alimentary debt, and therefore so far I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

But I agree with your Lordship that the procedure adopted was not justified by the Act, which, as your Lordship has pointed out, contemplates summary proceedings without written pleadings. The parties are to appear, and the Sheriff is there and then to consider whether warrant of imprisonment should be granted or whether the person decerned against has any good grounds of excuse. If the Sheriff thinks the circumstances justify warrant of imprisonment he should grant it, and if not he should refuse the application. The Sheriff here did not follow either course, but continued the petition for four months. Where was his warrant for doing that? What was the view of the Sheriff? Did he think he was to consider the state of the circumstances at the date of the application or the state of the circumstances which might exist in four months? I do not think there was any foundation for his procedure in the statute. He had no justification, if there were no grounds for then granting the warrant, for keeping the application hanging over the debtor's head for four months. There would be unfairness also to the person in whose favour the decree for aliment has been pronounced. She has a right at any time to apply for a warrant of imprisonment, and the application ought to be considered according to the circumstances at the time when the application is made. I:

this procedure were countenanced, that right would not exist, for suppose she applied and her application was refused, but continued for four months, then if the debtor's circumstances altered in one month, e.g., by his acquiring property, an application made by her would be met by the answer that there was a depending application which had been sisted for four months. No. 144.
May 31, 1892.
Cain v.
M'Colm.

Such procedure would thus be injurious to the debtor by keeping a possible warrant of imprisonment hanging over his head, and to the creditor by interfering with her right to apply for a warrant according to the circumstances of the time when she fancies she could make an application with success. I am for granting decree of suspension.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am satisfied that the Court in the case of Tevendale did not mean to decide anything except this—that right to a decree for aliment by assignation or other derivative title would not confer upon the person holding such decree, not being the person for whose benefit the aliment had been decreed, the right to enforce that decree by imprisonment. It does not appear that the Court meant to decide that imprisonment would be incompetent if arrears were mentioned. So to hold would, in my opinion, be contrary to the scope of the provisions of the Act for enforcing payment of aliment by means of imprisonment. I think the distinction cannot be maintained, and that a creditor is entitled to recover arrears by means of imprisonment against a debtor who has means at his disposal. The debtor always has the protection of the Sheriff if he can shew he is unable to pay.

I also agree with your Lordship in holding that the proceedings here are not in proper form, and are contrary to what the statute intended. Application for an order of imprisonment is to be summarily considered by the Sheriff with reference to the debt, and to the circumstances of the debtor, when the application is made. If the debtor by being out of work, or for any other sufficient reason, is not in a position to pay, then the motion—for it is nothing more—will be dismissed. The creditor may always apply again in case of a change of circumstances. I see no inconvenience in this, but great inconvenience in “continuing” such applications for a definite period.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled Lord Rutherford Clark's interlocutor of 25th April 1892, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to pass the note.

Reparation—Road—Unfenced road—Road trustees—Turnpike Roads Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43).—It is a question of circumstances whether an unfenced road with a drop of eight or nine feet at one side is so dangerous as to impose on the road trustees the duty of fencing the road, either at common law or under the Turnpike Roads Act, 1831.

An action of damages was raised at the instance of the widow and children of the deceased Robert Fraser against the Provost and Magistrates of Rothesay, being the Local Authority of the burgh, in respect of the death of the deceased, and also at the instance of the widow for

No. 145. damages in respect of personal injuries sustained by her through an accident at an unfenced portion of road within the burgh.

May 31, 1892.
Fraser v.
Magistrates of Rothesay.

The fault averred by the pursuers was that the defenders had failed in their duty of fencing the road—a duty imposed upon them at common law and by statute,* in respect that the part of the road in question was dangerous.

The case was tried before Lord Adam and a jury upon 20th, 22d, and 23d March 1892.

The following facts were proved. The deceased and his wife were on the evening of 29th August 1890 standing on the public road within the burgh of Rothesay, which led from Rothesay to Port Bannatyne, and which ran along the seashore. At the point at which they were standing there was a footpath on the side farthest from the sea, but none on the side nearest to the sea. The road was bounded and supported on the side nearest to the sea by a perpendicular retaining wall, the top of which was on the same level as the road, and the depth of the wall from the road to the shore beneath varied from about 8 to 9 feet, the shore below consisting of rock and shingle. There was no parapet fence or protection of any kind on the sea side of the road. Mr and Mrs Fraser were standing near the edge of the retaining wall looking out towards the sea. An open hackney carriage was being driven along the road at the time. When a short distance from Mr and Mrs Fraser, one of the wheels gave way, the horse ran off, and the horse, carriage, and its occupants were precipitated over the retaining wall on to the shore beneath. Mr and Mrs Fraser were swept over the wall, the former sustaining injuries from which he died in a few hours, and the latter suffering serious personal injury.

The jury returned a general verdict for the defenders.

The pursuers moved for a rule upon the defenders to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted, and argued that the bare fact of the existence of an unprotected drop of 8½ feet from the road to the shore pointed necessarily to the place being so dangerous as to impose an absolute obligation upon the defenders to have fenced it.

LORD ADAM.—One of the questions raised was, whether or not the particular part of the road where the accident happened was dangerous—in which case it was admitted that the defenders were bound both at common law and under the statute of Will. IV. to fence it.

On this question we had a large body of conflicting evidence. Witnesses were adduced who spoke to the condition of hundreds of miles of roads in the Highlands, in Argyllshire, Dumbartonshire, and in Ayrshire and other counties. Some of them said that roads like the present were always fenced, while others said that these roads were never fenced. I told the jury that I thought that evidence of little value, as we did not know the particulars of each case. There was also evidence on both sides of persons who were in the constant habit of using the road. That being so, it was for the jury to say whether they, taking all that evidence into consideration, and also the local circumstances, such as the breadth of the road, situation, lighting, and other surrounding circumstances, were of opinion that the road was in that particular part dangerous, and ought to have been fenced. I do not know what their opinion was for the verdict they returned is a general one. There was clearly a conflict of evidence, however, on the question whether the place was dangerous, and their verdict on the matter must be given effect to unless the pursuers can shew that the mere existence of a drop of $8\frac{1}{2}$ feet from the road to the beach involves necessarily a dangerous place. If that proposition could be maintained, the verdict is contrary to the weight of the evidence. I do not think, however, that it can be maintained. On the whole matter, I see no ground for interfering with the verdict.

* The Turnpike Roads (Scotland) Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43), sec. 94, enacts,—“And be it enacted that the trustees of every turnpike road shall erect sufficient parapet walls, mounds, or fences, or other adequate means of security along the sides of all bridges, embankments, or other dangerous parts of the said roads.”

No. 145.

Fraser v.

Magistrates of Rothsay.

LORD M'LAREN.—The chief question to which argument for the pursuers was addressed was, whether the jury were wrong in coming to the conclusion that the place where the accident happened was not a dangerous part of the road in the sense of the statute.

Now, the question whether a place is dangerous is so evidently a question of fact that it may be said to be a matter peculiarly within the province of a jury, and I should not be disposed to interfere with the finding of a jury on such a question, unless that finding should stand condemned as being contrary to facts of general knowledge and experience.

When we come to consider the description of the road in question, the case seems to me to be a very simple one indeed.

If it had been intended that every road supported on a retaining wall exceeding 8 feet in height should be fenced, it would have been easy to frame an enactment to this effect. From one's knowledge of the roads of this country, it would be impossible to carry out such a provision without very great expense to the counties. Accordingly, no such absolute burden is laid on these communities, but they are to take into consideration whether particular parts of a road may not be so dangerous as to require fencing in the interests of the safety of the public.

There may be long stretches of straight road carried to a height much exceeding the height of the road in question, which would in the opinion of most persons be quite safe, because if the road is of sufficient breadth there would be no occasion to drive near the edge, and carriages meeting on the road would pass each other at a walking pace. One has seen long stretches of such unfenced road in valleys in the Highlands and other mountainous districts of this country. On the other hand, there may be danger altogether irrespective of the height of the retaining wall. There is the case of a road carried along the slope of a valley, and where the road turns at an acute angle, so that the drivers of two approaching carriages could not see each other until they met at the angle. That might be held to be a very dangerous place, and a place which ought to be fenced irrespective of the height of the road. The whole question is one of circumstances and of degree, and even the amount of traffic on a road is an element of consideration on the question of danger.

Now, there are no specialties in this case tending to shew that the jury were wrong in the conclusion which they expressed in their verdict. They thought the road reasonably safe, and I am of opinion that no cause has been shewn for interfering with their judgment on the matter.

LORD KINKAR.—I am of the same opinion. The verdict for the defenders is general, and we cannot tell whether the jury found as they did because they thought that the place where the accident occurred was not a dangerous place which the defenders were bound to fence, or because they thought that

No. 145. although there ought to have been a fence, its absence did not cause or contribute to the accident. Either ground would have been sufficient to support the verdict, because the pursuers had to shew both that the defenders were in fault and also that their fault was the cause of the injury.

May 31, 1892.
Fraser v.
Magistrates of Rothsay.

Now, there is no question that there was evidence both ways upon the question whether the place was dangerous, and we cannot say that the verdict is wrong in so far as it negatives fault on any ground short of this, that irrespective altogether of the evidence of experts, and of the special circumstances of the case, a road with a perpendicular fall of $8\frac{1}{2}$ feet towards the sea beach is necessarily and in all cases so dangerous as to impose a duty upon the Road Trustees to fence it. I think it is impossible to come to such a conclusion, and I see no reason to interfere with the verdict, assuming what we have no means of knowing, that the jury meant to find that there was no fault on the part of the defenders.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question upon which the verdict of the jury is said to be wrong is the question whether the part of the road upon which this accident happened was dangerous. If it was dangerous, then at common law and under the Statute of 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 43, there would be an obligation upon the Local Authority to fence it. I say this because it is not suggested that this was a bridge or embankment, in which case there is no discretion given by the Act, for they must be fenced.

The question whether it was a dangerous part of the road was one which was most obviously an appropriate question for the jury. But in the speech which we have just heard we have had no analysis of the evidence. On the contrary, the case has been presented as if res ipsa loquitur upon the bare fact that there was a drop of $8\frac{1}{2}$ feet from the road to the shore.

In some places there might be particular facts as to local situation which would have aided the jury in arriving at an adverse conclusion; but they had here no case of that kind to deal with, and I think we should not be justified in granting a rule unless we came to the conclusion as matter of common sense that where there was an unprotected drop of $8\frac{1}{2}$ (or for that matter a drop or declivity of any substantial depth) from a road to a shore, there was an obligation upon the Local Authority to fence the road. To say this would be, in my opinion, to reach a preposterous and unreasonable conclusion, and one which would incidentally lead to the bankruptcy of all the Highland County Councils.

THE COURT refused the motion.

Public company—Reduction of capital—Process—Procedure in vacation— 49 Vict. c. 23, sec. 5.—Section 5 of the Act of 1886 amending the Companies Acts, enacts,—“Wherever the expression ‘Court of Session’ occurs in the said recited Acts” (i.e., the Companies Acts of 1862, 1867, 1877, 1879, 1880, and 1883), “or the expression ‘the Court’ occurring therein or in this Act refers to the Court of Session in Scotland, it shall mean and include either Division thereof, or, in the event of a remit to a permanent Lord Ordinary, as hereinafter provided, such Lord Ordinary during session, and in time of vacation the Lord Ordinary on the Bills.”

Held that the Lord Ordinary on the Bills has, under this section, jurisdiction to entertain in vacation a petition for confirmation of reduction of capital, and that although no remit has been made to a permanent Lord Ordinary.

On 25th March 1892 the Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, Limited, presented a petition for reduction of capital, and on 30th March the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Lord Stormonth Darling) ordered intimation, advertisement, and answers within ten days. The intimation and advertisement were duly made, and no answers were lodged.

On 25th April Lord Rutherford Clark, then Lord Ordinary on the Bills, on being informed that there were doubts as to the competency of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation to deal with such petitions, at least until a remit had been made to a Lord Ordinary, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the petition, and heard the agent for the petitioners, remits to Mr C. B. Logan, Writer to the Signet, to inquire and to report in regard to the statements in the petition, and the regularity of the proceedings."

On 12th May Mr Logan reported thus,—". . . I have not been able to find any instance of a similar petition for reduction of capital having been presented or proceeded with before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in time of vacation. The statutory provisions bearing upon this point are shortly these: Before the passing of the Companies Act of 1886 all petitions of the kind under the Companies Acts were presented to the Court, which, in Scotland, was defined by the Companies Act, 1862, sec. 81, to mean 'the Court of Session in either Division thereof.' By the Companies Act of 1867, which required a company reducing its capital to obtain the confirmation of such reduction by 'the Court,' the expression 'the Court' was, section 12, defined to mean 'the Court which has jurisdiction to make an order for winding up the petitioning company, and the 81st and 83d sections of the principal Act (the Act of 1862) shall be construed as if the term "winding-up" in those sections included proceedings under this Act.' The Act of 1886, sec. 5, enacts with regard to the jurisdiction of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation, that 'wherever the expression "the Court of Session" occurs in the said recited Acts, or the expression "the Court" occurring therein or in this Act refers to the Court of Session in Scotland, it shall mean and include either Division thereof, or, in the event of a remit to a permanent Lord Ordinary, as hereinafter provided, such Lord Ordinary during session, and in time of vacation the Lord Ordinary on the Bills'; and section 6 provides that 'when the Court makes a winding-up or a supervision order, or at any time thereafter, it shall be lawful for the Court, in either Division thereof, if it thinks fit, to direct all subsequent proceedings in the winding-up to be taken before one of the permanent Lords Ordinary, and to remit the winding-up to him accordingly; and thereupon such Lord Ordinary shall, for the purposes of the winding-up, be deemed to be "the Court" within the meaning of the recited Act and this Act, and shall have, for the purposes of such winding-up, all the jurisdiction and powers of the Court of Session.

"These are the main provisions of the statutes expressly bearing upon this point of procedure. By virtue of the last-mentioned statute there are various petitions under the Companies Acts which are remitted to Lords Ordinary, and which proceed in time of vacation before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, but, so far as I am aware, these have all been petitions in winding-up proceedings.

"The point of procedure in question depends upon the construction of section 5 of the Companies Act of 1886 above quoted, and it is, whether the expression 'the Court' or the 'Court of Session' occurring in the Companies Acts shall mean and include in time of vacation the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, in so far as regards a petition for confirmation of a reduction of capital, and if so whether the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation has such jurisdiction only after a remit has been made by either Division of the Court to a permanent Lord Ordinary.

"My attention has been called to a decision by Lord Shand, as Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation, in a petition, R. A. Macfie, for Liquidation of the Portobello Pier Company, Limited, in 1886, in which, after fully considering the meaning of the 5th section of the Act of 1886, his Lordship came to be of opinion that the enacting words of section 5 must be read as amounting to a declaration that when the expression 'the Court of Session,' or 'the Court,' occurs in the Joint Stock Companies Acts referring to the Courts of Scotland, it means and includes, in time of vacation, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills.

"Upon the whole matter, and subject to your Lordships' decision on the two questions regarding the rights of creditors and the procedure in vacation above referred to, I have to report that the proceedings otherwise have been regular and in conformity with the statutes. . . ."

ON the petition and report coming before the Second Division they granted the prayer of the petition without ordering intimation, service, and answers de novo.

JAMES MURDOCH, Respondent.—Johnston—G. W. Burnet.

Burgh—Common good—Harbour rates—Loan—Assignment and personal obligation in bond—Burgh Harbours (Scotland) Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 93), secs. 1, 17, 18, 19, and schedule B—3 Geo. IV. c. 91, sec. 11.—The town-council of a burgh which had adopted the Burgh Harbours (Scotland) Act, 1853, borrowed in terms of the Act a sum of money for the extension and improvement of the harbour of the burgh, and granted a bond and disposition in security to the lender, in the form of schedule B of the Act. The bond bore,—"We hereby bind the burgh to pay" to the lender the sum borrowed, ". . . and we hereby assign to him the rates authorised to be levied at the said harbour" by the Act.

The harbour rates having become insufficient to pay the interest on the bond, and the town-council having declined to pay it out of the common good of the burgh, the lender charged the burgh for payment.

In a suspension of the charge the complainers pleaded that the obligation in the bond was limited to the harbour rates.

The Court repelled the reasons of suspension, holding that the burgh was liable for the debt.

Ld. Stormonth

IN 1878, the Town-council of the royal burgh of Renfrew adopted the Burgh Harbours (Scotland) Act, 1853,* with reference to the harbour of Renfrew.

* The Burgh Harbours (Scotland) Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 93) bears—"Whereas the harbour and other dues leviable at the harbours belonging to many of the royal burghs in Scotland have, by reason of the change in the value of money and other causes, become inadequate for the maintenance of such harbours, and it is expedient that further provision should be made for the extension, improvement, and regulation of such harbours, and for the increase of the rates and duties leviable thereat: Be it enacted . . . as follows
"1. This Act may be adopted and applied in manner hereinafter provided in an

At a meeting of the magistrates and town-council of the burgh held on 2d August 1886, they resolved to borrow from James Murdoch £1300 for the extension and improvement of the harbour, and a bond and assignation in security was then granted in the form of schedule (B) of the Act of 1853, and was in the following terms:—"The royal burgh of Renfrew has this day borrowed the sum of £1300 from James Murdoch, . . . for the extension and improvement of the harbour of the said burgh, which sum we hereby bind the said burgh to pay to the said James Murdoch, his heirs, executors, and assignees, at the term of Whitsunday 1891, within the council chambers of the said burgh, with interest thereof at the rate of £4, 10s. per centum per annum from the date hereof . . . and we hereby assign to the said James Murdoch and his foresaids the rates authorised to be levied at the said harbour by the Act 16th and 17th Victoria, chap. 93d, entitled an Act to enable burghs in Scotland to maintain and improve their harbours, in security of the repayment of the foresaid sums, principal and interest, which are hereby declared a lien on the said rates: And we consent to the registration hereof for preservation and execution: In witness whereof these presents . . . are subscribed by Daniel Wright, provost, Thomas Anderson, treasurer, and the said William Herron, town-clerk foresaid of the said burgh, at an open meeting of the town-council thereof at Renfrew on the 2d day of August in the year 1886, before these witnesses," &c.

The deed was recorded in the minute-book of the town-council on 3d August 1886.

Section 17 enacts,—“From and after the adoption of this Act in any burgh, the whole future revenue of the harbour shall be applied and expended by the town-council in the maintenance, improvement, and extension of the harbour, and in no other way and for no other purpose whatsoever. . . .”

Section 18 (with the rubric, “Town-council may borrow money on security of rates”) enacts,—“It shall be lawful for the town-council from time to time to borrow, for the purposes of extending or improving the harbour, such sum or sums as they shall deem expedient, Provided always that intimation shall be given by the town-council of their intention to borrow money by the insertion of a notice to that effect, and stating the sum proposed to be borrowed once in a newspaper published in the burgh one month at least before the meeting of the town-council at which it is intended to authorise the borrowing of such sum: Provided also that the resolution to borrow shall be approved of by at least two-thirds of the members of the council who are present at such meeting, and that the whole sums so borrowed or advanced shall be applied and expended in the extension and improvement of the harbour, and in no other way, and for no other purpose whatsoever.”

Section 19 provides,—“The bonds and assignations to be granted for securing the repayment of the sums to be borrowed or advanced as aforesaid shall be in the form of the schedule (B) hereunto annexed, or as near as may be, and shall be signed by the provost or acting chief magistrate of the burgh, and by the treasurer and town-clerk, at an open meeting of the town-council, and two of the councillors present shall sign as witnesses thereto, and such bonds and assignations shall be recorded in the minute-books of the town-council, and until repayment of the sums so borrowed or advanced, and interest thereon, such sums, and the bonds and assignations granted therefor respectively, shall form a lien on the rates by this Act authorised to be levied preferable to all other debts and claims against the burgh, and the creditors in right of such sums shall be entitled to receive the same from the town-council and their officers out of the first and readiest of such rates.”

was not sufficient to pay the interest on the bond, and the town-council refused to pay it out of the common good.

Murdoch having charged the burgh and the provost and the other members of the town-council as members of the town-council for payment, they presented a note of suspension of the charge, and the note having been passed, a record was made up.

The complainers averred, inter alia, that the respondent's loan was secured over the harbour rates under sections 18 and 19 of the Act of 1853, that the forms at common law, and under Sir William Rae's Act, (3 Geo. IV. c. 91, sec. 11),* for burdening or affecting the common good, were not followed nor intended to be followed in the security granted to the respondent under the Act; that they were willing to pay him out of the first and readiest of the harbour rates, if these yielded sufficient funds, which they did not. That although the burgh was possessed of considerable common good, there was a heavy debt upon it. They further averred;—"The burgh in session 1878-79 promoted unsuccessfully a private bill for power to give the security of the common good, in addition to the harbour rates, in loans to the extent of £20,000 for the extension and improvement of the harbour."

The respondent maintained that the requirements of Sir William Rae's Act had been complied with, and that the obligation in the bond was binding upon the complainers as against the common good, which was amply sufficient to repay him.

The complainers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The charger's security being limited to the harbour rates, and there being no such funds to meet his charge, the complainers are entitled to suspension. (2) The charge being given wrongfully, for the purpose of attaching the common good or other funds of the burgh, in and to which the charger has no right, the same should be suspended.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The complainers' statements are irrelevant and insufficient to warrant suspension of the charge. (2) In respect of the personal obligation of the said royal burgh, contained in the bond upon which the charge now sought to be suspended proceeds, the charge, being orderly proceeded, ought not to be suspended, and, in any event, can only be suspended upon caution or consignment of the sum due under the bond.

On 17th February 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) repelled the reasons of suspension, found the warrants and charge orderly proceeded, and decerned.†

* 3 Geo. IV. c. 91, sec. 11,—“It shall not be lawful for the magistrates or the town-council of any burgh to contract any debt, grant any obligation, make any agreement, or enter into any engagement which shall have the effect of binding them or their successors in office, unless an act of council shall have been previously made in that behalf; and any such contract, obligation, agreement, or engagement, made or entered into without such act of council, shall be void and null as against the common good of the burgh, or the succeeding magistrates or town-council thereof, without prejudice nevertheless to the personal liability and responsibility of the persons by whom the same may have been made or entered into.”

† “OPINION.— . . . The question is, does this obligation extend to the whole burgh property (except, of course, such as is specially appropriated to other purposes), or is it limited to the harbour rates?

“In support of the latter view the complainers are not able to point to any express words of limitation in the statute, but they appeal to its general scope and tenor, and especially to the dedication of the whole future revenue of the harbour to harbour purposes, and the provision that the lenders shall be entitled to get their money out of the first and readiest of the rates.

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—The obligation contained in No. 147.
the bond did not extend to the common good of the burgh. The bond

Royal Burgh
of Renfrew v.
Murdoch.

"In order to test this argument it is necessary to consider what was the state of the law as regards burghs having a grant of harbour before the passing of the Act. The harbour and its dues formed a part of the common good. The right to levy dues had its counterpart in the obligation to maintain and improve the harbour, but the dues could not be increased without statutory authority, and the burgh could not be compelled to expend its general funds for harbour purposes. If, however, it chose to do so, the debt so incurred was, I apprehend, an ordinary debt of the burgh, and was recoverable out of the common good, provided the proceedings were taken in compliance with Sir William Rae's Act (3 Geo. IV. cap. 91, sec. 11).

"In that state of matters the Act was passed, on the preamble that the dues leviable at many of the burgh harbours in Scotland had, by reason of the change in the value of money and other causes, become inadequate for the maintenance of such harbours. The contemplation of the statute was not that harbours were a source of revenue to burghs but that they were either a burden, if properly maintained, or, if not, that they had fallen into a condition of disrepair. The leading purpose, therefore, was to improve the harbours, and as a means to that end to raise the rates. It would have been rather surprising if the Act had not taken care to provide that the increased rates should be entirely devoted to harbour purposes. But that seems to me to afford no ground for holding that if a burgh chose to adopt the Act (which it was not bound to do) and chose to borrow money (which it was not bound to do) the common good should be relieved of all responsibility for the money so borrowed. Presumably before the Act was passed the common good derived no benefit from the existence of the harbour. Assuredly after the adoption of the Act it could derive none. But the general prosperity of the burgh might gain largely by the harbour being put into a satisfactory state, and it might be a perfectly prudent act of administration in the true interests of the community to pledge the common good for such a purpose. That was the view of municipal policy which led to the enactment of section 7 of the Public Works Loan Act of 1882, and that was the view which the burgh of Renfrew itself took when it promoted unsuccessfully in session 1878-79 the private bill mentioned in cond. 6. I think the burgh was wrongly advised in supposing such a bill to be necessary, but the mere fact of its introduction is enough to shew that, in the estimation of the municipal authorities, the common good might well be burdened with liability for harbour loans, though it could derive no direct pecuniary benefit from harbour expenditure.

"Neither do I think that the provisions in the statute for assigning the rates in security of harbour loans necessarily or even naturally imply that no other fund is available for repayment. Where a harbour authority has no property except the works and the rates which they produce (as in the case of the Elgin and Lossiemouth Harbour Company, 6 R. 987, and the Greenock Harbour Trustees, 15 R. 343) the fund for repayment and the subject of security may be one and the same. But in such cases the document granted to the lender is simply an 'assignment,' not as here a 'bond and assignation.' The case is very different where the harbour belongs to a body like a burgh having other funds of its own. The natural meaning of binding a burgh to repay money is that the existing town-council and their successors in office are to make forthcoming the whole available property of the burgh, and there is nothing inconsistent with that in assigning a particular portion of the property of the burgh as a security to the lender. I think it would require either express words, or (to use Lord Eldon's classical phrase) 'implication plain,' to limit the effect of general words of obligation. Admittedly the statute contains no such express words, and the implication seems to me to be all the other way.

"I assent to the complainers' argument that the respondent's bond derives its whole efficacy from the statute, and that apart from the statute it would not be in a form to bind the burgh or to affect the common good. But the bond is in was framed in terms of the Act of 1853, the scope of which, looking especially to sections 17 and 19, was to set aside a particular specific fund, viz., the harbour rates, as the security which was to be given to lenders who advanced money for the improvement of harbours. It seemed naturally to follow that there was an implied exclusion of other funds under the control of the burgh. The personal obligation in the bond was merely to make harbour rates forthcoming if there were any. But beyond that, the bond was not in the form employed at common law,¹ where the credit of the common good of a burgh was pledged, and the requirements of Sir William Rae's Act had not been complied with so as to support a claim against the corporation funds. There was no "act of council . . . previously made in that behalf," in the sense of section 11 of the Act. The charge then could not be given for the purpose of attaching the common good of the burgh, and fell to be suspended.

Argued for the respondent;—The statutory obligation in the bond was a personal one, binding the burgh to repay the sum borrowed out of the whole available property of the burgh, and that was in no way inconsistent with assigning a particular portion of the burgh property, viz., the harbour rates, as an additional security to the lender. It was to be observed that where harbour rates were alone assigned as security for a loan, e.g., in cases where the property of the harbour authorities consisted in their works and rates, it was customary to grant in the document to the lender merely an "assignation" with no personal obligation.² The bond then framed as it was under schedule (B) of the Act of 1853 was in a form to bind the burgh and to affect the common good. In this view it mattered not whether the forms prescribed by Sir William Rae's Act had been followed exactly. The 1853 Act was obviously intended to abrogate the former Act. But apart from that, the minute of 2d August was a sufficient compliance with section 11 of that Act.³ There was nothing special in the words an "act of council in that behalf." They merely meant "a resolution for that purpose," and were intended to provide for obtaining (as had been done here) the consents of the representatives of the corporation authorised to bind the corporation.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The bond out of which this dispute has arisen was granted by the burgh of Renfrew in terms of the Burgh Harbours Act of 1853. That bond is acknowledged to be in conformity with the schedule prescribed in the Act of 1853. It, like the schedule, consists of two operative clauses, and two only. One is—"We"—being the Magistrates—"hereby bind the said burgh to pay to the said James Murdoch" the sum borrowed, and so on; and the second clause is—"We hereby assign to the said James Murdoch the rates authorised to be levied at the said harbour" under the statute named.

Now, it cannot be disputed that, occurring anywhere else, the plain legal effect of the words—"We hereby bind the said burgh"—these words being used by the Magistrates, the proper custodiers of the burgh estate—is to bind the whole burgh estate.

the form prescribed by the statute, and the whole question is as to the effect of a bond so conceived. In the solution of that question it is of no moment to say that it is not in the form prescribed by the earlier Act of 3 Geo. IV. c. 91.

"I am therefore of opinion that the charge was orderly proceeded, and that the note of suspension must be refused."

³ Leslie v. Magistrates of Dundee, Dec. 2, 1840, 3 D. 164, 13 Scot. Jur. 59.

But then it is said that occurring as these words do in this statutory form, they must be held to have some meaning different from and short of their proper and natural legal import. I am decidedly against that contention. I assent to the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship has first considered how the matter stood before the Act of 1853, and then what effect the Act of 1853 has upon a bond so conceived. There is no doubt that prior to the Act of 1853—and I take leave to say since the Act of 1853 also—a bond granted in the terms I have read would unquestionably have affected the last shilling of the burgh's property, the only condition of that being (what really does not weaken the general force of the statement), that the burgh complied with the requisite formalities which entitle it to affect the common estate, including, among others, the provision of the Act of Sir William Rae.

No. 147.

Royal Burgh
of Renfrew v.
Murdoch.

When the Act of 1853 was passed, it no doubt provided for certain rates being levied, and the rates being applied in a particular way, and for publication being made of the accounts of the harbour, other persons than burgesses being interested in seeing that the receipts of the harbour were properly applied, and the disbursements made in accordance with the general interests which are attended to by this Act of 1853. But the Act of 1853, when it comes to deal with the subject of borrowing money, recognises this separate fund arising from the dues, and it authorises the magistrates when they borrow money to assign those rates in security of the loans. That is given effect to in what I have called the second clause of the statutory form—the assignment of the rates. But then the statute says you are not merely to assign the rates, you are to bind the burgh in payment of the money.

Now, the contention of the reclaimers is that those words are to receive no effect whatever—that is to say, they say that the legal effect of this instrument, composed as it is of two parts—one a personal obligation and the other an assignment—is to be just the same as if it consisted of but one of them—that is to say, an assignment and no personal obligation.

The Legislature is familiar with appropriate forms of giving a creditor that limited amount of right over his debtor's estate, because in numerous Scottish and English Harbour Acts there are provisions for the document which is given to the creditor containing simply an acknowledgment that his money has been received and an assignment of the rates. That is the sort of case which occurred with reference to the Elgin and Lossiemouth Harbour, which is mentioned by the Lord Ordinary here. There the style was:—"We," the magistrates, "in consideration of the sum of advanced to us by

, do hereby sell, assign, and make over to the said aforesaid, the harbour and other works and rates," &c.

Therefore, if that is the thing to be done, and a limited right is to be conferred upon the creditor, then the Legislature does not bring in absurdly inappropriate words of obligation upon the burgh, but simply confines itself to what is the latter part of this bond.

Now, it appears to me that we should be treating pro non scripto the words which the Act of Parliament has ordered shall be put into this bond, if we were to give effect to the reclaimers' contention. It appears to me, it being admitted that the legal result of those words used elsewhere is to bind the common good, that no other legal effect is intended by those words when they occur in this statutory form.

I have only to add as regards Sir William Rae's Act,—and this is quite a separate matter,—that the provisions of Sir William Rae's Act have been complied with in the present instance. It may be that the Act of 1853, by prescribing certain formalities which are to be gone through, covers the same ground as Sir William Rae's Act, and supersedes those provisions in Sir William Rae's Act; on the other hand, it may be that in prescribing those forms, which may still hold, the Legislature did not intend to abrogate or affect the provisions in Sir William Rae's Act. Whichever alternative is taken, I do not think it is of the least importance here, because Sir William Rae's Act has been complied with. There has been an act of council authorising the granting a bond to Mr James Murdoch in this form. Therefore I do not think the question arises. It would seem to be difficult to comply with the Act of 1853 without complying with the Act of 1822, but upon that I do not pronounce, because there seems to me abundant and clear ground for decision apart from that altogether.

LORD ADAM.—The 18th section of the Burgh Harbours Act empowers town-councils, for the purpose of extending and improving harbours, to borrow money, provided certain intimation be given and certain procedure gone through, and the 19th section provides the form, in the schedule appended thereto, which may be granted for the money the magistrates are authorised to borrow, and it is not disputed that the various formalities or requisites which the town-council had to go through, as specified by the Act, have been fulfilled. It is not disputed that the bond, which has been granted to the respondent for the money borrowed from him, is exactly in terms of the schedule appended to the Act, and is such as the Act authorises to be granted for the sum so borrowed. That being so, it appears to me that all we have to do is to apply our minds to the construction of this bond and disposition in security, as we would to the construction of any other bond and disposition in security granted for borrowed money, which the granters of the bond were lawfully entitled to grant. It appears to me, as plain as words can be, that the royal burgh of Renfrew bound and obliged themselves to repay at Whitsunday 1891 the sum which they borrowed from this gentleman. It is not disputed that this is a bond good in form and well executed, and the effect of the obligation is to make the common good liable for this loan. And all that is said against putting the ordinary construction on it is that, in addition to the authority to borrow and the obligation to pay, the magistrates are to give a preferable security over certain rates, and we are asked to say that where that security is given the security is to control the words of the bond, and that the creditor in the bond has no other right, or no other fund to look to than these rates so given to him in security. It would require a great deal of argument to persuade me that that is the sound construction of this bond. I think it is not the sound construction. There is here an obligation, validly entered into by the magistrates of the burgh of Renfrew to repay this sum, and the assignation of the rates is simply in security of that repayment.

LORD M'LAREN.—The royal burgh of Renfrew is a municipal corporation, constituted, I suppose, by royal charter, as its name implies. I take it to be quite settled in the law of Scotland that every municipal corporation, by going through proper forms, may come under a personal obligation to creditors, and that it is not necessary that the creditor should prove value as a condition of enforcing that obligation.

Now, when the Legislature authorised municipal corporations not only to No. 147.
pledge the harbour rates, but also to use obligatory language binding the burgh June 2, 1892.
in express terms for payment of the debt, I can give no other construction to Royal Burgh such authority but that it meant the obligation to receive all the effect which of Renfrew v. an obligation by corporations should have according to the law of Scotland. Murdoch.
Such an obligation would certainly not render the corporators liable to personal diligence, but it would be the foundation of diligence against the estate of the corporation, and it is in order that it may receive such effect, I presume, that this charge has been given. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that no grounds have been shewn for suspending the charge, and I agree that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think, if the Act of Parliament had done nothing more than would appear from the rubric to section 18, and authorised the town-council to borrow money on the security of the rates, that there might have been a great deal to be said for the argument that that did not imply any authority to charge a loan upon any other fund except the rates, but, on the contrary, withheld by implication any such authority, and that therefore if the obligation upon any other fund were imposed in execution of the power given by the Act, it must be supported by some prior and wider powers, and not by the powers given by the Act itself. But then when one passes from the rubric to read the statute itself one finds, in the first place, there is a general power given to the burgh to borrow, and then in the 19th section the burgh is not only authorised but required to grant a bond for the sums so borrowed in a certain form, and when you come to the form and find that the obligation which they are required by the statute to give is an obligation not merely affecting the rates, but affecting the burgh itself, then it appears to me that the question is at an end. I agree with your Lordship that the magistrates being required by Act of Parliament to bind the burgh, that obligation must receive all the effect which any other obligation duly undertaken on behalf of the burgh will receive according to the law of Scotland.

It is said that its effect must be limited, because the word "burgh" as used in this Act of Parliament means merely the corporation qua harbour trustees, and therefore the obligation imposed upon the burgh by the Act is an obligation not upon the common good or upon the magistrates in their general capacity, but upon the harbour trustees. But, in the first place, we are not construing an Act of Parliament, we are construing a bond which the Act of Parliament requires to be executed; and while the burgh is taken bound to make a certain payment, there is nothing in the terms of the bond to qualify or limit the obligation. The words must, therefore, receive their ordinary signification. In the second place, the definition of the word burgh confines the operation of the statute to the case of burghs possessing a harbour which is not regulated by a local Act. But although the burgh must answer that description there is nothing to suggest that its obligations are to affect the harbour only, to the exclusion of the common good. They affect the burgh as well as the rates.

I only add that the complainers' obligation depends for its efficacy entirely on the Act of Parliament of 1853. I think it is most probable that apart from that Act it might have been supported by Sir William Rae's Act, but I think

No. 147. it is satisfactory to find that the Act of 1853 is sufficient to support the obligation.

Reparation—Safety of the public—Machinery—Latent defect—Onus—
A carter engaged in the discharge of stones from a lorry in the premises of a marble-merchant, not his employer, was killed by the fall of a derrick crane. In an action of damages raised by the deceased's father against the marble-merchant, it was proved that the cause of the accident was the breaking through crystallisation of an iron strap, by which the stay of the crane was attached to the concrete foundation, and that the defect was latent. It was also proved that two years before the accident the upper strap of the crane had also snapped from a similar cause; that the owner of the crane had thereupon sent it to a competent engineer, who, after thorough examination, had used the lower strap in its reconstruction; that since that date the defender's foreman had periodically inspected it in the ordinary way, and that nothing had happened to suggest the necessity of any special inspection. The Court assolized the defender, holding that the pursuer had failed to prove fault.

Observations upon the onus of proof where an accident happens owing to a latent defect in machinery.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen,
Kincardine,
and Banff.

IN July 1891 Alexander Milne, carter, Aberdeen, raised an action of damages for £500 against W. C. Townsend, granite and marble-merchant there, for the loss of his son, who had been killed on 21st April owing to the fall of a crane while he was engaged as a carter in the employment of Mutter, Howey, & Company, in discharging a lorry laden with stones at the defender's yard.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 3) "The cause of the accident was the snapping or giving way of an iron bar which fastened one of the crane stays to the ground, and the defect could have easily been discovered upon a fit and careful examination of the crane by the defender, and it was the duty of the defender to examine this iron bar so minutely as to enable him to see a crack which was there, and so to prevent the mischief. Besides, the machine was unfit for the purpose for which it was applied, and therefore defective in its condition and construction." (Cond. 4) "Separatim, If it was not the duty of the defender in ordinary circumstances, it became his duty so to minutely examine the said iron bar after he knew the crane was defective. The crane broke down on four occasions, and two men were injured by it. When repairing the defects on these occasions it was the duty of the defender to have had the crane made complete in every way, and to have seen that it was put in a fit condition to work, as such a state of things called for the exercise of greater vigilance than ordinary on the part of the defender."

The defender pleaded;—The accident having occurred through a latent defect in the machinery belonging to the defender, the defender is not liable in any reparation to the pursuer.

The following was the import of the proof:—

The crane was originally erected in 1887, when the sole-plate, upon which the uprights stood, gave way, and was replaced by a thicker sole-plate. In June 1889 the top iron strap or bar gave way and the crane came down and injured a workman. The crane was then handed over to John Sangster, the engineer who had constructed and erected it. He examined it, and found that the iron of the broken strap was much crystallised. Finding the lower strap in sound condition he used it in the reconstruction of the crane. Shortly before the accident the jib-rope gave way, and the jib came down, but that was not due to any deficiency in the crane. The exact cause of the break-down of the crane was a matter of speculation, but in the opinion of the majority of the witnesses a crack which was visible on the surface of the iron strap was due to crystallisation of the iron, by which the fibrous textures of the metal became granular and breakable.* It was doubtful whether a close inspection in 1889 could have revealed the crack, and it was probable that the process of crystallisation had not then commenced. In order to discover the defect

* J. M. Henderson, a witness for the pursuer, deponed,—“I am an engineer. I have been an engineer for six-and-twenty years. The defender's crane was brought to me on the 24th of April 1891. The straps and woodwork are broken up. I have seen No. 8 of process before. When I saw it after it was newly broken, it shewed an old break. The crack was over a third of the surface. It had been there for some little time, because it was discoloured. It is possible that a common blacksmith could have detected it, but it is very difficult to detect a flaw from the exterior. If a person had been scraping it, and looking close, he might have detected it. They might have seen it if they had scraped off the dirt and the paint. I know that this crane gave way a year or a year and a-half before, because I was asked to contract for it, but I put in an offer prohibitive of its being accepted. I did so purposely. I did not wish to have anything to do with that crane. . . . If the crane had been sent to my workshop after the upper strap had broken, I should have thought it necessary to have examined the lower strap. I should have heated it, because that is the only practical way of examining it. . . . If a crane had been thoroughly overhauled in June 1889, it would be unusual for the foreman to examine it by scraping between that date and April 1891, if there was nothing to create suspicion. Had I repaired the crane in June 1889, I would not have expected it to be looked to between that time and April 1891. . . . In taking the case of a young crane, a competent foreman would go over the iron work every two years, and before painting it, he would scrape it, and examine it for cracks. That, in my opinion, would be sufficient supervision.”

John A. Sangster, a witness for the defender, deponed,—“I got the crane to repair again in June 1889. On that occasion the upper strap was broken. My instructions then were to put it in thorough working order. I went over the crane then and examined the strap. I examined the lower strap as well as all the other parts of the crane. I satisfied myself at that time that there was no defect in the lower strap. The same lower strap was used in the reconstruction of the crane. I was quite satisfied with the lower strap. The quality of the lower strap is scrap iron. That is the usual quality used by Glasgow and Edinburgh makers. I have erected twenty-four cranes of this size in Aberdeen and district. I have employed the same quality of iron in the other cranes I have erected. I have examined the strap since the breakage. . . . From an examination of the fracture I could not say that it was discoverable. Wood covered the upper surface of the strap, and part of the bolt covered the lower surface of the strap, and I don't think that the crack could be seen by examination. There was no other way to discover a defect of this sort except by heating. I don't think scraping would have made the crack visible, unless there had been some weight upon the crane so as to open the crack. After what I had done to the crane in 1889, I don't think an employer would be looking for a crack in April 1891. We often find in a bar of even the best iron that part of it is fibrous and part crystalline. You can only discover that in breaking it cold. I see that the strap has been painted. I do not think when it was painted that it would have been possible to discover this crack.”

James Cosgrove, the defender's foreman, deponed,—“I did not discover the defect before the accident. I don't think it could have been discovered. There was nothing to obstruct the view. The crack could have been seen if it was apparent. . . . I have many times examined the strap in question.”

it would have been necessary to scrape off the painting upon the strap and to have heated the iron. In the opinion of the witnesses it was unnecessary, in view of the overhauling of the crane in 1889, to have had a second examination in 1891. It was also proved that the foreman examined the crane periodically after 1889.

On 14th November 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton Grierson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the defender's crane was erected in 1887; (2) that the sole-plate provided upon which the uprights stood gave way, that the crane did not come down, and that the defect was rectified; (3) that in June 1889 the top strap gave way, and that the crane came down and injured one of the workmen; (4) that immediately thereafter the defender, through his manager and foreman, instructed Mr John A. Sangster to put the crane into thorough working order; (5) that Mr Sangster examined all the parts of the crane, that he satisfied himself that there was no defect in the lower strap, and that it was used in the reconstruction of the crane; (6) that the strap was made of scrap iron of a suitable quality, depth, breadth, and form; (7) that the crane after its re-erection was painted, and that the straps were painted; (8) that some time afterwards the jib-rope gave way and the jib came down, that that accident was not due to any deficiency in the crane other than in the jib-rope, and that a new jib-rope was put up; (9) that between June 1889 and 21st April 1891 the foreman on several occasions inspected the lower strap, and observed no defect in it; (10) that while the upper surface of the strap was covered by the guy, and part of the lower surface by the nut of the bolt which passed through the hole where the breakage eventually occurred, the sides of the strap and part of the lower surface were open to inspection; (11) that on the 21st April 1891 the lower strap gave way and the crane came down, killing the pursuer's son; (12) that at the time of the accident there was no stone or other weight attached to the lifting apparatus of the crane; (13) that between the date of the re-erection of the crane and the date of the accident there was nothing in the appearance of the crane, or any part of it, or in the manner in which it worked, to suggest any suspicion to those using it or superintending it that it was defective in any respect in any part of its construction, except as stated in the eighth finding of this interlocutor; and (14) that part of the material of the strap, at the part where the breakage occurred, had become crystalline, and that this could not be discovered by inspection of the external surfaces: Finds in law that the defender is not liable to the pursuer in damages in respect of the death of the said pursuer's son: Therefore assoilzies the said defender from the conclusions in the prayer of the petition," &c.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, and pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it proved that on 21st April 1891 a crane in the defender's yard fell in consequence of its being defective and insufficient, and killed the pursuer's son, who was lawfully on the premises at the time, and that said insufficiency was due to the fault of the defender: Finds the defender liable in damages: assesses the same at the sum of £150," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The crane which caused this accident has had an unfortunate history. Erected in 1887, the sole-plate gave way, and had to be replaced with a thicker plate. In June 1889 the upper strap gave way, the crane came down and broke a man's leg. Next, the jib-rope gave way, the jib came down, and some men narrowly escaped. Lastly, in April 1891 the lower strap gave way, the crane came down, and killed the pursuer's son, who happened to be then delivering a load of stones on behalf of his employers, Mutter, Howey, & Company. These facts (in the absence of explanation) are, in my opinion, sufficient

The defender appealed, and argued ;—The Sheriff's judgment proceeded upon the previous history of the crane, and upon the fact that the defender had not discarded the lower strap when the upper one was found to have become crystalline. The best answer to this was that he had, after to condemn the crane as originally defective. It appears that when the crane fell in June 1889 the cause was found to be weakness and insufficiency in the upper strap. In the opinion of some of the witnesses, the strap was too light, but a much more serious flaw was found by Mr Sangster, the original maker, to whom it was sent for repair. On examining the broken strap he found it very much crystallised—that is to say, the fibrous textures of the metal, in about thirty months after it was put up, had become granular, a condition which naturally ended in rupture. A man of skill would see at once the great importance of this fact as affecting the sufficiency of the remaining strap, for if the upper strap betrayed traces of crystallisation, it was reasonable to infer that the same process, incipient or developed, was likewise in operation in the lower strap. Whether the crystallisation was due to strain, vibration, weather, or temperature, or all combined—a point on which metallurgists, I believe, are not agreed—is of no consequence. The causes, whatever they were, had both straps equally under their influence ; the iron came from the same workshop—possibly the same piece ; and the condition of both straps would be the same. It is now ascertained that this was the actual fact. According to Mr Garvie, a witness for the defender, who examined the lower strap after the break of 1891, the right-hand side at the breakage was fibrous, and the left-hand side crystalline, and there was a crack distinctly visible which had existed for a length of time. Assuming then that the pursuer's witnesses are wrong in thinking that the strap was too light for the work it had to do, I see no answer to the argument that Mr Sangster, when he had the defender's instructions to give the crane a complete overhaul, should have discarded both the old straps, and not run the risk of again employing the one which had not given way, but which has led to a second accident exactly the same as the first.

"It was said that no man can be held responsible for a latent flaw, and if by 'latent' is meant something which is neither preventible in the original process of manufacture nor discoverable when in use, I agree. The case of Redhead v. Millard Railway Company, 2 Q. B. 412, is an example of a flaw of this kind. But no person reading the evidence in this case can say that there were not strong grounds for rejecting this particular piece of iron, on which was to depend the stability of the whole structure, when the crane came to be re-erected in 1889. The maker had either knowledge, or the means of knowledge, of the risk he was running and the risk he was exposing others to, and the neglect to act on this knowledge was negligence.

"Such being my conclusions on the facts, I think the defender must be held responsible for the insufficiency of the crane. . . . We must apply the principle which was applied in a case from this Court (Walker v. Olsen, 9 R. 946), namely, res ipsa loquitur. A crane does not come down when lifting anything without some cause. It is not for the injured person to explain what the cause was. It is for the owner to shew that the crane was not defective when first put up, and that there had been no want of supervision to detect any supervening flaw. I acquit the defender of any failure on the latter head. I think his foreman did examine it periodically without detecting any signs of weakness ; but I think he has failed to prove that in the selection of material for its construction adequate care was taken to insure its strength and guard against the possibility of accident when it was re-erected in 1889.

"The only other question is whether, when such a failure has been proved, is it enough for the owner to say that he put it into the hands of a competent tradesman to be put into thorough repair? The case of Cleghorn v. Taylor, 18 D. 564, read along with Tarry v. Ashton, 1 Q. B. D. 314, decides that the person injured has no concern with the tradesman. The owner is the person with whom he has to deal, and I have accordingly been obliged to find the defender liable in damages."

the accident in 1889, sent the crane to the original maker to be overhauled. The latter found the strap in question quite sound, and used it in the reconstruction of the crane, and from that time onward the defender's foreman periodically examined the crane. The accident was due to a latent defect, which it was proved could only have been revealed by scraping and heating the iron—a precautionary operation quite unnecessary in view of the recent examination. The Sheriff was wrong in applying the maxim res ipsa loquitur so as to relieve the pursuer of the onus of proving his case. The law had settled that where an accident occurred through latent defect, it was for the pursuer to shew that the defect was known to the maker or user of the machine, or that it was discoverable by careful inspection.¹ Although it was perhaps hard to reconcile *Walker v. Olsen*² and *Fraser v. Fraser*³ with that doctrine, these cases had been explained in Macfarlane v. Thomson.⁴ The onus then being upon the pursuer he had failed to discharge it.

Argued for the pursuer;—It had been held, even where the exact cause of an accident was unexplained, that fault might be inferred from the accident itself as attaching to the owner of the defective apparatus.⁵ Here, however, the accident was clearly proved to have been caused by the iron of the strap becoming crystalline. When in 1889 the upper strap was found to be in this condition, the lower strap should have been discarded, and the defender was in fault in continuing to use it. The accident was one which in the circumstances might have been anticipated,⁶ and it was no defence to say that the defender had employed a competent tradesman to repair the crane in 1889.⁷

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Sheriff has found it proved that this crane fell “in consequence of its being defective and insufficient, and that said insufficiency was due to the fault of the defender,” and he has fully explained the grounds of his judgment. I desire specially to refer to the passage in his note where he says—“Res ipsa loquitur. A crane does not come down when lifting nothing without some cause. It is not for the injured person to explain what the cause was. It is for the owner to shew that the crane was not defective when first put up, and that there had been no want of supervision to detect any supervening flaw. I acquit the defender of any failure on the latter head. I think his foreman did examine it periodically without detecting any signs of weakness; but I think he has failed to prove that in the selection of material for its construction adequate care was taken to insure its strength and guard against the possibility of accident when it was re-erected in 1889.”

Now, as that passage is somewhat absolutely expressed, it is perhaps well to say that I do not read it as intended to lay down a general doctrine of law, and rule for the owner to shew that his appliances are not defective when an accident occurs,—the burden of proof is on the person coming to the Court and June 3, 1892.

alleging fault. Accordingly, I read this somewhat general statement along with Milne v. Townsend.

the more specific passage on the preceding page, where the learned Sheriff says —“According to Mr Garvie, a witness for the defender, who examined the lower strap after the break of 1891, the right-hand side at the breakage was fibrous, and the left-hand side crystalline, and there was a crack distinctly visible which had existed for a length of time. Assuming, then, that the pursuer's witnesses are wrong in thinking that the strap was too light for the work it had to do, I see no answer to the argument that Mr Sangster, when he had the defender's instructions to give the crane a complete overhauling, should have discarded both the old straps, and not run the risk of again employing the one which had not given way, but which has led to a second accident exactly the same as the first.”

Now, the first question to be determined is, what was in fact the cause of the collapse of the crane? The Sheriffs are at one on this matter, for the Sheriff takes the same view as that expressed by the Sheriff-substitute in his fourteenth finding in fact, which is to the effect that the strap broke through the iron becoming crystalline. I am willing to take that view of what is more or less a speculative question. It appears that the iron did become crystalline, and it seems to have been the general opinion of the witnesses that that would account for the accident. I say this because the case on the record does not specify that as the cause of the accident. Indeed, there is exceeding vagueness in the theory of the pursuer as stated on record. It is very much the view suggested in the more general passage in the note of the Sheriff, res ipsa loquitur. Condescendence 3 says, “The cause of the accident was the snapping or giving way of an iron band which fastened one of the crane stays to the ground, and the defect”—it is not stated what the defect was—“could have easily been discovered upon a fit and careful examination of the crane by the defender.”

Taking the case, then, as I have said, on the assumption of both the Sheriffs, that the strap broke through the crystallisation of the iron, where was the fault on the part of the defender? The reasoning of the Sheriff rests on the fact that another strap in a different part of the crane had given way previously, and the cause of its failure had been found to be the crystallisation of the iron. He says, inasmuch as one strap had given way through the iron becoming crystalline, there was fault on the part of the defender in not removing the other strap, which would in all likelihood crystallise also.

I cannot assent to this reasoning. Prima facie, the two pieces of iron have no connection with each other, except in so far as they both are artificially made parts of one structure. That does not raise the inference that because one piece is bad, the other must have a similar infirmity. There is no evidence in support of that conclusion, which, apart from evidence, seems a somewhat crude and superstitious apprehension, rather than a scientific deduction. The defender, I think, took a more practical view of the case when he handed the crane over to Sangster, a very competent engineer, to be overhauled; he says that he examined the strap now in question, passed it as sound, and used it in the reconstruction of the crane. In doing so, the Sheriff finds the defender was in fault. A curious feature of the case is, that a very close inspection in 1889 could at most only have detected a crack, and that crystallisation probably did not exist in

No. 148. 1889, but existed for a very much shorter period. The pursuer's case therefore fails unless the defender was bound to discard all the iron on the crane because one piece was found to be in a somewhat uncommon condition. The defect was latent, and the facts do not sustain the view of the Sheriff, that in reconstructing the crane in 1889 there was any negligence on the part of the defender, or on the part of Sangster in retaining this strap as part of the renewed crane.

June 3, 1892.
Milne v.
Townsend.

The defect being latent, it was for the pursuer to establish either that it was in the original structure and that the defender was bound to examine and test for such defects on the crane coming into his possession, or else (on the theory that it was a supervening defect) he was bound to make out that there was a duty of periodical inspection which would have revealed its existence, and that the defender failed to provide such periodical inspection. On the first point the pursuer has failed. There was very little argument upon the second, the witnesses agreeing that if there was a thorough inspection made in 1889 there was no need to have another inspection before 1891, when the accident happened.

I am of opinion that we should recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff and revert to that of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD ADAM.—In this case the question of onus is not important, because we know the facts and we must decide the case according to the facts ascertained.

A person who meets with an injury and claims reparation must shew that there was fault on the part of the defender. It has been held in some cases as the Sheriff says, that res ipsa loquitur, but the res can only speak so as to throw the inference of fault upon the defender in some cases where the exact cause of the accident is unexplained. That does not arise in the least here, because the cause of the accident has been ascertained to have been the state of the iron of the strap which was defective in two respects. Its substance had crystallised, and there was an external crack. It is, however, material to note that these two states have no connection with each other. As regards the crystalline nature of the iron, that was beyond doubt a latent defect which nothing less than heating would have disclosed, and it was probably that state of the iron which led to the accident and not the crack, which apparently was merely a surface crack. If there is no doubt that the crystalline nature of the iron caused the accident, the question of the crack is immaterial. But suppose the question of the crack were important, it is said examination would have disclosed it, and for not so examining it the defender must be held responsible. That that examination would have revealed it is more than doubtful. The foreman was in the habit of examining it, and the evidence for the pursuer as well as for the defender shews that if the crane came back from a competent engineer in 1889, as it did, there was no need before 1891 for such an examination as would alone have disclosed the crack, viz., an examination by scraping off the paint. I think therefore there was no fault on the defender's part on that ground.

The fault found by the Sheriff was not insufficient examination, or that examination would have disclosed defects in the crane, but he finds fault in the defender's treatment of the crane in 1889. At that time one of the straps was found to be in a similar state to that in which this strap was at the date of the accident, and he says a man of skill ought to have drawn the inference that it other strap was in a similar condition, and ought de plano to have discarded them all. Whether he would carry his argument so far as to say he ought to have discarded all the iron about the crane, and not merely all the straps, I do not know. I cannot follow that reasoning, and I cannot affirm the Sheriff's view that there was fault on the defender's part in not rejecting all the straps in 1889. I think we must believe Sangster when he says that he then examined all the straps, including this one, and that there was no fault in the defender after that continuing to use them. I am of opinion we should revert to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

No. 148.

Milne v. Townsend.

LORD M'LAREN.—Everyone will agree that when a pursuer comes into Court with a claim for damages for personal injuries he must prove the negligence which he avers. I do not think that the Sheriff meant to lay down any law to the contrary, but there are expressions in his note to the effect that it is enough for a pursuer to prove that there was a fault in the machinery—it may be a latent defect—and then it is for the defender to exonerate himself of responsibility for the fault. That is an inversion of the true rule, and although here the question of onus is not material since we know the facts, it may be material in other cases.

Where the defect is latent the pursuer must prove that it was known to the maker or user, or that it was discoverable by careful inspection. The crane here was a comparatively new one. It was erected in 1887, four years before this accident happened, and in consequence of one of the guy-straps having given way in 1889, the crane was taken to pieces and re-erected. At that time it was given back to the defenders as substantially a new crane, and two years thereafter the accident in question occurred. One of the pursuer's witnesses, Henderson, says that "in the case of a young crane a competent foreman would go over the iron work every two years." Now, as only two years had elapsed since the crane had been overhauled, it is evident from the pursuer's own case that there was no omission of necessary supervision or inspection. The cause of the breakdown was, as far as we can see, the general disintegration of the iron of the strap when passing into a crystalline state. But whatever the cause was, the injury appears to have been the result of a pure misadventure, for which no one is responsible.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff: Hold the findings in fact contained in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 14th November 1891, as here repeated: And further, find as matter of fact that the pursuer has failed to prove fault on the part of the defender: Affirm the said interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and of new assolzie the defender . . ."

Company—Application for shares—Acceptance—Letter of allotment—Proof.
—In January 1891 a person applied for shares in a public company, and in August withdrew his application.
In a petition presented by him for removal of his name from the register of reholders he alleged that he had received no letter of allotment. There was

Chapman v.
Sulphite Pulp
Co., Limited.

1st DIVISION. THE SULPHITE PULP COMPANY, LIMITED, was incorporated in 1890, with a nominal capital of £50,000, in 5000 shares of £10 each. On 26th November following Samuel Chapman applied for twelve shares and deposited a sum of £60, being £5 per share on application. On 12th January 1891 he made a further application for twelve additional shares and made the necessary deposit. The applications contained a request that the applicant's name should be placed on the register of members for the shares which might be allotted.

Not having received—as he alleged—any intimation that the shares in question, or any of them, had been allotted, he, on 7th August 1891, wrote through his agents “withdrawing unconditionally” his applications for the shares.

Ultimately the answer made by the secretary was that notices of allotment had been sent to Mr Chapman in regard to both applications, and that his name appeared on the register.

Chapman then presented a petition under the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, to have his name deleted from the register.

Proof was led. The evidence regarding the receipt of the allotment letters was not conclusive. In each case the application for shares was taken to the manager's office by the petitioner's wife—(the petitioner himself being frequently absent from home on business)—along with the cheques for the amounts payable on application, and the banker's receipts for these payments were received by the petitioner. The petitioner deponed that he had called on Mr Dempster, the secretary, in March 1891, after he had received (as he admitted) a circular calling the first ordinary general meeting of the company, and stated that he was getting anxious about his shares, and that the reason given for the non-sending of the allotment letter was that one of the directors was abroad, and that the necessary document could not be issued until his return. Mrs Chapman, deponed that no allotment letters for the shares in question having reached her, she had called upon Mr Dempster about the end of March 1891, and he deponed that, at that meeting, he had told her that Mr Chapman's name was on the register for twenty-four shares, and that it could not be taken off except by transfer. Mrs Chapman had no recollection of what passed. Mr Dempster deponed that Mrs Chapman had on that occasion left the second letter of allotment with him in order that the shares might be disposed of, and this letter was produced.

Argued for the petitioner;—There was no completed contract to take the shares. The allotment was not proved to have been communicated to the petitioner, and the onus of proving that it had been so communicated was on the company.¹ The principle upon which it had been held that the posting of a letter accepting an offer constituted a binding contract was that the post-office was the common agent of both parties when offer and acceptance both went through the post.² Accordingly, if an offer were made by letter which authorised the sending of an answer by post, the posting of a letter was sufficient. Besides, in Harris' and Dunlop's cases the letter of acceptance was received. But here the offer was not made through the post, but on each occasion the petitioner's wife herself delivered it to the company. There was nothing in the other circumstances of the case which could be held to bind the petitioner.

Argued for the respondents ;—The petitioner was duly informed that the shares were allotted to him. There was no obligation on a public company to see that letters which were properly posted were actually delivered. The contract was completed as soon as the letter of allotment was posted.¹ But there was really no necessity for a letter of allotment.² It would be impossible for a company in all cases to prove that an applicant had received special notice of allotment. If the company were bound to send such notice, great inconvenience and hardship would result. It was enough that the applicant was proved to have knowledge of the fact of the allotment. That was the case here. His wife's knowledge was his own, and it was proved that at her interview with Mr Dempster he had told her that the petitioner's name was on the register. Further, the petitioner admitted that he had received a circular of a general meeting of the company, from which he must have known that he was a shareholder.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is not disputed that the petitioner applied for twenty-four shares of this company ; it is certain that they were allotted to him, and that he was put on the register as holder of those shares. Most of the evidence which has been taken relates to the questions whether or not he was at the time informed by the company of the allotments, and whether allotment letters were sent to him and received by him.

The respondents' counsel stated that they did not impugn the credibility of the petitioner and of his wife, and I should have found difficulty in arriving at a conclusion on the questions which I have stated, but a much simpler ground of judgment is presented somewhat incidentally in the evidence. On two occasions in spring 1891, after he had been put on the register, Mr Chapman was in communication with the officials of the company regarding those shares, and I think the result of the evidence is that, apart altogether from the disputed letters, he was then sufficiently apprised that the company had accepted him as a shareholder in terms of his applications. On one of those occasions the petitioner's wife went, as arranged with the petitioner, to see the secretary of the company, and unquestionably was in law his agent. Now, Mr Dempster says he told her that Mr Chapman was on the register. His words are,—“ I said I was very sorry, but that I could not help it, because his name was now on the register, and the shares could only be taken over by transfer.” Mrs Chapman is asked about this, and to the question “ Did Mr Dempster explain to you that he could do nothing now, as Mr Chapman's name was on the register for the twenty-four shares, and that they could not be taken off except by transfer ? ” she replied—“ I don't remember that at all.” It is not unnatural that Mrs Chapman should not remember this, for apparently she did not know the importance of registration. On the other hand, it is certain that Mr Dempster

Chapman v.

The other fact to which I refer is that, he being on the register, the company sent to the petitioner a circular calling him to a meeting of shareholders. This was, unless explained away, an intimation that the company treated him as a shareholder. Now, Mr Chapman says that after receiving that circular he saw Mr Dempster, and taking his own account of the conversation, it certainly did not result in any disclaimer of him as a shareholder by Mr Dempster, and his evidence rather reads as if he understood that only some formal evidence of his membership yet remained to be given to him.

In my opinion, therefore, it is proved that in March 1891 the company had adequately informed the petitioner that he had been accepted as a member, and from that time, therefore, he was not entitled to resile.

THE COURT refused the petition, with expenses.
